INTRODUCTION

In the Spring of 1934, Dr. C. G. Jung brought to a conclusion a seminar at the Zürich Psychological Club which had been running since October 1930. The subject matter with which Jung and his students—practicing analysts, those training to be analysts, and selected analysts—had engaged themselves was visions, more especially the remarkable painted visions of an American woman, Christiana Morgan. As this final term drew to a close, the question arose as to what the next seminar should center upon, for by now the importance—almost the necessity—of such a lecture/discussion series was well established. Before Visions, there had been the Dreams Seminar, and so on back to 1923—perhaps even earlier—when Jung started this kind of teaching for a very particular audience. In 1934 the group apparently had little hesitation in deciding upon Nietzsche as their new topic, and more particularly Nietzsche's strange and wonderful Thus Spake Zarathustra. And so it was that when the group, some of whom had dropped out and been replaced by others, convened in May, it was to hear their mentor's warning that they all had an uphill and rocky path before them, for not only was Nietzsche's mind highly convoluted and devious, but his Zarathustra particularly so, with a style invented for this very purpose—whatever that was! But nothing daunted, they set to, and as in previous seminars, the excitement grew as their leader (who loved mountains) began to ready them for a journey that was destined to end before its natural culmination, drowned out by the alarms of war as the fateful summer of 1939 approached.

By this time another feature of the seminars was also familiar: the recording of the lectures and discussions. A professional secretary had been engaged to take notes, which in turn were edited by Mary Foote with the help of various members of the group, virtually all of whom were taking their own notes. Bound multigraphed copies of these notes were then made available to the participants, and to others associated with Analytical Psychology, but each "volume" bore a warning that the report was intended for the exclusive use of "members of the Seminar with the understanding that it is not to be loaned and that no part of it is to be copied or quoted for publication without Prof. Jung's written permission."

An important reason for this restriction was undoubtedly Jung's not having edited the notes, at least not beyond giving a quick run-through and answers to questions Miss Foote had, perhaps about a proper name not caught by the secretary. But for all the explicit prohibition, copies were made, and the multigraphed copies began to appear in cities all over the world, especially where C. G. Jung Institutes were established, for the word got out that here was something special—indeed, unique. For those who had never been present at a lecture, these typescripts afforded an opportunity to get acquainted with Professor Jung, speaking extemporaneously and with considerable informality, fielding questions and observations (by persons who were in most instances themselves highly intelligent and knowledgeable students of human nature), not worrying if the discussion meandered some distance from the main path, offering suggestions for further reading, alluding to contemporary political and economic happenings, telling jokes. In 1957 Jung gave permission for “going public,” and the appearance in 1984 of Dream Analysis, edited by William McGuire, inaugurated a project to publish most of Jung’s seminar notes.<sup>1</sup>

Jung’s recommendation to the Seminar of the Nietzsche text would have been no surprise to those who knew him well. Already in his early works, Jung had discussed Nietzsche, and most of his associates must have heard him attest to the importance this German philosopher-poet-psychologist had had for his own intellectual coming-of-age. In the chapter “Student Days” of his autobiography, Memories, Dreams, Reflections, we read Jung’s account of how in medical school, he’d had to curtail his philosophical readings:

The clinical semesters that followed kept me so busy that scarcely any time remained for my forays into outlying fields. I was able to study Kant only on Sundays. I also read Eduard von Hartmann [famous then for his Philosophy of the Unconscious] assiduously. Nietzsche had been on my program for some time, but I hesitated to begin reading him because I felt I was insufficiently prepared.<sup>2</sup> At that time he was much discussed, mostly in adverse terms, by the allegedly competent philosophy students, from which I was able to deduce the hostility he aroused in the higher echelons. The supreme authority, of course, was Jakob Burckhardt, whose various critical comments on Nietzsche were bandied about. Moreover, there were some persons at the university who had known Nietzsche personally and were able to retail all sorts of unflattering tidbits about him. (p. 101/105)

All of this whetted Jung's appetite, and yet he "was held back by a secret fear that I might perhaps be like him" (p. 102/105). Still, curiosity got the better of him and he plunged with enthusiasm into the early collection of essays called Thoughts Out of Season (or Untimely Meditations) and then on to Zarathustra, which "like Goethe's Faust, was a tremendous experience for me." Yet there remained the feeling that this was very dangerous territory, from which he retreated to the safer ground of empirical studies.

Medical school completed, he had gone to Zürich's Burghölzli Hospital as resident psychiatrist. Then came the historic meeting with Freud. Jung must have been surprised at this well-read man's admission that he had never read Nietzsche. Indeed this seems to have planted in the younger man's mind the seed of suspicion, one that grew into a later conviction, that Freud's heavy emphasis upon eros and his neglect of the power drive could be better stated as "Freud versus Nietzsche" than as "Freud versus Adler" (MDR, p. 153/150).

After the break with Freud in 1913 and during the enforced isolation of the war years, Jung began a closer reading of Beyond Good and Evil, The Gay Science, Genealogy of Morals, and of course Zarathustra. Now he was even more strongly impressed with how powerfully Nietzsche's case illustrated his own growing understanding that one's most basic beliefs have their roots in personality and in turn one can discover much about an author's own personality from his writings. In Psychological Types (1921) he recognized Nietzsche as a highly introverted intuitive, with a strongly developed thinking function, but with serious weaknesses in sensation and feeling. In contrast to the intellectualistic Bergson, Jung wrote, Nietzsche made far greater use of the intuitive source and in so doing freed himself from the body of the intellect in shaping his philosophical ideas. . . . If one can speak of an intuitive method at all, Zarathustra is in my view the best example of it, and at the same time a vivid illustration of how the problem can be grasped in a non-intellectual and yet philosophical way. (CW 6, par. 540)

Schopenhauer and Kant, the other two great philosophical influences on Jung, were both thinking types—a function that comes out strongly in Nietzsche too in his more aphoristic writings—but here at last was a philosopher whose interests were more psychological than metaphysical, and who was constantly in search of a world-view that would guide and enrich life and not, as in Schopenhauer's case, simply intone the inevitability of frustration. And yet, Jung came to think, nobody illustrates better than Nietzsche the necessity not to take at face value what a philosopher or psychologist says and writes, but to examine the words in the context of the quality of his life as lived.

We must look very critically at the life of one who taught such a yea-saying, in order to examine the effects of this teaching on the teacher's own life. When we scrutinize his life with this aim in view we are bound to admit that Nietzsche lived beyond instinct, in the lofty heights of heroic sublimity—heights that he could maintain only with the help of the most meticulous diet, a carefully selected climate, and many aids to sleep—until the tension shattered his brain. He talked of yea-saying and lived the nay. His loathing for man, for the human animal that lived by instinct, was too great. Despite everything, he could not swallow the toad he so often dreamed of and which he feared had to be swallowed. The roaring of the Zarathustrian lion drove back into the cavern of the unconscious all the “higher” men who were clamouring to live. Hence his life does not convince us of his teaching. For the “higher man” wants to be able to sleep without chloral, to live in Naumburg and Basel despite the “fogs and shadows.” He desires wife and offspring, standing and esteem among the herd, innumerable commonplace realities, and not least those of the Philistine. Nietzsche failed to live this instinct, the animal urge to life. For all his greatness and importance, Nietzsche's was a pathological personality. (CW 7, par. 37)

As will be apparent from the lectures below, Jung believed that Nietzsche's psychosis announced itself long before the break in 1889, and the neurosis, he was sure, was there all along. About a mental illness, Jung had no romantic illusions. A creative person is not creative, or more creative, because of neurosis—quite the contrary. Against Freud, he maintained with firmness that “art is not a morbidity.” At the same time, Jung recognized that “a person must pay dearly for the divine gift of creative fire” (CW 15, par. 158). This is especially true of the kind of artist he called “visionary,” those with startling prescience, like Goethe and Joyce—and certainly this strange, lonely, ailing, productive genius that was Nietzsche.

Jung saw in Nietzsche one who had greatly assisted in the nineteenth-century discovery of the unconscious, thus constituting an exception to Freud's complaint that philosophers pay attention only to the purely mental side of life. But Freud was unwilling to read Zarathustra, even though he sensed the ways in which Nietzsche had anticipated some of his own ideas, for fear that he be unduly influenced by ideas that were merely speculative rather than grounded in empirical practice. Jung on the other hand was always delighted to discover anticipators of any sort: they seemed somehow to contribute an advance confirmation of his own expression of what he took to be archetypally grounded ideas.

This present volume appears at a time when Nietzsche's reputation has reached a new height. In his own short lifetime—he had a little over fifteen years of mature, creative work before his breakdown in 1889—he was one more gossiped about or ignored than taken seriously. Many of his writings he had to publish out of his own slender resources. Only right at the last was he beginning to be recognized by a few important people outside the narrow circle of his acquaintances: August Strindberg, Georg Brandes, Hippolyte Taine. Yet his mental collapse made it all too easy to dismiss his ideas as brilliant but—mad. Even as late as 1925, a popular history of philosophy textbook in America made no mention of Nietzsche in the march of nineteenth-century ideas; yet without always being acknowledged, Nietzsche had a notable effect on twentieth-century writers: Thomas Mann, Shaw, Lawrence, Remy de Gourmont, Heidegger, Jaspers—the list could go on and on. A hundred years after his birth, Nietzsche was to be recognized as a major thinker—and, more generally, writer.

The brilliance of his mind must have been apparent from early along. Once he found his academic specialization, classical philology, at Bonn and then Leipzig, he was recognized by his teachers and fellow students to be destined for high achievement, as is evident by his appointment to the University of Basel at the age of 24 with promotion to a full professorship a year later. Yet his first sizable work, the original The Birth of Tragedy from the Spirit of Music, was a disappointment to those who expected him to follow the lines of conventional scholarship. Here it was that Nietzsche established his identity with Dionysos, even though he balanced this god of music and darkness with Apollo, the patron of Greek sculpture, form, light. As a young man he was the faithful follower of Schopenhauer, and when he met Wagner, he found, as he thought, a living exemplar of the philosopher who taught that in music and the contemplation of the Eternal Ideas lay the only escape from the wheel of will to which we are all so miserably strapped. Both of these heroes were celebrated in his Untimely Essays, but it was not long before his idols began to tarnish. Schopenhauer, he came to think, was right in the importance that he attached to Will, but wrong in not celebrating it in the form of Will to Power—by which Nietzsche meant especially the power of creative genius, grounded in the severest discipline. (“All creators are hard” was one way he put it.) Wagner he counted one of the greatest exemplars of artistic creativity, but unfortunately (Nietzsche came to think), there was in him a streak of decadence, a softness, a romantic weakness, even a sentimental nostalgia for Christianity: consider Parsifal!

Jung was to see in Nietzsche’s radical shifts of judgment what he called (taking the word from Heraclitus) enantiodromia, a pendulum swing from one judgment or belief to its opposite. He even cites as an example Nietzsche’s “deification and subsequent hatred of Wagner” (CW 6, par. 709). Nietzsche showed himself to be a fine teacher at Basel, but in only a few years the teaching duties proved too onerous for his delicately balanced organism. He had to take a leave, and not long after, to petition for a remarkably early retirement. The rest of his life he lived on a modest pension, enough to supply him board and room, pen and ink, and train tickets to carry him from Basel to Turin to Genoa to Nice to Venice, continually on the move in search of the right climate, which with a new diet, was ever his hope for relief from his miseries—blinding headache, indigestion, failing eyes, dizzy spells, insomnia, etc.—which were to be his lifelong lot. Worst of all was the loneliness. But as he became more and more the yea-sayer, he saw his loneliness and even his sickness as essential to the creative tasks he had set for himself; as he wrote, late in his conscious life, to Georg Brandes, “My illness has been my greatest boon: it unblocked me, it gave me the courage to be myself.” And Zarathustra, he called “a dithyramb to solitude.”

Although he was to go on to write the works reckoned by philosophers as his masterpieces—The Genealogy of Morals, Beyond Good and Evil, Twilight of the Idols, The Anti-Christ, The Gay Science—he always reckoned Zarathustra his greatest achievement, and it remains the favorite of most people who read Nietzsche at all. Composed, as he liked to say, six thousand feet beyond good and evil, if ever there was a work written out of inspiration, this is it. Each of the first three parts (which is as far as Jung’s seminar ever got) was written in about ten days, and for all of the work's poetic style, it is quintessential Nietzsche.<sup>3</sup> Here is the emergence of the self-announced immoralist, here is the will to power, here the eternal recurrence of the same, the death of god, and the overman. In the semi-legendary Persian prophet Zarathustra, he found his spokesman for the necessity of a complete reversal of mankind's attitudes, beliefs, and aspirations.<sup>4</sup> Everything that has been revered—especially by Christians—was to be denounced and abandoned, and that which had been reviled was to be embraced and practiced. In what he called the “transvaluation of all values,” he celebrated not amoralism but what the western tradition has called immoralism and immorality. In renouncing the antithesis of good and evil, he embraced the opposition of good and bad.

What is good? Everything that heightens the feeling of power in man, the will to power, power itself. What is bad? Everything that is born of weakness.

This particular formulation came later, but the sentiment, the idea, is already in Zarathustra.

Although he prided himself on having “unlearned self-pity,” it would have required an overman (which Nietzsche made no claim to be) not to be devastated by the silence that greeted what he knew to be a major work. (In 1876 he reported that each part had sold sixty or seventy copies!) To compensate for the neglect of others, he found it necessary, it seems, to make ever stronger claims for himself: “the foremost mind of the century” was the way he put it four months before his collapse. But also, “With this Z[arathustra] I have brought the German language to a state of perfection.” Not Nietzsche at his most endearing, but the number who today find the boasts not ill-founded is impressive. Yet he had to settle for a self-assurance that his time would come: “Some people are born posthumously.” And no doubt that would mean interpreters. Here was another source of anxiety: almost better—maybe even really better—to be ignored than misunderstood. “If you should ever come around to writing about me,” he wrote to his friend Carl Fuchs (who was indeed tempted to do so),

<sup>3</sup> The first two parts of Zarathustra appeared in 1883, the third in 1884, and the fourth, which gave Nietzsche more trouble, appeared in a privately printed edition of a mere forty copies in 1885.

... be sensible enough—as nobody has been till now—to characterize me, to “describe”—but not to “evaluate.” ... I have never been characterized, either as a psychologist or as a writer (including poet), or as the inventor of a new kind of pessimism (a Dionysian pessimism born of strength, which takes pleasure in seizing the problem of existence by the horns), or as an Immoralist (the highest form, till now, of “intellectual rectitude,” which is permitted to treat morality as illusion, having itself become instinct and inevitability).

Many have indeed characterized and described Nietzsche, but few have minded his plea not to evaluate. Certainly Jung’s whole bent as a psychotherapist was to look beyond the words by which men and women pronounce their truths and exalt their ideals to other signs of the quality of life being led.

When Jung began his Zarathustra seminar, Nietzsche, dead a third of a century, was becoming famous. Many biographies had been written, including one by Nietzsche’s own sister. His philosophical acumen was being increasingly recognized, interpreted, and taught. His mastery of the German language was receiving ever greater recognition. Even his own claims to being a psychologist (than which he could imagine no greater calling) were receiving grudging recognition, at least by those in the traditions of Depth Psychology. But there was also the alarming spectacle of Nietzsche’s being trumpeted as a prophet for National Socialism. Jung knew this claim to be based on a complete misunderstanding: consider Nietzsche’s contempt for nearly everything German, his hatred of anti-Semitism, his exposure of “the neurosis called Nationalism.” Or this:

As soon as war breaks out anywhere, there also breaks out precisely among the noblest people a pleasure that, to be sure, is kept secret ... ; war offers them a detour to suicide, but a detour with a good conscience.

All the same, there were bound to be those who would jump to the conclusion that lectures on Nietzsche were a kind of attempt to give the Nazis an intellectual justification. Perhaps even more dangerous were those Nazi sympathizers in Switzerland and elsewhere who might claim as allies any student of Nietzsche.

It is perhaps not easy for those distanced from the intensity of political and economic feelings in the thirties, to understand that even this little seminar, devoted to psychological analysis, was not exempt—who was?—from the growing sense of the inevitability of a dreadful war, with the outcome uncertain—for perhaps it was to be Deutschland (in its new guise) “Über Alles.” These seminar notes evidence over and again an uneasy awareness even in this protected environment of the violence abroad in Europe. Certainly Jung was intensely conscious of the importance of Zarathustra as a foreshadowing of the cataclysm about to overtake Europe and the world. Late in the seminar he said, “Perhaps I am the only one who takes the trouble to go so much into the detail of Zarathustra—far too much, some people may think. So nobody actually realizes to what extent he was connected with the unconscious and therefore with the fate of Europe in general.”

For all the tension of the times, Jung was busy as ever. In addition to this seminar, he was conducting another in German on children’s dreams. He was traveling: to London to deliver the Tavistock Lectures; to Yale University to deliver the Terry Lectures, The Psychology of Religion, and to India, where he was awarded three honorary doctorates. And he was writing, of course: “A Review of the Complex Theory,” “Archetypes of the Collective Unconscious,” “Individual Dream Symbolism in Relation to Alchemy,” “What is Psychotherapy?” “The Practical Use of Dream Analysis,” “The Development of Personality,” “Yoga and the West”—to mention only some of his publications dating from this time. He had a large clinical practice. There was his annual Swiss military duty to perform. He was paterfamilias to a large household. Besides a running correspondence with many friends, he was generous in answering queries and prayers for advice from strangers who wrote him from all parts of the world. Yet year after year Jung continued as a teacher, particularly in this format that had established itself over the years: the group of twenty-five or thirty carefully selected persons, with a strong central core of veterans, who would hear the lectures and participate in the discussion on those magical Wednesday mornings. Yet in these troubled times, there were those who would raise a question about whether to continue the Zarathustra seminar: wouldn’t it be better and not so distressingly charged to move to a quieter subject, say Goethe’s Fairy Tales? But a vote came out in favor of continuing with Zarathustra, and so Jung went on to wrestle and dance with the immensely complex psyche of Nietzsche.

The written confrontation of giants in intellectual history is always fascinating and often exceedingly illuminating: Plato and Socrates, Aristotle and Plato, Aquinas and Aristotle, and so on down to more recent times: Hegel and Marx, Nietzsche and Schopenhauer, Jung and Freud. Interestingly, Nietzsche seems to have had a particularly magnetic quality for some of the finest intellects of the twentieth century: thus both Karl Jaspers and Martin Heidegger wrote voluminously on this most provocative of thinkers. And then—now—Jung and Nietzsche.

Always in these confrontations of peers there are affinities—otherwise, why bother? Listen to Aristotle say, “We Platonists.” And for a time, Jung said, “We Freudians.” Jung could not have said, “We Nietzscheans,” yet he shared much with Nietzsche. Both were haunted by Christianity. Alike, they were elitists—not on trivial grounds of wealth, family, class, race, but with respect to intelligence, understanding, and consciousness. For Nietzsche, who self-consciously addressed his works to “the very few,” the great distinction was between the slave morality of accommodation, appeasement, mercy, forgiveness, turning the other cheek, and the morality of the masters, the overmen. Jung, too, often said that in terms of their conscious development, most people have not got beyond the Middle Ages and thus, perhaps, should be left slumbering in their family parlors and church pews. For both Jung and Nietzsche, the road to individuation—to use Jung’s term—is lonely and rough, especially if there is a widespread lack of understanding of, even of belligerence toward, the mission. Thus, at times, each had a sense of being, as Nietzsche put it, posthumous.

Alike they were contemptuous of hedonism, the philosophy of comfort, pleasure, satisfaction. Both—though neither would have put it this way—were in the existentialist tradition of belief that without conflict and suffering, consciousness is doomed to stagnation and regression. Both sought, instead, for a philosophy and psychology (if they would admit a difference between the two) whose test is simply but richly this: does it conduce to a life rich in fulfilment, attainment, even transcendence to a realm of integration beyond what is reachable from the comfortable couches of everydayness. Theirs, alike, was a philosophy of darkness, no less than light, a celebration of the Dionysian spirit wherein is found the scariness of the unconscious with its alarming dreams which are yet the great source of human creativity. Both deplored and regretted—yet acknowledged the prevalence of—what Nietzsche called “the diminished personality” with its cautiously expurgated conception of what is real and important. They agreed that no one’s intellectual or artistic achievement can be understood or fairly assessed without regard for the whole self of the creator. Thus, listen to Jung’s applause for Nietzsche’s claim: “I have always written my works with my whole body and life”—this in contesting any such thing as a merely intellectual problem. Both were, in Jung’s terms, highly developed in intuition and thinking; both were introverts. Both acknowledged their debt to Heraclitus, Goethe, Schopenhauer, and Dostoevsky. Jung would have rejoiced in Nietzsche's equating greatness in a man with his "comprehensiveness, and multiplicity, his wholeness in manifoldness—how much and how many things a person could bear and take upon himself, how far a person could extend his responsibility." Nietzsche anticipated Jung as to the part of the psyche that is an it (Freud's id), something that dreams, anticipates, thinks, but is below the level of the subject-ego. And what must have been the astonishment on the part of the inventor of Archetypal Psychology when he encountered Nietzsche's praise of Siegfried: "A marvelously accurate, archetypal youth." Or better yet, of the Ring: "A tremendous system of thought without the conceptual forms of thought"—an extraordinary description of the archetype. Their important differences will come out, as never before, in the long commentary that lies ahead in this book, but two important disagreements between these thinkers may be mentioned here. The first is that for the one, the aesthetic dimension of life was of primary importance, for the other, the religious. It is no accident that the one overwhelmingly important friendship in Nietzsche's life was with a musician—indeed a musician whose great ambition was to make his operas (or as he preferred to say, "music dramas") transcend the trivialities of public entertainment, to become grand syntheses of music, literature, visual design, dance, mythology, and philosophy. Nietzsche wholly agreed with the aspiration, and if he became disillusioned with the all-too-human Wagner, it was because Wagner finally also wanted to include religion—worst of all, Christianity. Like Nietzsche, Jung was a pastor's son and both can be easily seen as in revolt against the pieties of their early households. Still Jung, unlike Nietzsche, saw in the various religions of the world an inescapable and often profound attempt to symbolize man's eternal quest for meaning. Against Nietzsche (and Freud) Jung believed that the great world religions represent brave attempts to grasp the nature of the soul and the possibilities—albeit dreadfully remote—of salvation. Thus, to neglect the profound questions of the origins and destinies of human consciousness is as self-defeating as neglecting dream and myth.

If Aeschylus and Shakespeare and Goethe are no less worth our time and energy than are the prophets and gurus, it is because they share the latter's concern with the ultimate questions, not because of a highly developed aesthetic capability or a mastery of the grand style. We can imagine Jung smiling in agreement with Nietzsche's little poem that says, "I am naught but a word maker," yet would Nietzsche have smiled in return, "Is it not written, 'In the beginning was the word' "? Certain it is that Nietzsche's career-long effort—almost desperate in its intensity—to achieve, for each of his multifarious purposes, the right style, the ultimate way of integrating form and content, was an idée fixe, one Jung could hardly share or condone.

Another great parting of the ways for these men comes out clearly in an early criticism by Jung: agreeing as to the necessity of not losing touch with the instincts (for instance, through excessive intellectualization or other forms of spirituality), they differed as to the best path toward a higher level. Nietzsche undoubtedly felt the Christian denial of animal nature very deeply indeed, and therefore he sought a higher human wholeness beyond good and evil. But he who seriously criticizes the basic attitudes of Christianity also forfeits the protection which these bestow upon him. He delivers himself up unresistingly to the animal psyche. That is the moment of Dionysian frenzy, the overwhelming manifestation of the "blond beast," which seizes the unsuspecting soul with nameless shudders. The seizure transforms him into a hero or into a godlike being, a superhuman entity. . . . If heroism becomes chronic, it ends in a cramp, and the cramp leads to catastrophe.

To be sure, Nietzsche would again have agreed with Jung when he says, just a little later in this passage, "Man can suffer only a certain amount of culture without injury." But then Jung's criticism resumes: "The endless dilemma of culture and nature is always a question of too much or too little, never of either-or" (CW 7, pars. 40-41).

And yet did not Nietzsche say, as if in answer to Jung's criticism, "I am one thing, my writings are another"? And the (now old) New Critics and virtually the whole fraternity of philosophers would say, "Yes, leave the man and his life alone: stick to the text." Indeed, Jung would in a sense agree that one's writings and the rest of one's life may be discrepant. And the creative work (in any medium) may represent an imaginative extension of what passes for reality, even a compensation for the limitations of character that may doom the greatest genius to stretches of mediocrity in day-to-day existence. "Yet," we can imagine Jung's continuing, "this whole seminar is devoted to the analysis of one of your 'excellent books' to determine as nearly as possible the quality of the life of its author, for how can one not be in one's own creations? And did you not say, 'I judge a philosopher by whether he is able to serve as an example'?"

The last question Nietzsche put in the last of his books was simply: "Have I been understood?" Now Nietzsche or, more likely, a Nietzschean, might well add, "Does Jung finally do justice to the greatness of Nietzsche as philosopher, as writer?" And (again with presumption) one might imagine the Geist of Jung answering, "Is not the question rather, 'Have we, by way of our analysis of your text and what it tells us about your life, better understood the human condition?' "

This seminar, like all of Jung's seminars, is about Analytical Psychology.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The editor of a work as richly allusive as any of Jung—but especially in the seminar notes, which he did not himself provide footnotes for—must seek help from colleagues, acquaintances, and highly recommended strangers on matters historical, theological, astronomical, horticultural, psychological, and so on. In the present instance, much my greatest debt is to William McGuire, the master of them that know Jung texts and Jungiana. He saved me from many a slip or blunder. Joseph Henderson who was, in its latter stages, a member of the Seminar, helped me imagine the scene by his vivid accounts of the meetings and of a great many of the participants. Gerhard Adler, Lilliane Frey-Rohn, Aniela Jaffé, and C. A. Meier were also helpful in providing background material and answering specific questions.

Others who gave generously of their time and scholarship are: Joan Alpert, John Anton, Thomas G. Barnes, Patricia Benson, Robert Browning, Robert Cockrell, Randy Cross, Joseph Fontenrose, Jennifer Gordon, Paul Heist, Dennis Jarrett, Richard Kern, Thomas Leahy, S.J., Charles McCoy, Alexander Nehamas, Kenneth Paigen, Graham Parkes, Thomas G. Rosenmeyer, Evert Schlenger, Martin Schwartz, Will Tuttle, Claude Welch. Elisa Leptich, as my research assistant, haunted the Berkeley library and came up with many identifications. Marjorie Jarrett devoted hundreds of hours to collating, juggling, and word-processing the notes. Virginia Draper made useful discoveries and in addition offered a number of helpful stylistic suggestions. Babette Jackson did most of the indexing. Finally, I am grateful to the members of a small but intense study group that has, year after year, been investigating Jung's personality typology, for their (as always) stimulating discussion of parts of the text: Noelle Caskey, Wayne Detloff, Ravenna Helson, and Byron Lambie.

A NOTE ON THE TEXT

The notes that constitute the text have here been followed closely but not slavishly. By far the greatest number of changes have been in punctuation, but occasionally minor changes in syntax have been made in the interest of clarity. A very small number of deletions have been made, but exclusively of stories or other material the reader has recently encountered in virtually identical form.

Professor Jung's English, both oral and written, was of course excellent, but as with almost all non-native speakers, he sometimes made a slight deviation from the perfectly idiomatic. Except in the few instances in which clarity was thereby sacrificed these have been allowed to stand in order to stay as close as possible to the speaker's own "voice."

LECTURE I

2 May 1934

Dr. Jung:

Ladies and Gentlemen: I made up my mind to give you a Seminar about Zarathustra as you wished, but the responsibility is on your heads. If you think that Zarathustra is easier than those visions, you are badly mistaken, it is a hell of a confusion and extraordinarily difficult.<sup>1</sup> I broke my head over certain problems; it will be very hard to elucidate this work from a psychological angle. However, we will try to do our best, but you must cooperate.

I think, concerning the technique, that it will be best to go through the chapters from the beginning, and I am afraid it will take us far more than one term to plough through the whole thing. It is considerably longer than the visions we have been working on but we can stop any time you wish; perhaps you will get sick of it in the long run but I would not know any other way of dealing with it. You know, these chapters of Zarathustra are sort of sermons in verse, but they have some analogy with the visions in as much as they are also evolutionary incidents. They form a string of experiences and events, manifestations of the unconscious, often a directly visionary character; and therefore it is probably recommendable to follow the same technique in the analysis which we have applied to the visions. There are certain chapters which consist of or start from visions, or are comments on visions or dreams Nietzsche had had, and other chapters are sermons spoken by Zarathustra.

Now Zarathustra is by no means a merely metaphorical or poetical figure invented by the author himself. He once wrote to his sister that Zarathustra had already appeared to him in a dream when he was a boy.<sup>2</sup> Then I found an allusion to the peculiar fact that Nietzsche as a young man studied in Leipzig, where there is a funny kind of Persian sect, the so-called Mazdaznan sect, and their prophet is a man who calls himself El Ha-nisch. But that man is said to be a German from the blessed land of Saxony named Haenisch, a well-known Saxon name; as a matter of fact, the professor of Oriental languages here told me that when he was studying Persian in Leipzig, this man was in the same seminar.<sup>3</sup> He is certainly not the originator of that Mazdaznan sect; it is of older origin. They took over certain Persian ideas from the Zend-Avesta, particularly the hygienic rules which they applied in a more or less mechanical way, accompanied by metaphysical teaching also taken from the Zend-Avesta, which, as you know, is a collection of the sacred books of the Zoroastrian belief. It has been assumed that Nietzsche became acquainted with certain members of that sect and thus got some notion about Zarathustra or the Zoroastrian traditions. Personally, however, I don't believe this; he would never have gotten a very high idea of Zarathustra through their representations. Nietzsche was a well-read man, in many ways very learned, so it is quite probable or even certain, that he must have made some special studies along the line of the Zend-Avesta, a great part of which was already translated in his days. There is now a good German translation, and an English one in the series of The Sacred Books of the East. It consists of books of very different periods, the earliest of which, the Yasna, includes the so-called Gāthās, sermons in verse.<sup>4</sup> These are called the verse sermons of Zarathustra and are written in a special dialect of old Iranian; as they are very archaic, the oldest of all, it is assumed that they really go back to the time of Zarathustra. And these would form the model for the verse sermons of Nietzsche's Zarathustra.

We must go a little into the history of that Zoroastrian belief because it plays a certain role in the symbolism of the book. Zarathustra is almost a legendary figure, yet there are certain notions about him which prove that he must have been a real person who lived in a remote age.

It is not possible to place him exactly either geographically or chronologically, but he must have lived between the seventh and ninth centuries B.C. probably in north-western Persia. He taught chiefly at the court of a king or prince named Vishtaspa. (The Greek form of this name is Hystaspes, which you may remember was the name of the father of Darius I.) The story says that Zarathustra first became acquainted with the two ministers at the Court of Vishtaspa, and through them with the noble queen whom he converted, and then through her he converted the king. This is psychologically a very ordinary proceeding, it usually happens that way. One of the most successful propagandists of early Christianity in high circles was the Pope Damasus I, whose nickname was matronarum auriscalpius, meaning the one who tickles the ears of the noble ladies; he used to convert the nobility of Rome through the ladies of the noble families.<sup>5</sup> So this is probably a historic detail in the life of Zarathustra. Then in contradistinction to certain other founders of religions, he married and lived to be quite old. He was killed by soldiers, while standing near his altar, on the occasion of the conquest of his city.

The Gāthās are probably authentic documents which date from Zarathustra's time and it is quite possible that they were his own doing. Practically nothing can be concluded from them as to historical detail, but that ancient teaching was remarkably intelligent for those days, and it was characterized by one particular feature which was, one could say, the clue for the fact that Nietzsche chose that figure. In fact, Nietzsche himself says that he chose Zarathustra because he was the inventor of the contrast of good and evil; his teaching was the cosmic struggle between the powers of light and darkness, and he it was who perpetuated this eternal conflict. And in the course of time Zarathustra had to come back again in order to mend that invention, in order to reconcile the good and evil which he separated in that remote age for the first time.<sup>6</sup> It is true that one would not be able to indicate any thinker earlier than Zarathustra who stressed the contrast between good and evil as a main principle. The whole Zoroastrian religion is based upon this conflict.

The dogmatic teaching is that in the beginning there was one all-wise and all-powerful god called Mazda (which means simply the wise one, something like Laotze) with the attribute of Ahura. Ahura is the Iranian version of the Sanskrit word Asura, which is the name of the spiritual god in the oldest parts of the Rigveda. You know the Rigveda is a collection of poems or hymns, part of the sacred literature of the Hindus, which goes back to an extremely remote age, perhaps to the time of the primitive Aryan invaders of India. One of the oldest parts contains the so-called frog songs of the priests and they are supposed to date back to five thousand B.C. though I don't know whether that estimate is correct.<sup>7</sup> In those old frog songs, as I have told you, the priests in their rain charms identified themselves with the frogs; when there was a drought the priests sang the frog songs as if it had rained. They imitated the frogs as they sing after the rain, because they feel well then in their ponds, but when there is no water there is nothing to sing about—as primitives also, in order to produce rain, imitate the fall of rain-drops, or they sprinkle blood or milk, or they whistle, imitating the sound of the wind that brings clouds. This Asura is the highest god and he is different from the concept of the deva. (Deva or devs, the plural, is the root word from which, for instance, Zeus is derived, and Deus, and Ziu, and from that our word Tuesday.)<sup>8</sup> The devs are the shining gods of the day, of the clear blue sky, of things visible in the daylight, while Asura is a god within, a god of chiefly spiritual and moral character. Now in the later development—in the later parts of the Rigveda—Asura disintegrated into a multitude of asuras, and they are demons of a definitely evil nature. And you find the same thing happening with the devs in Persia. The Zoroastrians had that concept of Asura, the highest god, that very ancient idea of the Rigveda, and they chose the name in the Persian form, Ahura, as an attribute for Mazda, so their god was called Ahura Mazda.

<sup>6</sup> Nietzsche said "Zarathustra was the first to see in the struggle between good and evil the essential wheel in the working of things . . . Zarathustra created the most portentous error, morality. Consequently he should also be the first to perceive that error" (Elizabeth Förster-Nietzsche's Introduction, N/Works, p. 26).

Ahura Mazda, the greatest god, the wise man, is generally supposed to be Zarathustra's creation, and he came to that formulation probably through inner experiences of which his story tells. These experiences are called in the old literature, "Meetings and Questionings"; that is, he met Ahura Mazda, or his spoken word called Vohu Manō, meaning the good attitude. The German word for Vohu Manō would be: die gute Gesinnung, the good attitude, a good intention, a good word, the right word. We could easily translate it, with no particular philosophical difficulty, by the Christian concept of the Logos; the spoken word represents God in the incarnated form, the Logos as incarnated in Christ would be the exact counterpart of Vohu Manō. One finds the same concept in Islam in the mystical Sufi sect, where Allah, because he is unnameable, ineffable, and therefore formless, appears in tangible form in Chidr, the green one, who is called "the first angel of Allah," "the Word," "the Face of Allah." "The Angel of the Face" is a similar conception in the Old Testament, a sort of tangible representation of an absolutely intangible and indefinable deity.<sup>9</sup> So Ahura Mazda, or Vohu Manō, became experiences to Zarathustra, the so-called Meetings and Questionings. He had, I think, seven Meetings with the good spirit of the god Ahura Mazda. (There is also a bad spirit of which we shall talk presently.) He received the revelation, he was taught the truth by that spirit. I mention that now because it is a parallel to Nietzsche's Zarathustra.

The name Zarathustra in Persian is written Zarathushtra; ushtra is typically Persian and it means camel. There is a family story about him and all the names in his family have to do with mares and stallions, horses and cattle, camels, etc., showing that they are quite native and that he belonged to a sort of cattle people. Also his idea of a perfect reward in heaven was exceedingly archaic. He himself hoped that after a life full of merit he would be rewarded in the land of the hereafter by the good gift of one stallion and twelve mares, as well as by the possession of a perfectly youthful and beautiful body. One finds very similar ideas in Islam still. The Greek version of the name Zarathustra is Zoroaster. But the Greeks knew practically nothing of his teaching; to them he was a great sorcerer and astrologer; anything that went under Zoroaster's name was magic and black arts.

Now, besides the manifestation of god in the spoken word or in the good intention of the Vohu Manō, there is the corresponding dark manifestation, the evil spirit, Angrō Mainyush. (He was later called Ahriman, and Ahura Mazda was called Ormazd.) These two spirits, Vohu Manō and Angrō Mainyush, were together in the original Ahura Mazda, showing that in the beginning there was no separation of good and evil. But after a while they began to quarrel with each other, and a fight ensued, and then the creation of the world became necessary. So Ahura Mazda created the world, but he was so upset by it that for six thousand years he did not know what to do, and then Angrō Mainyush broke into his creation and spoiled the whole show. And since then there is hell to pay, because all the light got lost in that darkness, and the hosts of devils he brought into this world are now to be combatted. For he had one great success right in the beginning: he succeeded in converting the devs to his convictions and so they became devils (devils comes from devs of course), just as Ahura became ahuras, many devils. So the original beautiful gods of the day, the gods of the visible things, beauty and harmony, became evil and nocturnal demons and formed the main body of evil forces, just as the old Germanic gods became storm devils and all sorts of evil spirits when they were dethroned by Christianity. So there was a perpetual fight between Vohu Manō and the hosts of evil led by Angrō Mainyush.

What Ahura Mazda is doing in the end is not quite visible or understandable; he is of course supposed to be on the side of the good—he is with his good spirit, but whether he is with his bad spirit too is not clear. It is the same awkward situation that we have in Christianity, where we are also not quite sure what the relationship is between God and the devil. Is it a co-dominion with God?—or what is it? That Christian awkwardness is an old inheritance from Persia—I could tell you several other things which would substantiate that idea—and therefore the theologians don't like Zarathustra and criticize him. But he is really the founder of the Christian dogma; all the oblique and contrary things in the Christian dogma can be found in the Persian religion as well. The only thing the theologians can say about it is that Christianity is a much higher religion. They point out with great satisfaction that the Persian religion is only a religion of rewards, that people are good only in order to be rewarded in heaven, and the founder himself expected a stallion and twelve mares—"and you see how low that is!" But I don't agree with that entirely; that little difference was in the time of Homer and Greek mythology—not to speak of the Germanic traditions—when the slaughtering of children and eating of human flesh still took place. Those were highly primitive times, so no wonder that Zarathustra had somewhat concretized expectations. Otherwise his teaching was remarkably wise and advanced. He was the main opponent of magic, for example; he tried to uproot magic wherever he met it, and the temples and the priests also had to go by the board. They had no real priests in the beginning, it was like the beginning of Christianity. But soon the same process appeared as it did later on in Christianity—the influx of primitive magic and primitive heathenish ideas—and the beautiful monotheism of Ahura Mazda was split up into a multitude of gods, like the splitting up of God into the Trinity and then into the many saints and so on. Ahura Mazda had qualities naturally: he was the truth, he was wisdom, he was justice, etc., and those qualities became personified as the so-called amesha spentas which are immortal spirits. One was truth, another justice, and so on—abstract qualities like the so-called attributes of God in the Christian dogma. These amesha spentas became gods too, and the whole spiritual attitude of the early Zoroastrian teaching changed and became a tremendously specialized ritualism.

The original teaching of Zarathustra, however, was characterized by a real spiritual piety. It was the Gesinnung, the moral attitude, that counted, more than the external works. His teaching was that as you commit sin outside in reality, so you can commit sin inside as a sin of conscience, and it is the same thing, just as bad. And think of the eighth or ninth century B.C. which was the niveau of such religious teaching! It is an amazingly high level, and this extraordinary moral discrimination points to a most unusual genius.

Now this was the model for Nietzsche's Zarathustra. It had nothing to do with the Mazdaznan sect. I think it is rather, as he says, that that figure was an experience of old standing; it was the early experience of the old wise man. You know, we often speak of that figure as a personification of the inherited wisdom of the ages, the truth that has become instinctive through experience, one could say, having been lived millions of times, a sort of wisdom of nature that is born in us and to which we owe the coordination of our whole biological as well as psychological system—that old experience which is still visible in our dreams and in our instincts. This is the mental or spiritual aspect of a perfectly natural fact, namely, the teleology of a living system. So Nietzsche chose a most dignified and worthy model for his old wise man, because to him it was that same kind of experience.

You know, Nietzsche in the first part of his life was a great and very intuitive intellectual, chiefly rebellious and critical of traditional values, and you still find that in Zarathustra. There was then little of what one would call positive in him; he could criticize with remarkable readiness, but he was not yet synthetic or constructive, and he could not produce values. Then suddenly, like an extraordinary revelation, all which his former writings omitted came upon him. He was born in 1844, and he began to write Zarathustra in 1883, so he was then thirty-nine years old. The way in which he wrote it is most remarkable. He himself made a verse about it. He said: "Da wurde eins zu zwei und Zarathustra ging an mir vorbei," which means: "Then one became two and Zarathustra passed by me,"<sup>10</sup> meaning that Zarathustra then became manifest as a second personality in himself. That would show that he had himself a pretty clear notion that he was not identical with Zarathustra. But how could he help assuming such an identity in those days when there was no psychology? Nobody would then have dared to take the idea of a personification seriously, or even of an independent autonomous spiritual agency. Eighteen eighty-three was the time of the blooming of materialistic philosophy. So he had to identify with Zarathustra in spite of the fact that he felt, as this verse proves, a definite difference between himself and the old wise man.<sup>11</sup> Then his idea that Zarathustra had to come back to mend the faults of his former invention, is psychologically most characteristic; it shows that he had an absolutely historical feeling about it. He obviously felt quite clearly that the experience of that figure was archetypal. It brought something of the breath of centuries with it, and it filled him with a peculiar sense of destiny: he felt that he was called to mend a damage done in the remote past of mankind.

Of course such a feeling is most uplifting to an individual; no wonder then that Zarathustra was the Dionysian experience par excellence. In the latter part, that Dionysian ekstasis comes in. Zarathustra really led him up to a full realization of the mysteries of the cult of Dionysos: he had already ideas about it, but Zarathustra was the experience which made the whole thing real. In one of his letters to his sister he gives a most impressive description of the ekstasis in which he wrote Zarathus-

Sils-Maria

I sat there waiting, waiting—not for anything,
Beyond good and evil, enjoying soon the light,
Soon the shade, now only play, now
The lake, now the noon, wholly time without end.
Then suddenly, friend, one became two—
And Zarathustra passed by me.

Nietzsche loved the Swiss Alpine town Sils-Maria, where he wrote Part II of Zarathustra. Jung will return to those last two lines repeatedly as expressive of Nietzsche's moment of objectifying, for his creative purposes, what had been an internal unity.

tra.<sup>12</sup> There are four parts in the book, and each of the first three parts was written within ten days, which is rather remarkable. The first was written on the Riviera, the second in the Sils Maria in the Engadine, and the third again on the Riviera; the fourth was written in different places and took longer. He says about his way of writing that it simply poured out of him, it was an almost autonomous production; with unfailing certainty the words presented themselves, and the whole description gives us the impression of the quite extraordinary condition in which he must have been, a condition of possession where he himself practically no longer existed. It was as if he were possessed by a creative genius that took his brain and produced this work out of absolute necessity and in a most inevitable way.

We will now begin the first chapter, the introductory discourse of the Superman, the last man:

When Zarathustra was thirty years old, he left his home, and went into the mountains. There he enjoyed his spirit and his solitude, and for ten years did not weary of it. But at last his heart changed,—and rising one morning with the rosy dawn, he went before the sun, and spake thus unto it:

Thou great star! What would be thy happiness if thou hadst not those for whom thou shinest!

For ten years hast thou climbed hither unto my cave: thou wouldst have wearied of thy light and of the journey, had it not been for me, mine eagle, and my serpent.

But we awaited thee every morning, took from thee thine overflow, and blessed thee for it.

Lo! I am weary of my wisdom, like the bee that hath gathered too much honey; I need hands outstretched to take it.

I would fain bestow and distribute, until the wise have once more become joyous in their folly, and the poor happy in their riches.

We must first try to construct the psychological situation. As I said, I am going to handle these chapters or experiences like the visions. Here the story of Zarathustra begins. The man who speaks or writes is Nietzsche; it is as if he were the historian of Zarathustra, describing what he had been doing. Zarathustra is obviously objectified here, the writer does not seem to be identical with him. Now, he is said to be thirty years old when he left his home. To what fact do those thirty years refer? As far as I know, there is no definite chronology in Zarathustra's life except the age when he died, seventy-seven years.

Mr. Allemann: It refers to the age of Christ.

Dr. Jung: Yes, the legendary age of Christ when he began his teaching career; that at once creates an identity between Zarathustra and the Christ. This is an identity which is commonly granted historically: namely, it is in the Zoroastrian teaching that every thousand years—which simply means an indefinite world period, about half of a month of the great platonic year—a Saoshyant appears (that is a reaper, a savior), who teaches people a new revelation, a new truth, or renews old truths, a mediator between god and man. This is most definitely an idea which went over into the Christian teaching where it took on a somewhat different form: in Christianity the idea of the enantiodromia came in.<sup>13</sup> After the teaching of Christ has had its effect, then Satan is given a chance, as you learn from the Book of Revelation, “for two times and a half time”—also an indefinite period in which he is allowed to enjoy himself apparently, working all sorts of evil.<sup>14</sup> This is one of the origins of the legend of the Antichrist, which is proved to have already existed in the first century. In practically the same circumstances under which Christ was born, his dark brother, the Antichrist, would be born, and he would work very much the same miracles but in order to seduce mankind. He would be a sort of negative Saoshyant, appearing when the positive reign of Christ was coming to an end. According to the Persian reckoning, the reign of the Antichrist would begin after a month of the great platonic year, about A.D. 1100 or 1200.<sup>15</sup> As a matter of fact at about that time there was a great commotion in the Christian world, because they supposed that the end of the world was coming in the year 1000—according to that old idea that after a thousand years a new revelation would take place, or something would happen to the world. But apparently nothing happened. It is true, however, that in those times the power of the church reached its apex and the worldly powers were practically subdued. Then soon after, they began to rise again and the church was on its decline; and that continued, its worst blow being at about the beginning of the sixteenth century, when the schism within the church occurred: Protestantism.

<sup>15</sup> Jung notes elsewhere that the Platonic year has been variously reckoned: for instance, 36,000 years in the time of Origen and 24,120 years by Tycho Brahe (CW 9 ii, par. 136n).

Now this idea of the Saoshyant of course also entered the mind of Nietzsche: his Zarathustra is a Saoshyant who comes after the thousand years are once more fulfilled—of course not quite, but à peu près. It was only 1883, unfortunately, but the heavenly powers are sometimes irregular—perhaps the clock doesn't work regularly in heaven, one doesn't know exactly—so the Saoshyant came a bit earlier, a reincarnation in the form of Zarathustra. And he enters upon his career very much in the way of the former Saoshyants, Christ or the Antichrist. One knows of course from the writings of Nietzsche—even if one only knows the titles of his works—that he had the idea of an Antichrist very much in mind. He makes of course a great story about his anti-Christianity, and takes himself as being an Antichrist incarnate—by no means as a merely destructive devilish brother of Christ, however, but as a new Saoshyant. He will destroy the former values sure enough, but for something better and more ideal, for a morality much higher than the Christian morality. He feels himself therefore as a positive Saoshyant, in spite of the fact that he accepts the title of “immoralist” and “Antichrist.” In India also there is the idea of the savior or reaper that appears every thousand years, in the series of the incarnated bodhisattvas; for instance, the bodhisattva of the past world, Buddha Amitabha, and Buddha Sakya Muni of the real actual world, and Buddha Maitraya of the coming worlds; and there are many others because there have been many other worlds. Buddha Amitabha is one of the most important ones. Particularly worshipped in Japan, he is the Buddha of clarity, of truth; and Maitraya, who is still to come, is the Buddha of perfect love.<sup>16</sup> It is the same idea of periodicity. And this is based upon such experiences as Nietzsche's of the archetypal figure of the wise old man: that is, an exceedingly historical figure which brings with it the flavor of past centuries, a feeling of the actual presence of remote times, as if time were at a complete standstill, and 5000 B.C. were just in the next room to A.D. 2000. I am quite certain, from what Nietzsche says about Zarathustra, that he experienced him as an identity within himself that had existed many thousands of years before him, that always had been. When that figure appears, he simply emerges from a background which is always there; he is called out through the need of the time, the emergencies of the actual epoch. That Zarathustra is said to be thirty years old, then, discloses a certain analogy with Christ.

Then we have here a hint as to the place where he lived, "he left the lake of his home." Why should such a little thing be mentioned? It is a most insignificant detail, but if you apply the rules of dream interpretation to this symbol, it is psychologically quite charming. What would be the lake of one's home, and where is one going when one leaves this lake?

Miss Hannah: Could not the lake of his home be the personal unconscious which he is leaving for the collective unconscious?<sup>17</sup>

Dr. Jung: Quite so. The lake is limited and confined in contradistinction to the sea which is supposed to be unlimited. The sea, therefore, is always a symbol of the collective unconscious which has no boundary anywhere, while the lake is like being locked into terra firma which always symbolizes consciousness. It would be that amount of unconsciousness which is locked in by consciousness, a perfectly controllable piece of unconsciousness. So the lake of one's home is the personal familiar unconscious, that part which links one up with father and mother and brothers and aunts, ancestral conditions, and so on; it is a nice, well-known place with its history that forms the beginning of one's life. Then Zarathustra went up into the mountains. What about that?

Mrs. Crowley: For contemplation.

Dr. Jung: Yes, but you can contemplate near a lake very well. In Tibet the ordinary requirements for a sage are a hill on one side and on the other a lake, inter collem et aquam.

Dr. Bahadurji: He wants to be on a higher level, beyond general humanity.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is of course an analogy to the rishis, the legendary sages who lived on the heights of the Himalaya mountains in Tibet;<sup>18</sup> those fellows also lived in a desolate, rather dreary place between the water, preferably a lake or a river, and the mountain side, high up above the ordinary people. That feeling played a great role in

Nietzsche's case. When he was up at Sils Maria which is nearly six thousand feet above sea level, he used to speak of being six thousand feet above good and evil—above ordinary humanity, that is. Therefore, he felt so particularly well in the Engadine—it is a very high floor. So it means here that he leaves the controlled ordinary home conditions, the familiar psychology, and lifts himself up to a particularly high level where he enlarges his horizon, as sages go into such places for the sake of enlarging their consciousness and their horizon, to detach themselves from the chaos of events in order to see more clearly. Therefore the saying of Laotze: The one who detaches and sees from afar sees clearly.<sup>19</sup> And there he possessed his spirit in solitude and for ten years did not weary of it. Here is another detail, ten years.

Mr. Allemann: Thirty plus ten makes about the age of Nietzsche when he wrote.

Dr. Jung: Yes, he was thirty when he left and forty when he had accomplished the accumulation of wisdom. Then there is a detail in the history of his life which you would not know, that for the first ten years he had no pupils and was worried about it—and even then he had only one, a young cousin of his. Only very much later did he succeed in converting people to his wisdom. These ten years might easily have to do with that fact, though I am not sure. But there is also the psychological fact that it just makes up the age at which he began to write Zarathustra, the moment when he left his mountains.<sup>20</sup> It describes here how he is coming to give his message to mankind, his heart having at last changed. And then comes the invocation to the sun. Now how would you understand his invocation? It is the first event, the first experience or adventure. This is not so simple as our visions; there we have a certain code, but here it is uncharted waters.

Mrs. Fierz: If to be high on the mountain would be higher than common human consciousness, the sun would be the symbol of a more than human consciousness, which he has looked at for so many years and to which he now speaks. That is, he would be in a way more than humanly conscious, and greeting the sun would be feeling or realizing it.

<sup>19</sup> I Ching (probably 4th century B.C.) teaches that to achieve the Tao it is necessary to detach oneself from the tension of opposites (enantiodynamia) to gain the distance from conflict and desire. See CW 6, pars. 358-70, and The Way and Its Power, ed. and tr. Arthur Waley (New York, 1958), p. 141 and passim.

Dr. Jung: You would understand this symbol of the sun as an objectification of his own superhuman consciousness, which he has acquired through his life on that high level? Yes, the sun surely is the symbol of the center of consciousness, it is the principle of consciousness because it is light. When you understand a thing, you say: "I see"—and in order to see you need light. The essence of understanding, of cognition, has always been symbolized by the all-seeing of the sun, the wisdom or omniscience of the sun that moves over the earth and sees everything in its light. So it would be quite possible that he speaks here to his personified consciousness. This is a somewhat unusual performance, but if you try to put yourself into the mood of a man who is always alone, as Nietzsche was, you realize that your own consciousness then begins to stare into your own face. You are always your own speaker and your own listener; you are always looking into your own light, into your own eyes. And then you can well personify consciousness as your daily partner, the daily occurrence; you can even curse your consciousness as your only fellow being.

Now, Nietzsche in those years after 1879, when he had given up his academic occupation in Basel, was restlessly wandering about, living in little hotels and pensions, sometimes on the French or Italian Riviera, and in the summer in the Engadine, supported by certain wealthy friends because he had no means of his own.<sup>21</sup> And always alone, he could not stand people. He was desirous of having friends, always seeking a friend, but when such a poor fellow turned up, he was never good enough and Nietzsche got impatient right away. I know people who knew Nietzsche personally, because he lived in my own town, Basel, so I heard many details of this kind. For instance, in one of his lectures he was talking about Greece and Graecia Magna in most enthusiastic terms, and after the lecture a young man who had not understood something he had said—for those ordinary students were of course not quite able to follow Nietzsche's tremendous mind—went up to the professor to ask him about it. But before he could put in his very humble request, Nietzsche said: "Ah now, you are the man! That blue sky of Hellas! We are going together!" And the young man thought: "How can I go with this famous professor and how have I the money to do it?"—and he receded further and further, Nietzsche going at him and talking of the eternal smile of the skies of Hellas and <sup>21</sup> Nietzsche began to teach at the University of Basel in 1869 at the age of 24 and retired, from ill health, in 1879. In his subsequent wanderings he returned to Basel from time to time. He did have a pension from the university.

God knows what, till the young man backed up against the wall. Then suddenly Nietzsche realized that the fellow was frightened by his enthusiasm, and he turned away abruptly and never spoke to him again. That is the way he dealt with friends, he was absolutely unable to adapt to people, and when they did not understand him right on the moment, he had no patience whatever. He was also exceedingly impatient with himself. He was terribly, recklessly impulsive. He liked to be invited to certain social gatherings, but if there was a piano, he played madly; he went at it till his finger nails bled. That is no exaggeration, it is a fact. On his other side, he was quite funny. In Basel it appealed to his fantasy to appear in society as an elegant Englishman. In those days Englishmen were considered the summit of everything marvelous, and they then used to wear grey gloves and grey top hats; so Nietzsche went about in a grey redingote, a grey top hat, and grey gloves, and thought he looked like an Englishman. And with that moustache! We must know about these contrasts in order to understand the language of Zarathustra.

We may suppose, then, that this sun he is talking to is really the great light that he received and talked to every day, which is of course the great clarity of his lonely consciousness. And on account of this fact, that the sun is his consciousness, he can say to it: "What would you do without me? I still exist even over against such a consciousness." For when you are all alone with yourself, such a consciousness becomes so overwhelming a fact that finally you forget who you are out of sheer consciousness. Therefore, people who are pathologically conscious of themselves annihilate their own existence, they try not to be; they are always standing in their own light, because they are overwhelmed in their own consciousness. So he is here more than satisfied, he even gets sick of being only conscious and says: "What would you be if I were not with you, I with my animals, my eagle and my serpent?" Now what does that mean? What is he putting opposite the sun of consciousness?

Mrs. Bailward: The instincts.

Dr. Jung: Yes, animals mean instincts, but what would the eagle be?—and the serpent?

Mrs. Schlegel: The eagle would be intuition, and the serpent would be the chthonic powers.

Dr. Jung: What do you mean by the chthonic powers?

Mr. Allemann: The nature spirit, chthonic wisdom.

Dr. Jung: One could say spirit, but we must know what chthonic means. Read Keyserling's new book, La Révolution Mondiale, where he speaks of the révolte des forces telluriques.<sup>22</sup> That is chthonic. But what is it psychologically?

Miss Hannah: If the eagle is intuition, I suppose it is a sensation.<sup>23</sup>

Dr. Jung: That is true; it can also be taken in a very general way as an air being. So the eagle would be the spirit and the serpent would be the body, because the serpent is the age-old representative of the lower worlds, of the belly with its contents and the intestines, for instance. It is the peristaltic movement, it is the personification of the sympathetic system, as it were. Therefore, it is always the personification of whatever comes from the body, sexuality and every vital physical function; also all the facts of reality, that things cost money or that your room is overheated, that your bed is hard, that your clothes are expensive, that you have not received a certain fee: all these things are chthonic. And our relations to all sorts of people who annoy us or whom we enjoy is chthonic, everything that is on the surface of this earth and so banal that one hardly dares to speak of it. On the other hand, the eagle soars high, it is near the sun. It is a son of the sun—marvelous. The bird of light, it is the very high thought, the great enthusiasm. For instance, when Ganymede, the messenger of Zeus, is lifted up by the eagle to Olympian heights, it is the genius and enthusiasm of youth that seize him and carry him up to the heights of the gods. So one could say it was a spiritual, uplifting power. You know, the eagle is said to come down and carry away sheep or even little children; we have such awful tales in Switzerland. That is what the spirit can do—spiritual excitement, spiritual enthusiasm; suddenly, after having hovered over a crowd for a while, the spirit picks somebody out and lifts him on high. And the serpent would be la force terrestre. Now what does it mean that, when confronted by his consciousness, of which he is wearying, these two symbolic animals appear at his side? You remember they are often with him in the book.

Mr. Nuthall-Smith: He is not aware of being controlled by the chthonic and spiritual forces; he is unconscious of their existence in himself.

<sup>22</sup> Count Hermann Alexander Keyserling (1880-1934) was a world traveler and essayist. His La Revolution Mondiale et la Responsabilité de l'Esprit was published in Paris in 1934. In his review Jung made fun of Keyserling's proposal to establish cultural monasteries, but still found this a good book (CW 10, pars. 935-45). See both volumes of Letters for Jung's correspondence with Keyserling.

<sup>23</sup> For Jung, intuition is that psychic function through which one has a sense, mediated through the unconscious, of possibilities. Sensation is its opposite. See below, 10 Oct. 1934, n. 3, on the four basic functions.

Dr. Jung: Well, they would here be sort of helpful powers. You see, they always play a very helpful role and later on we shall come across a passage where the eagle and the serpent are intertwined, meaning a reconciliation of opposites. When you are accompanied by an animal in a dream, what does it mean? That happens very frequently.

Mr. Allemann: It means that your instincts are with you.

Dr. Jung: Yes, and that is by no means always the case, you know; very often we go against the instincts or are in an oblique position toward them. So when the text says that Zarathustra is with his serpent and his eagle, it means, as in dreams, that he is going parallel with his instincts; he is right, looked at from a spiritual as well as a chthonic point of view. In this case, he is right in what he is actually doing, telling his consciousness that he is getting tired of it; he ought to detach from too much consciousness. You see, that would be the condition of a man who has lived in and through consciousness only, without paying attention to his instincts. Or we would say he was thinking consciously only, living by his conscious wits, without realizing the existence of an unconscious, here represented by an eagle and a serpent. So he is on the side of the unconscious when he can say to his consciousness: I think we had now better part. Then he will follow his unconscious. And if somebody gets sick of his consciousness and chooses another way, what kind of symbolism inevitably follows? What is the next move?

Dr. Reichstein: The moon.

Mr. Nuthall-Smith: The going down.

Dr. Jung: Yes, the going down, the setting, when you say goodbye to the sun, naturally the sun sets or you set or both set; it is a going down into the dark night. The moon is all right, you see. So the work of Zarathustra begins with the idea of his setting like the sun, der Untergang Zarathustras. Then he necessarily comes down into what?

Mr. Allemann: Into the world of ordinary humanity, of collectivity.

Dr. Jung: Well, it is quite certain that when he leaves the sun of consciousness, he will come to some form of the unconscious. The question is now, of course, will the unconscious then be projected, or will it be in forma pura? If in its pure form it will not be projected, he will then enter the unconscious. That would be the night sea journey.<sup>24</sup> So as you say, it is the descent into the ordinary world in which unconsciousness is the ruling factor, for consciousness in the ordinary world plays a very small part; it is chiefly instinctive. But we would not be able to say whether he would descend into the pure or the projected unconscious if it were not for the passage we have read as to his intention. He is going to human beings, to mankind. And there, the text says, he is going to teach the wise ones among men, and the poor ones. "Until the wise have once more become joyous in their folly, and the poor happy in their riches." So what would he teach?

Mrs. Crowley: The opposites.

Dr. Jung: Exactly. He is going to produce the enantiodromia, he is going to supply mankind with what is lacking, with that which they hate or fear or despise, with that which the wise ones have lost, their folly, and the poor their riches. In other words he is going to supply the compensation. Now I think we had better take that symbolism on the subjective level, and then it would mean that when Zarathustra, sick of his consciousness, comes down to the lower levels of general mankind, he will be the wise one that is compensated for his wisdom by folly. So we see that in this great light of the mountain he grew very wise and lost his folly—and very poor and lost all his riches.

LECTURE II

Dr. Jung:

We were speaking last time of Zarathustra as representing the archetypal figure of the old wise man, and I want to say a little more about archetypes in general. The old wise man is a typical figure and therefore we call it an archetype; one meets it in legends and folklore and in innumerable texts and works of art, which shows that it is a generally human idea. Now, such generally human ideas always have their representatives in the history of civilizations, they actually occur as real figures. In primitive societies one finds the wise man usually in the form of the medicine man, and the older he is the more he is worshipped or feared. He is usually an object of fear because it is assumed that he is gifted with witchcraft, magical powers—and that he often makes a very evil use of his uncanny faculties. This institution of the medicine man is worldwide; they existed, probably, in prehistoric times. On higher levels of civilization, the medicine man has undergone certain differentiations; on the one side he developed into the organized priesthood, and on the other into the strictly medical man, the doctor. There are still certain figures which embody this archetype in an almost perfect form: the pope, of course, is the wise old man par excellence—he is supposed to be infallible, which means that he is capable of deciding about the absolute truth. Then every archbishop or bishop is a repetition of that archetype, and innumerable doctor authorities are supposed to know everything and to say marvelous things, even to know all the ropes in black magic. So that archetype is still living.

Archetypes in general are images that represent typical situations of great vital and practical importance, which have repeated themselves in the course of history innumerable times.<sup>1</sup> When a primitive man is in trouble which he cannot settle for himself, he will apply to the wise old men who form the council of the elders; when he does not trust his own competence, the case is referred to them. Or a particularly ticklish case is referred to the medicine man because he is supposed to confer with the ghosts who give him advice and help beyond all possibilities of human power, and therefore one credits him with extraordinary capacities. So in any situation full of doubt and risk where the ordinary mind does not know what to do, the immediate reaction is to apply to the archetypal figure of the wise old man. That is because it is generally supposed that the people who have lived through a great number of years and experienced much of life are more competent than the young people. Having survived certain dangerous situations they must know how to deal with them, so one asks them what one should do under conditions which once experiences perhaps for the first time. An archetype comes into existence, then, because it is a customary or habitual way of dealing with critical situations; in any crisis in life, this archetype or another is constellated; it is a sort of typical mechanism, or a typical attitude, by which one settles typical problems.

Certain situations can conjure up certain constellations in us of which we were quite ignorant; they bring out reactions of which we did not know we were capable—we are astonished perhaps at the way we are able to deal with them. You often think, for instance, that in such and such a predicament you would get into a terrible panic and lose your head completely. Then it happens in reality and you do not lose your head, you are not even afraid, and you go through it something like a hero. Afterwards you more or less collapse, but in the moment of danger there is no bad reaction; you are quite cool and you are amazed at it. The reason is simply that in such a moment up comes a certain mechanism, an instinctive attitude, which is always there; it is as if you knew what to do, you do just the suitable thing perhaps. Perhaps not, also, but it is astonishing how often extraordinary situations bring out most suitable reactions from the people caught in them. This is always due to the fact that an archetype has been constellated which lifts you above yourself. It is then as if you were no longer just one, but as if you were many, a part of mankind one could say; as if that situation had occurred innumerable times already so that you reacted not as an ego of today, but like man in general who had survived these situations before.

There are other archetypes which may produce panics or which warn you perhaps unnecessarily and cause trouble, the archetype of the passage of the ford or the pass, for instance. You know, it is the common experience when travelling in primitive countries to be careful, before striking camp in the evening, that the river is at your back, that you have crossed the river, for a thunderstorm may come up overnight and the next day the river is so flooded that you cannot get across and you may have to wait for weeks; you may even starve to death if you are caught between two rivers. And not only is the river dangerous on account of inundations, but in fording or bridging it, you are almost sure to get into an awkward situation. Of course that fear makes no sense at all here any longer but then it was all-important. Quite unexpectedly, you come to a river forty or fifty yards wide, say; the banks are pretty steep, it is alive with crocodiles so there is no swimming; you have to carry all the loads across and you are in a devil of a fix. Perhaps you have to wander along the banks for hours and hours to find a ford where you can cross more or less safely. Or perhaps a tree has fallen or been cut down by the natives so that it fell across the river, and if the weather is fair you may be able to crawl across through an enormously thick tree, first through the roots and over the trunk and then through the branches, and you wonder how you can get all your loads across; and in rainy weather it is of course hellishly slippery. So without the slightest expectation, you find yourself in a position where you had better make your will. It is perfectly ridiculous: one was in an entirely comfortable situation before and then one finds oneself suddenly facing the risk of slipping off that tree. And nobody can hold you because there is no room, you have to get across as you can, and fifteen or twenty feet below are the crocodiles waiting for their breakfast.

Now that is an archetypal situation which has occurred innumerable times; if it is not just crocodiles, there are enemies waiting to catch you when perfectly helpless in the water. So fords, difficult passes, and such places are supposed to be haunted by dragons or serpents; there are monsters in the deep waters, enemies in the woods, behind rocks, and so on. Fording a river, then, is a typical situation expressing a sort of impasse, so just that archetype is formulated when one is in any dangerous predicament; and therefore many people become quite unnecessarily archetypally afraid: they are caught by a most unreasonable fear. One can say there is no danger—why the devil don't you go ahead?—but they are afraid to cross even a little brook. Or it can be more psychological, a fear of going through a certain risk in life which is really not dangerous, but they are as terrified as if they had to jump over a crocodile, simply because the archetype is constellated. The crocodile is then in themselves, and it is not helpful because it no longer suits the situation. Naturally, to ordinary, normal people such things would not happen, but if there is a low threshold of consciousness, where the unconscious can easily get across, these archetypal figures come up. Now, there are numbers of archetypal situations and the whole of them make up the world of mythology. Mythology is the text book of archetypes, of course not rationally elucidated and explained, but simply represented like a picture or a story book. But all archetypes were originally real situations.

We are here concerned with the archetypes of the old man. Whenever he appears, he also refers to a certain situation: there is some disorientation, a certain unconsciousness, people are in a sort of confusion and don't know what to do. Therefore these Saoshyants, these wise men or prophets, appear in times of trouble, when mankind is in a state of confusion, when an old orientation has been lost and a new one is needed. So in the continuation of this chapter we see that Zarathustra appears in the moment when something has happened which made his presence necessary, and Nietzsche calls that the death of God; when God dies, man needs a new orientation. In that moment the father of all prophets, the old wise man, ought to appear to give a new revelation, to give birth to a new truth. That is what Nietzsche meant Zarathustra to be. The whole book is an extraordinary experience of that phenomenon, a sort of enthusiastic experience surrounded by all the paraphernalia, one could say, of true revelation. It would be quite wrong to assume that Nietzsche invented such a particular artifice in order to make an impression, for the sake of aesthetic effect or anything like that; it was an event which overcame him—he was overcome by that archetypal situation.

Miss Wolff: Would it not be worthwhile to read that description of his inspiration?—he describes it so wonderfully.

Dr. Jung: Yes, he once wrote a letter to his sister in which he said: "You can have no idea of the vehemence of such composition." Then in Ecce Homo he describes how the archetype came upon him:

Has anyone at the end of the nineteenth century any distinct notion of what poets of a stronger age understood by the word inspiration? If not, I will describe it. If one had the smallest vestige of superstition in one, it would hardly be possible to set aside completely the idea that one is the mere incarnation, mouthpiece or medium of an almighty power. The idea of revelation in the sense that something becomes suddenly visible and audible with indescribable certainty and accuracy, which profoundly convulses and upsets one—describes simply the matter of fact. One hears—one does not seek; one takes—one does not ask who gives: a thought suddenly flashes up like lightning, it comes with necessity, unhesitatingly—I have never had any choice in the matter. There is an ecstasy such that the immense strain of it is sometimes relaxed by a flood of tears, along with which one's steps either rush or involuntarily lag, alternately. There is the feeling that one is completely out of hand, with the very distinct consciousness of an endless number of fine thrills and quiverings to the very toes;—there is a depth of happiness in which the painfulest and gloomiest do not operate as antitheses, but as conditioned, as demanded in the sense of necessary shades of colour in such an overflow of light. There is an instinct for rhythmic relations which embraces wide areas of forms (length, the need of a wide-embracing rhythm, is almost the measure of the force of an inspiration, a sort of counterpart to its pressure and tension). Everything happens quite involuntarily, as if in a tempestuous outburst of freedom, of absoluteness, of power and divinity. The involuntariness of the figures and similes is the most remarkable thing; one loses all perception of what constitutes the figure and what constitutes the simile; everything seems to present itself as the readiest, the correctest and the simplest means of expression. It actually seems, to use one of Zarathustra's own phrases, as if all things came unto one, and would fain be similes: "Here do all things come caressingly to thy talk and flatter thee, for they want to ride upon thy back. On every simile doest thou here ride to every truth. Here fly open unto thee all being's words and word-cabinets; here all being wanteth to become words, here all becoming wanteth to learn of thee how to talk." This is my experience of inspiration. I do not doubt but that one would have to go back thousands of years in order to find some one who could say to me: It is also mine!*

This is the way Nietzsche experienced the coming of Zarathustra, and it shows very clearly the symptomatology of the wise old man. Now we will go on with our text. We go as far as his intention to teach the wise their folly and the poor their riches. He continues:

Therefore must I descend into the deep: as thou doest in the evening, when thou goest behind the sea, and givest light also to the netherworld, thou exuberant star!

Like thee must I go down, as men say, to whom I shall descend.

* N/Complete, vol. 17, p. 101.

Bless me, then, thou tranquil eye, that canst behold even the greatest happiness without envy!

Bless the cup that is about to overflow, that the water may flow golden out of it, and carry everywhere the reflection of thy bliss!

Lo! This cup is again going to empty itself, and Zarathustra is again going to be a man.

Thus began Zarathustra's down-going.

He has been up in the mountains with the sun, which symbolizes the intense consciousness that always stared him in the face. And now he makes up his mind to go down like the sun that sets, which means that he was completely identified with his own consciousness, and now feels the need of leaving that condition and going down into the depths, into the underworld which to him is the world of man. How would you interpret that psychologically? What happens when he leaves his consciousness?

Dr. Reichstein: Some new thing would rise from the unconscious.

Dr. Jung: Well, when the ordinary human being leaves his world of consciousness, then naturally the unconscious begins to move, things that have been unconscious appear, as one sees in case of neurosis or psychosis, or in any other case where people intentionally give up their consciousness. That would be true of a normal consciousness, but this is a sort of super-normal concentrated consciousness, and we cannot expect the same thing to occur in such a case.

Remark: He comes to the normal state.

Dr. Jung: Yes, because he is already in the abnormal condition. We are so used to thinking that people in an abnormal condition are in the unconscious that we don't dream that they can be too conscious. But such a spasm of consciousness does exist.<sup>3</sup> In our days there are many people who suffer from a pathologically increased consciousness, and then they have to come down to the level of normal consciousness—not to a highly strung consciousness where everything spontaneous is suppressed.

Mrs. Crowley: Would it be first a very abstract consciousness?—and in coming down would it take an opposite, more human form?

Dr. Jung: Yes, it is a de-tension, a relaxation, a more human form; his consciousness was before characterized as sun-like and that is of course far too much, a sort of divine consciousness. Naturally it suggests meg-alomania, and you have in fact to reckon with these megalomaniac assumptions in Nietzsche. Six years later, in 1889, he was already ill with megalomania, on the basis of degeneration of the brain. Of course it is exceedingly difficult to say whether he was already influenced by the oncoming disease, but I think it is very improbable; there are very few things in the actual text of Zarathustra which could be hypothetically ascribed to that. This kind of megalomania is due to something else.

Miss Wolff: It is archetypal?

Dr. Jung: Yes, he is identical with the archetype. Of course he makes a difference between himself and Zarathustra; he says: "and Zarathustra passed by me," but he cannot help feeling gripped by that figure and he even is Zarathustra at times, and that is an inflation. You see, whenever one is caught in an archetype, one forgets oneself completely, one is in a heightened condition, just inflated; then one lives on and can see later that one has suffered from an inflation. Primitives know that. When a man has been in a great excitement, an uplifted condition—when a man who has been a successful warrior and killed other men for instance—he must go through a rîte de sortie in order to disidentify from the archetypal hero, the godlike figure he has become. Otherwise he works havoc, he goes on slaughtering his own tribe perhaps, or becomes so impertinent that he is insupportable. Therefore, in certain tribes the successful warrior is not received in triumph as we would treat him, but is sent to a lonely place where he is fed on raw vegetables for two months in order to thin him down, and then when he is quite meek he is allowed to come back. And not only the man who has been a hero is mana, but also his weapon; a sword that has killed contains the secret of killing and is a particular sword; it has worked the extraordinary deed and is mana. So when one is told that a king has been murdered by a certain sword or dagger, one looks at it with different eyes: it startles one's imagination because it is mana. Now, as I said, Nietzsche cannot help being partially identical with Zarathustra, because that was the time of the culmination of materialistic science and philosophy and nobody had an inkling of psychology, nobody had thought of the possibility of making a difference between oneself and something psychical.<sup>4</sup> Most of the people of that day would not have been able to conceive of such a thing. Even today, it would not enter the minds of many people, particularly the most educated ones, that they were not identical with their psyche. It needs extraordinarily good evidence and persuasion to convince them of the fact; they think that is all bunk. So Nietzsche would not be in a condition to make a difference between himself and Zarathustra; it was quite obvious to him that there was nothing outside him but other ladies and gentlemen. He surely was not identical with Zarathustra, and if anybody made a noise, well, it was he himself under the disguise of Zarathustra. And the language he puts into the mouth of Zarathustra—or which he allows him to pick out of himself—is of course inflated and therefore in many places much too big. Then, there is another reason why the language is so exaggerated. Do you know under what conditions that happens?—the condition in which you do things in a complicated way as if there were no simple way?

Mrs. Fierz: He was identified with his thinking, and when he writes, it is like an influx of a very inferior feeling, a sentimentality.

Dr. Jung: That is true, that is one thing. And why is that feeling flowing in?

Mrs. Fierz: He does not know about it.

Dr. Jung: Of course, but could it not be kept outside by mere instinct? Usually people make the most extraordinary fuss trying to keep their inferior function out of the way.

Miss Wolff: The archetype touches depths where he cannot differentiate between the functions.

Dr. Jung: Exactly. The archetype has absolutely no interest in differentiating the functions because it is the totality of all functions. Then what else might be the reason that the language is so terribly pregnant?

Remark: Anima inspirations?

Dr. Jung: Well, the anima would be the personification of the inferior function; the anima is chiefly fed by the inferior function, in this case inferior feeling, so the inferior function and the anima are one and the same under two aspects; one is the scientific formulation and the other is the phenomenological.<sup>5</sup> Of course it is a function, in whatever form it appears. But there is a further reason for this language.

Dr. Reichstein: It is quite natural that the archetype should speak in such a way; they all speak such heavy language.

Dr. Jung: That is true to a certain extent, of course, but in Nietzsche's <sup>5</sup> For Jung, the inferior function is always the "opposite" of the most developed function, the pairings being thinking/feeling and sensation/intuition. The "attitudes" are also opposed, so that for the introvert, extraversion is typically difficult and somewhat awkward, and vice versa. CW 6, passim.

case it is really an exaggeration; there must be certain reasons why it is so.

Mrs. Baumann: It is not a compensation for his inferiority?

Dr. Jung: That is an idea. Whenever one has an inflation, whenever one is identical with an archetype, one has as a human being feelings of inferiority which are not admitted, and then one uses particularly big language. For instance, I once had a case, a woman, an absolutely incurable lunatic in an asylum, who called her own language "technical words of power" and was always trying to make compounds of words that were all-powerful—as if, by combining a lot of words that expressed power or energy, like powerhouse, majesty, pope, king, church, bolshevism, etc., the compound would make a word of power. Lunatics make up these words in order to kill people with them; they take a whole mouthful and spit it out and hope people will be smashed by them, convinced and overcome. Of course it might be said that a great deal of our science consisted of such words of power; they use enormous Latin words and say things in such a complicated way that apparently no devil can understand them. But it is exceedingly simple when translated into simple words; there is no need to say it in such an awfully fat and clumsy way—that is merely to convince people. Of course one gets frightened and overcome if long Latin and Greek hybrids are screaming over you, and thinks, "Well, he must be everything and I am just nothing." That is usually done by people who are more or less insignificant and want to give themselves airs; they make a particularly big noise to express something which is not very likely. "Good wine needs no bush" is an old English saying, but people who produce insignificant stuff need big words in order to be heard at all.<sup>6</sup> So a certain feeling of inferiority and inefficiency, which was always present in Nietzsche, is back of that language, causing him to choose the big words in order to hit the goal. For to him the world was always exceedingly dull, nobody had ears or eyes or a feeling heart, so he had to knock at the doors with a sledgehammer. But when people locked the doors, he attacked them with such fearful words that they became frightened. His contemporary Jakob Burckhardt, the famous historian, grew quite afraid when he read Zarathustra—as I know from people in Basel who were acquainted with them both. It was uncanny to him; it was the language that overcame him.<sup>7</sup> He shut the door to Nietzsche because he was too troublesome, he made too big a noise. And one always has the impression in reading Zarathustra, that it does not really reach people. Nietzsche felt that too and therefore he increased the weight of it in order to make it sink in. If he would only wait, be a bit more patient, a bit less noisy, then it would sink in; certain passages in Zarathustra are of supreme beauty, but others are in very bad taste, and the effect of the whole is somewhat endangered by that style. Those are the main reasons for it then, but there is still another point which explains the extraordinary weight of Zarathustra.

Mrs. Adler: It is because the aspirations or intuitions are not quite real and therefore they need a particular emphasis, as it were, against Nietzsche, as if he were preaching to himself in the first place?

Dr. Jung: That is a very subtle point of view. It is surely a valid argument since there is plenty of evidence that what we would call "realization" had not taken place.

Mrs. Baynes: I don't understand what Mrs. Adler means by their not being quite real to him.

Dr. Jung: It would mean in this case, not quite realized. As a matter of fact when there is an inflation by an archetype, there is no realization: one cannot realize the thing by which one is inflated. First, the inflation must have come to an end, and then one may realize, not before. But there is still another point.

Dr. Reichstein: Perhaps it was because Nietzsche was against the whole world, and so he had to knock very hard.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is quite certain. Nietzsche was in a sort of fighting position against the whole contemporary world and it gave him a peculiar feeling of inefficiency that his words reached nowhere—no echo anywhere. That really was the case; nobody cared, his was the voice of one shouting in the wilderness, and so naturally he would increase his voice instead of lowering it. You see, when one is not understood one should as a rule lower one's voice, because when one really speaks loudly enough and is not heard, it is because people don't want to hear. One had better begin to mutter to oneself, then they get curious.

Miss Wolff: The biblical language may be partly intention and partly coming from the unconscious, because Nietzsche suppressed traditional Christianity.

<sup>7</sup> Jacob Burckhardt (1818-1897) befriended the young Nietzsche when he came to Basel and remained a correspondent after Nietzsche's departure. His The Civilization of the Renaissance in Italy (1880) brought him international fame.

Dr. Jung: That is also a very valid consideration, that his emphasis on this style is intentional.

Mrs. Zinno: Is it because there is no compensation from his feeling?—no figure like Salomé in the unconscious to carry his feeling?<sup>8</sup>

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is an important point. We already mentioned the fact that the anima is somewhere in the game, but the absence of the anima as an independent figure surely increases the weight of Zarathustra to a rather considerable degree. We have there a problem in itself, namely, the identity of Zarathustra with the anima, and most probably an identity of the author with the anima, so it is an extraordinary compound.

Mr. Allemann: When an archetype is constellated, it is always something old, historical; that might account for this old language.

Dr. Jung: But old language need not be so emphatic surely; there must be a power behind it that causes a tremendous emphasis and what Miss Wolff said would explain a part of it. One could say Nietzsche himself had another side which needed strong language, and all the sermons are chiefly spoken to himself. You must remember that he was the son of a parson and he had some inheritance presumably. I know what that means.

Miss Hannah: Is it not just the determination of a parson not to be answered back?

Dr. Jung: But that is not enough. On the one side, of course, one can assume a certain peculiar dull resistance of the powers which have been hitherto valid in Nietzsche himself—he needed strong language in order to overthrow that small fellow who was so overwhelmed by tradition. That would be Nietzsche's shadow, you see, of which there are evidences in certain letters to his "dear Lama," as he called his sister, being quite incapable of seeing that she had not a trace of understanding. Then you understand something about that little fellow who came from the Saxon village near Leipzig where his father was a parson. You see, that also suggested to his imagination that he was an Englishman, he needed some geographical compensation. But I want to know more about the force behind this language. A definite force, the most passionate emotion, betrays itself; there must be a great strength behind that broke through the veil of tradition.

Mrs. Jung: Could it not be that he had too little libido in his life?—all the libido was in the spirit and therefore it might cause the violent expression.

Dr. Jung: Yes, one might assume that, but nobody with that particular task could be expected to pay much attention to his personal life; that counts for something of course, but there must be a particular force behind this emphasis, and that should be seen clearly. The whole thing is overwrought, there is too much in it. I am quite certain that if you should find such a figure in one of your own dreams you would know what was happening.

Mrs. Fierz: The urge for individuation.

Dr. Jung: Exactly. The self is in it.<sup>9</sup> That is the reason why the old man develops such an extraordinary passion and temperament, like Zarathustra. You see, it is not the way of old wise men to be so temperamental; that comes from the fact that something exceedingly electrical is within him, and that is the self, which—inasmuch as it is not realized—is contained in an archetypal form. The self can be contained in the anima, for instance, and then it causes an anima possession and the effeminization of a man's general character, his philosophy, all his convictions, his conduct, etc. Or if it is contained in the archetype of the old man, he assumes the ways of the prophet, say. Or they can be all together in one thing and then the human being is completely devoured by the archetypal tangle. That is a case we have not yet seen—where a human individual is possessed by all the things he has not, chiefly the old man, the self, and the anima. And even the instincts, the eagle and the serpent, are also on the other side. One really must ask oneself now, where is Nietzsche himself? That is really a problem. It is just as he says: he feels himself to be a mere instrument, a suffering body into which these powers have descended. So an inflation is what the word denotes; the body is filled with gas and becomes too light and rises too high and then it needs a descent. Therefore, he is coming down into the world of ordinary people, to the former quasi-normal consciousness; in the end of this first chapter, it is said that Zarathustra wants to become just the ordinary man again.

Now we begin the next section:

Zarathustra went down the mountain alone, no one meeting him. When he entered the forest, however, there suddenly stood before him an old man, who had left his holy cot to seek roots. And thus spake the old man to Zarathustra:

<sup>9</sup> The self, for Jung, "expresses the unity of the personality as a whole" (CW 6, par. 789). This important idea will be extensively explicated below. So too, the archetypal "old wise man."

"No stranger to me is this wanderer: many years ago passed he by. Zarathustra he was called; but he hath altered.

Then thou carriedst thine ashes into the mountains: wilt thou now carry thy fire into the valleys? Fearest thou not the incendiary's doom?

Yea, I recognize Zarathustra. Pure is his eye, and no loathing lurketh about his mouth. Goeth he not along like a dancer?

Altered is Zarathustra; a child hath Zarathustra become; an awakened one is Zarathustra: what wilt thou do in the land of the sleepers?"

Well now, what about this old man? Who is he? Zarathustra himself is the old man and now he meets another one.

Mrs. Crowley: He suggests the old wise man of the earth, more of the unconscious.

Dr. Jung: But what kind of technique would you suggest to make out who this other old man is? We must find out, not by mere guessing, but by getting at the actual material.

Dr. Bahadurji: They know each other already, that is the old self left behind.

Dr. Jung: Yes, they know each other, they must be related, there is apparently a secret identity. But we don't know exactly what that other form is. Now what tangible method would you suggest to find out?

Mrs. Adler: One must find out his character from what he says and does.

Dr. Jung: Yes, we must see how this old man is functioning, what he says, how he behaves. But the main point I wanted to call attention to is that Zarathustra himself says: "This old saint in his wood has not yet heard that God is dead!" So you can easily conclude who that old wise man is.

Mrs. Fierz: In comparison to Zarathustra he would be Christ himself.

Dr. Jung: Well, it would be more the old Christian attitude, the wisdom of the Christian attitude. He is an anchorite, he represents the early Christian spirit that does not know yet that its God is dead, that he has come to an end. We will see whether this hypothesis fits. First of all, that he is an anchorite fits in with the early Christian ideals. Then he knows Zarathustra and says that many years ago he passed the same place but going in the opposite direction. To what would that refer?

Mrs. Crowley: Would it refer to the original Zarathustra when he received the spirit?

Dr. Jung: Yes, it simply means that the Christian spirit noticed Zaratthustra, it knew about him. As a matter of fact the greater part of the Christian dogma is Persian in origin, it comes from the Zoroastrian traditions. And what would it mean that Christianity watched Zarathustra carrying his ashes to the mountains? What are his ashes?

Mrs. Baumann: His death at that time.

Dr. Jung: Well, when a man consists of ashes he is a disembodied spirit, so Christianity only knows of Zarathustra as a being that has gone forever; he is dead, he has carried his ashes to the mountains. And now this same spirit recognizes Zarathustra coming back rejuvenated. So Christianity realizes that Zarathustra has returned and is going the opposite way, coming down from the mountains, meaning that he is being incarnated again, becoming modern again. Now that is Nietzsche's idea. He thought that Zarathustra had been the inventor of the great conflict between good and evil, and that he had influenced the whole mental evolution of the world by this most fundamental concept. And his idea was that he ought now to come back again in order to improve on his former invention; something should be done about the insupportable conflict between good and evil, because the old Christian point of view, represented by the old man in the wood, was no longer valid. That is evident from what fact?

Miss Hannah: That he has lost all contact with the world.

Dr. Jung: Yes, he is no longer in touch with the world. And that Christianity has left the world is exactly the reason why Zarathustra is born again; he must come back because the spirit he created and left behind him has evaporated. You see, that is a repetition of the very important psychological fact that when Christ died he left behind him, or promised, according to the dogma, the paraclete, the comforter, which is the spirit, like the descent of the Holy Ghost at Pentecost; that is the aftermath of the Christian revelation, the spirit left by the appearance of Christ on earth. His appearance was like a bursting shell that leaves the spirit trailing after; it remains for a while and then slowly recedes into the background again. So we could call this old man the paraclete; he is the remaining spirit of Christianity and is about to recede into nature. We shall see now how that is done. He says to Zarathustra:

"Go not to men, but stay in the forest! Go rather to the animals! Why not be like me—a bear amongst bears, a bird amongst birds?"

"And what doeth the saint in the forest?" asked Zarathustra.

The saint answered: "I make hymns and sing them; and in making hymns I laugh and weep and mumble: thus do I praise God."

But this is not correctly translated. He “brummt” and that is like the sound a bear makes. You see, he imitates animals’ voices, it is a regressive phenomenon. Christianity and the Christian ritual developed in a time when it was still the custom in contemporary pagan cults to imitate animals’ voices. We know from the old Apologists, those Christian propagandists who fought against the pagan beliefs and the heathenish philosophers and orators—and also from pagan sources—that in the mystery cults round Mithras and Bakcheus and such pagan syncretistic gods,<sup>10</sup> they imitated on certain occasions the voices of the symbolic animals they represented, roaring like lions or bulls, for instance. A certain class of followers of Mithras was called aetoi,<sup>11</sup> others were called the leontes, lions, and the followers of Artemis were called arktoi, bears. Others were sort of angels called the heliodromoi, or sun-runners. And they are represented on certain old monuments as wearing animal masks; they obviously identified with animals, which then had symbolic meaning. They were no longer the old dancing masks of the primitives; they had a highly philosophical meaning, but we don’t know what their ideas were. We have evidence of the same sort of thing within the Christian tradition also. You have seen those Christian mandalas where Christ is represented in the center, usually announcing the Law like Buddha, or holding the Holy Scriptures with the gesture of blessing, and in the corners are the four Evangelists in the form of their animal identifications. There are plenty of such representations in Nüremberg in the Germanic museum, for instance, and in Norman monasteries or churches you find these mandalas with the Evangelists in their animal forms, the so-called theriomorphic personifications—the angel, the eagle, the bull and the lion. That is a very primitive idea, coming by way of the Egyptian tradition; the four sons of Horus were animals; that is, one son of Horus had a human head, the analogy of the angel or the heliodromoi, and the three others had animal heads. It has to do with the condition of the functions in those days, but we are not concerned with that question here. I merely wanted to show that even Christianity could not avoid these theriomorphic identifications; the eagle or the bull or the lion in the Christian tradition are like the arktoi or the aetoi or the leontes in the analogous heathenish syncretistic cults. They were a sort of concession when Christianity became worldly. Naturally, they don't appear in the first century because the Evangels were not even supposed to be sacred then; they were only supposed to be good literature, good for the believers to read. Then the Christian ritual was invented, the canons of the church, an organized priesthood, etc., and it is natural that the pagan ideas crept in too.

<sup>10</sup> The proliferation of syncretistic gods among such groups as the Naassenes or the tendency to conflate Osiris, Sophia, Adam, Bacchus, et al., perhaps represents in part the need of travelers to assimilate foreign gods to their own pantheon.

Well, the old anchorite spirit is now receding; he makes a regression, having understood that nothing was to be done with these human beings. He becomes quite skeptical and thinks it best to worship his god in nature, to be a bear with bears and a bird with birds, to imitate the animal voices again, and to sing as a bird would sing. So he is isolated in his wood, a sort of pensioned paraclete, en pension at least. The new spirit is now a Christ; therefore, the analogy of Zarathustra with Christ. He comes down from the mountains with new hopes, new expectations, with an new message to man, and he passes the old fellow. And the new message, which the old man does not know of, is that God is dead. You see, to the anchorite God is active, he still believes that there is a God outside of him; but Zarathustra is convinced that there is no god outside of him, God is dead.

Mrs. Baumann: It corresponds with the death of Pan two thousand years before.

Dr. Jung: Exactly. One reads in old Latin literature that two thousand years ago, the captain of a boat sailing from the Grecian islands to Ostia, the harbour of Rome, demanded an immediate interview with the emperor in order to report a most remarkable event which had taken place when he was sailing through the Archipelago. He had passed in the night an island where there was an extraordinary noise; he heard people shouting: Pan megistos ethneken, Pan the greatest is dead. Pan was the philosophic god of those days. Originally, he had been a Latin local god of the fields and the woods, a sort of midday demon with no philosophical or universal importance whatever. Only later, when they learned Greek, did they see that the name of the old Latin god, Pan, was the same as the Greek word pan, which means "all," the universe. So they had new ideas about their old Pan; he became the god of the world. Then about the second century A.D., rumor spread that Pan the greatest was dead, Christianity had prevailed against him—the last conception of a nature god created by antiquity. And when the god is dead, it means the end of an epoch; therefore, the great emphasis laid upon that story. In this chapter, then, we have watched the way in which the spirit of a whole historical epoch recedes, disappears into nature, and how at the same time it is renewed in a new figure with a new message. Yet is still the same old figure; the same spirit that taught mankind the difference between good and evil is now informing us of the fact that there is no difference and that God is dead.

LECTURE III

Dr. Jung:

Here is a question by Mrs. Bailward:<sup>1</sup> “‘Ye creating ones, there is much uncleanness. That is because ye have had to become mothers’: Does this passage allude to his psychic identification (possibly a necessary part of creation) which he intuitively as unclean?”

Well, the identification we spoke of has nothing directly to do with what he means in this later passage; this is a particular problem, the problem of the psychological condition of creativeness, which has nothing to do with the identification of Nietzsche with the old man. For there is nothing unclean about the old wise man, nor is there necessarily anything unclean about the anima, or the Puer Aeternus, and so on. The impurity he alludes to in this very much later passage is the impurity of the mixture of spirit and matter which is necessary for creation; without that mixture no real creation can take place. But it is not concerned with the identification we are concerned with just now.

I mentioned last time that recognition of God’s being dead; we met that idea then for the first time. Now, how shall we understand this statement by Nietzsche?

Dr. Reichstein: That the guiding principle which ought to contain the life, is dead.

Dr. Jung: Yes, we can understand God psychologically as a supreme guiding principle. But we must well understand when we make that formulation or any other, that it is always our formula, it is what we say or know, it is our impression, the picture which we paint.<sup>2</sup> If you paint a picture of a landscape, say, you would never believe that it was the landscape; it is only what you make of the landscape. You paint a picture as well as you can, but it is probably never as beautiful as the landscape itself. Either you put something in that is not there, or you leave out something; at all events, you never make the mistake of confusing the one with the other. But when we make a formulation about God, everybody assumes that that is God. If I say, for instance, that god is an image, or a complex with a very great emotional intensity, or a supreme guiding principle, a psychological principle, then everybody asserts: Dr. Jung says God is nothing but this. A theologian does exactly the same thing when he says God can only be good. And he has no idea of the blasphemy he is uttering. How does he know that God can only be good? He takes half of the world away from him. How can God be everything if he is denied the faculty of being evil too? People make the mistake of assuming that he is nothing but their idea about him, and apparently God never defends himself. He never says: now this is most certainly nonsense! When somebody calls God a devil nobody strikes that man dead: he can live on ever afterwards perfectly happily. One person can say that God is dead, and another one that he is most living, and it makes no difference. Supposing that such an absolutely unimaginable thing as God exists: he must necessarily be beyond our grasp; otherwise, we would not use the idea of God. It must be a thing beyond our mental possibilities. So when we make a mental effort to formulate something about God, it is most obvious that we make a picture with our own means, consisting of our own stuff, and it is a most restricted aspect, because our mind is most certainly incapable of grasping such a fact as God would represent.

Moreover, the experience we can have of a thing utterly beyond ourselves can only be certain effects in our psychology;<sup>3</sup> we have absolutely no other material by which to judge. And even in our psychological experience we are entirely restricted to our own condition. You know, when I say something to a person and create a certain effect, then the right conclusion is: Dr. Jung said such and such a thing to me and I had such and such a reaction. Only when in a very bad mood or very resentful will he identify his reaction with himself. In case of a bad reaction, he will consider me a perfect devil, most cruel perhaps, but that is only when he does not see the justification of what I have said, or when he does not want to see that he has such a reaction because his character is such that it necessarily produces just that. Only very naive people will project such reactions upon each other. Of course it happens all the time; you kick a stone and hurt your foot and then you go back and kick it again. I saw a man do that recently. He stumbled over a pipe in his path and dropped something in his hand, and then he went back and kicked that pipe most violently and hurt his foot a second time. That is, of course, very human but it is perfect nonsense.

We always must keep in mind, then, that what we say about God is made of our own psychology; we cannot get beyond that fact. It is our language, our own brain cells, our individual experience, and we cannot prove that anything in our conception could possibly touch the real being of what we call God. It is almost futile to make such formulations because we never can prove them; we can only ask: Are there peculiar effects in our psychology which we cannot place otherwise than under such a heading? In other words: Are there such things as God-experiences in our psychology?—or what is the thing we call a God-experience? All we can formulate about it is made of our own concepts, and we can only postulate that there must be an unimaginable paradoxical being behind the experience about which we cannot know, per definitionem. It is absolutely dark. So when we assume God to be a guiding principle—well, sure enough, a god is usually characteristic of a certain system of thought or morality. For instance, take the Christian God, the summum bonum: God is love, love being the highest moral principle; and God is spirit, the spirit being the supreme idea of meaning. All our Christian moral concepts derive from such assumptions, and the supreme essence of all of them is what we call God.

So, when Nietzsche says God is dead, then it naturally means that supreme guiding principle is dead, the spirit, love—Christian love of course—whatever is believed about the Christian God: for instance, that God loved mankind so much that he even allowed his son to be crucified to redeem them from sin, and the idea that his son was himself and at the same time the sum total of all these leading dogmatic ideas. So, you could say just as well that our Christian faith or point of view has vanished; we no longer believe in the Christian dogma, or in the leading principles of Christian morality, nor can we continue our traditional Christian psychology. Nietzsche calls himself an atheist, but this formulation is of course a bit influenced by the idea that God is when he is said to be. In calling yourself an atheist, you make that concession to your primitive thinking—as if you could produce something by saying it is. As Kant said, that word is is nothing but a copula in a judgment; you need to use a verb that expresses existence, but you have not produced a thing by it. If you say you possess a hundred dollars, they don't necessarily exist.<sup>4</sup> But Nietzsche's idea confirms our explanation of the old wise man as the original Christian revelation continued in the idea of the paraclete, the Comforter, withdrawing slowly from the world and becoming a hermit, re-identifying himself again with the natural background from which he came.

You see, the original Christian spirit came out of the unconscious, out of human nature, in a most natural way. The theologians and the historians of the Christian conviction always try to make us believe that Christianity fell from heaven. But it grew very naturally through the course of centuries. Everything was well prepared. We spoke of the Persian origin of Christianity, but a great deal came also from Egypt, something from India even, because already in the second century B.C. there were Buddhistic monasteries in Persia, so through Persia the Buddhistic ideas probably crept into the formation of Christianity. All the Christian ideas and symbolism existed before, and many of the institutions of the Catholic church also. The mass probably derives from the cult of Mithras, and the communion ritual as well.<sup>5</sup> Monasteries already existed. You know, at the time of the Reformation they asserted that monasteries and nunneries were not foreseen in the New Testament, and then the Catholic church pointed to the fact that monasteries existed in the early days of Christianity, introduced by the first believers in Christ, before the holy scriptures were ever recognized as holy. They claim that the church is an older authority than the holy scriptures since they were collected and declared to be holy long after the church had been founded by St. Peter (who was supposed to be the first substitute of Christ on earth) and to have been put into that place by Christ himself before the Evangels were written. Now, it is an interesting fact that later investigation has shown the evidence of the Catholic church to be not quite reliable. The church pointed to a little book by Philo Judaeus, a Jew, also called Philo the Alexandrian, who was the philosopher of Christianity; he developed particularly the Logos philosophy which is contained in the most philosophical of the Evangels, the Evangel of John.<sup>6</sup> The little book is called De Vita Contemplativa and in it he described monasteries that existed in his time in Egypt and presumably also in Southern Palestine in the valley of the Jordan. The Catholic church quietly assumed that those were Christian monasteries, because one knew of no others; but the fact is that this book is now known to have been written between 20 and 24 A.D., at a time when Christ had not begun to teach; and moreover in writing about the life in those monasteries, Christianity is not mentioned—quite naturally, because it did not exist!

And just as monasteries were in existence before anything Christian, so the very central thoughts of Christianity had been well prepared for centuries and were already there. Then the whole thing crystallized around that more or less legendary figure of Christ. They said that it came suddenly as a great revelation, and they actually tried to destroy all traces of its sources, to forget how it came about and to make it absolutely unique, like a lightning from heaven. But historically this is an unknown picture: natura non facit saltus, nature does not make jumps; it is a continuous development. The spirit which grew through the centuries and appeared before the consciousness of the world in the moment of Christ's teaching, came about so naturally that Tertullian, one of the early fathers of the church, wrote that famous phrase: anima naturaliter Christiana, the soul is naturally Christian.<sup>7</sup> It was there long before people realized it, and the sudden explosion of the Christian faith was nothing but a sudden dawning of the consciousness of it. And as it came from nature, so it went back to nature. For a while it lifted man's mind out of nature and put it in opposition. St. Augustine, for example, said in one of his writings that people went out to marvel at the beauty of nature, the vastness of the sea, the greatness of the mountains, etc., and forgot themselves and lost their souls; he admonished them not to look, to beware of the beauty of nature, because it was all wrong; in everything there was the admixtio diabolicae fraudis, the admixture of devilish fraud. A devil was in every natural thing. That idea still exists in the preparatory rites of the Holy Mass. For example, in the Missale Romanum, a collection of rites and prayers, there is a particular magic rite called the benedictio cerei, the blessing of the wax in the altar-candles, for the purpose of purifying the natural substance of wax as produced by the bees from all admixtio diabolicae fraudis. They assumed that everything that came from the life of nature was impure because it contained effects or constituents of evil influence, the work of the devil, so in order to make a sacred use of things, one must disinfect them. There is also the benedictio salis, the benediction of the salt. And in the performance of the Holy Mass the choir boys swing their censors to make the incense smoke rise, the smoke being a spiritual disinfectant. Germs of evil nature are in the air but these devils are driven out by the smoke of the incense that surrounds the altar. So in every detail the Christian spirit of the early Middle Ages lifted up something in man, his spirit or soul, till it was out of touch with nature.

But already in about the twelfth or thirteenth century we see the first reactions. It was then that the poet Petrarch climbed a mountain for the first time to enjoy a beautiful view; he climbed Mont Ventoux in Provence, and the expedition was surrounded by all sorts of anticipations and fears because it was then supposed that mountain tops were inhabited by particular nature devils, so it amounted to an almost blasphemous boldness to climb to the heights.<sup>8</sup> After that, the Christian spirit included the importance of nature more and more. The early primitive artists, who indulged in particularly ugly and unanatomical bodies, were soon supplanted by painters who had discovered the beauty of the flesh and of all natural things; and with this came the Renaissance, the resurrection of the spirit of antiquity, and of the old feeling of connection with nature. We are still in that process of becoming acquainted again with the spirit of nature, in contrast to the medieval spirit. In the time of Nietzsche, this process, which had begun, let us say, with Petrarch, reached a culmination; it was recognized that the Christian principle was dead. That was the confession of the materialistic age which began with the French Enlightenment in about 1730, with the Encyclopedists and philosophers Diderot, Voltaire, etc.

This statement that god is dead is obviously most important. It is, one could say, the exposition of the whole problem of Zarathustra. You know, in the beginning of a dream there is a short sentence or a picture which is the exposition of the theme of the dream, and this is such an exposition. Zarathustra makes that statement to the old wise man, the old Christian spirit, who has turned very skeptical and prefers the solitude of the mountains and the woods to life in collectivity. And he gives good advice to Zarathustra: he says to give mankind nothing, but rather to take part of their load and help them to carry it; only then will they be grateful. Yet, he thinks they will not accept the new message.

We are now coming upon certain symbols to which I should like to call your attention. In the fourth paragraph of the second chapter, for example, the old wise man says: "Yes, I recognize Zarathustra. Pure is his eye, and no loathing lurketh about his mouth. Goeth he not along like a dancer?" This quality or attribute of the dancer will occur again and again later, and I propose that someone make a note whenever we come across it. There he is likened to a dancer for the first time and one cannot see exactly why, but when one compares that passage with others, one understands better what he means. In the third chapter the rope-dancer turns up. And the same symbol occurs in the fifth chapter; there the motive of dancing comes again in connection with a star that is born out of chaos.<sup>9</sup> Other symbolic expressions occur in different connections. Right in the beginning, for instance, there is the motif of the setting of the sun, or the down-going of Zarathustra.

Mrs. Crowley: I have thought a great deal about the meeting of these two wise men. It seemed to me to be the exposition of the whole problem at the beginning of Zarathustra. And I wondered whether one could explain it in another way besides the historical one, that Zarathustra is the representative of the dying and resurrecting God. The old wise man would be the spirit of nature, in the eternal, timeless sense, whereas Zarathustra would represent consciousness as a transforming reality. Then I thought it was an important point that he speaks of the imperfection of man, which suggests the idea that the spiritual values come and go, but man, as the animal, inherits that element which is eternal, his instinctive nature.

Dr. Jung: Yes, you are quite right. The old wise man in the woods and the old wise man in Zarathustra are one and the same thing. And that is always so. The old wise man is at the same time the one that goes and the one that comes, for everything that is, also is not—and what is today, is not tomorrow. Through that little mental operation of assuming that time is an extension, one knows that what has been, is still, and what will be, is already: inasmuch as things happen in a timeless condition they are always existing. So that archetype of the old wise man has been Zarathustra in the ninth century B.C. and Zarathustra now. He has been Christ, he has been Mohammed, he has been Mani. He went and he came, he died and was born again. It is of course exceedingly awkward and paradoxical, but things happen like that in the unconscious: you come upon such peculiar facts there. And what the collective unconscious is, the world is also. When you look up at the sky and marvel at the beauty of the stars, you don't see them as they are, but as they were, untold millions of years ago. You apparently see a new star flaming up, but that star became incandescent when Tut-ank-amen was Pharaoh in Egypt, and perhaps it does not now exist at all. For if by a miracle all the stars in heaven could be wiped out of existence, you would still go on seeing them for four years: only then would the first star disappear perhaps, and twenty or fifty years later others might go out, but the sky would be there as before, and it would take untold millions of years before the last star vanished. So we live continually in an age where things that have been are still in existence. The disagreeable thing is that we cannot see what is in the future. But our unconscious is somewhat in advance of our eyes, and has a notion of the things that will be, for the future is created out of the remote past.

Mr. Baumann: I want to ask why Shiva is always represented dancing?

Miss Wolff: Dancing is a symbol of creation, according to Professor Zimmer's book.<sup>10</sup>

Dr. Jung: Yes, dancing is always connected with creation. Shiva dances the origin and the destruction of the world. The birth of the dancing star out of chaos is a symbol of creation.

Dr. Reichstein: Dancing with the self is always an expression of oneness.

Dr. Jung: Would you say that it was creative to represent the unity of your condition or the union with yourself?

Dr. Reichstein: Yes, it has a creative effect.

Dr. Jung: But upon what? What would be the creative effect?

Dr. Reichstein: It can be very different, it depends upon the kind of dance.

Dr. Jung: Exactly. You can dance not only to produce the union with yourself, or to manifest yourself, but in order to produce rain, or the fertility of women, or of the fields, or to defeat your enemy. The idea of an effect, or something produced, is always connected with the idea of dancing. Therefore, it was originally a magic ritual by which something was produced, it was the original idea of work even. When primitives dance they really work, they dance until they are completely exhausted; they can dance for forty-eight hours in succession. For instance, in the stag dances of the Mexican Indians one of the participants puts on the skin of a stag and wears a stag's horns, and is then pursued by the hunters who shoot at him with dulled arrows. He goes on dancing until he is almost dead and then another one takes his place, and that goes on for days in succession. That is a rîte d'entrée before the stag hunting season, and it is very clearly done in order to gather up all their energies and to put them into the frame of mind, the attitude, of stag hunting, or to produce plenty of meat supply, or to attract hunting animals. They dance the animals in order to attract them, as the oyster fishers in Scotland sing the oysters. And in Switzerland they sing the cows, the so-called ranz des vaches, or the Kuhreihen, in order that they may give a lot of milk and produce calves. There are plenty of such primitive rites to produce fertility or for the cure of disease. They dance a disease, they represent the demons of sickness and dance them in order to combat them. So the first ideas of efficiency or effect were due to their peculiar psychological experiences through rhythmic movement: the efficiency mood was developed through the rhythmical repetition that slowly catches the whole system. The native drum, for instance, the tom-tom, has an exceedingly suggestive effect; after a while the whole system quivers rhythmically, and by means of that rhythm they get into the attitude, a sort of ekstasis,<sup>11</sup> in which the effect takes place, a state in which they may have visions that help them to get up their courage or to concentrate. Then, people who are ordinarily just lazy dogs do things in an amazing hurry and with tremendous concentration.

I once watched an interesting performance in north Africa, south of Tunis.<sup>12</sup> The Marabout in that country is a saintly man who is usually in charge of the poor: he sees that they are fed. His title is "the one who nourishes the poor.” He naturally cannot feed them all out of his own pocket, so he is entrusted with land to cultivate for that purpose, which is worked in turn by voluntary labor; one year it is this village, and the next year it is another. The men work for two or three days on the estate of the Marabout, and they do it as a sort of ritual. I saw them assembling the evening before with their camels, hundreds of them with green banners, and then in the morning a wild drumming and singing started and the whole crowd began to dance. They had sort of baskets or sacks, and short hoes instead of shovels and spades, and they filled these sacks with sand, a weight of a hundred pounds or more, and danced, carrying that load to another place where they were building dams and making little canals for fertilizing the very dry soil. And all that heavy labor was done in dancing step. Of course towards midday they were nearly dead in the great heat, but I watched them for hours and they were most efficient. In a few hours they had built a huge dam. But I am perfectly certain that if I had hired that crowd for three or four shillings they would hardly have moved; they would have been so tired and hot and hungry.

Now we go on to the next chapter:

When Zarathustra arrived at the nearest town which adjoineth the forest, he found many people assembled in the market-place; for it had been announced that a rope-dancer would give a performance. And Zarathustra spake thus unto the people:

I teach you the Superman. Man is something that is to be surpassed. what have ye done to surpass man?

All beings hitherto have created something beyond themselves: and ye want to be the ebb of that great tide, and would rather go back to the beast than surpass man?

What is ape to man? A laughing-stock, a thing of shame. And just the same shall man be to the Superman: a laughing-stock, a thing of shame.

Ye have made your way from the worm to man, and much within you is still worm. Once were ye apes, and even yet man is more of an ape than any of the apes.

Even the wisest among you is only a disharmony and hybrid of plant and phantom. But do I bid you become phantoms or plants?

Lo, I teach you the Superman!

Well, this chapter begins with the continuation of the story. You know, there is always a certain movement, a certain story, going on in all unconscious fantasies. Zarathustra is in the mountains in the beginning, then he descends and goes through a wood where he meets that old wise man, and now he comes to the city which is near the forest. That is like fantasies in general, a sort of drama which has its own time and place where it is enacted. Of course it is symbolical. The place high up on the mountain is a high level, corresponding, as we have seen, to an intense consciousness, the level of the sun: there one is isolated. And the down-going is the approach to the lower level where one comes together with that man in oneself, the ordinary collective human being. Not in your highest differentiation, your so-called differentiated or superior functions, are you connected with other human beings, but in your inferior functions. You see, the differentiated functions help you to be independent. If you could live entirely in your differentiated function, you never would need any other human being; you would be under no obligations and dependent upon nobody. But where you are inferior, inefficient, you are connected with mankind. The real vital connection is always through the inferior side, the "human, all-too-human," as Nietzsche says.<sup>13</sup>

Now, Zarathustra comes first into the wood, and the wood is dark and doubtful. To primitive people the wood is always a place of ghosts, full of unknown risks and dangers. It is a place where the unconscious is projected. So, from the very high level of consciousness, he has to go down almost into the unconscious in order to reach man, who is separated from a superior consciousness through the fact that he is unconscious of that high level. The mountain is hidden from his view by the forest and by the old spirit that dwells in the forest. And now he comes to the town, the collective place. He has arrived on the level of ordinary humanity and will speak to his fellow beings. The first person he meets is a rope-dancer. If it were a dream or a fantasy, what would you say that meant?

Dr. Reichstein: It would suggest a caricature of the dancer that Zarathustra really is; he dances without connection with the age.

Dr. Jung: You assume that this would be a sort of mirror reflex or a caricature of Zarathustra?

Dr. Reichstein: I think it is a picture of the time perhaps, because people are out of connection with the earth. To dance in the air is just the thing which is attempted by people.

Dr. Jung: Well, in the next chapter, the fourth part, there is a confirmation of this idea; he says:

<sup>13</sup> Nietzsche's book with this title (1878) describes human psychology. He had come to realize that his early idol, "the divine Wagner," was all too human.

Man is a rope stretched between the animal and the Superman—a rope over an abyss.

A dangerous crossing, a dangerous wayfaring, a dangerous look-back, a dangerous trembling and halting.

What is great in man is that he is a bridge and not a goal: what is lovable in man is that he is an over-going and a down-going.

Down-going is the translation here of the German word Untergang, but there is really no English equivalent.<sup>14</sup> This shows that the rope-dancer is an equivalent of himself, or himself under a certain aspect—a shadow aspect of himself, one could say, for he would not be conscious of the identification. It is nowhere clearly indicated that Zarathustra is the rope-dancer, but it is perfectly obvious in the further continuation of the story inasmuch as he is Nietzsche. I doubt very much whether Nietzsche realized it. There is, however, farther on in the book, a quite irrefutable proof that he himself is the rope-dancer, in the prophecy of his own fate, of which he could not have been conscious. So I think I am safe in the assumption that Nietzsche was not conscious that Zarathustra was the rope-dancer. You see, if a figure like that appears in a dream—if you encounter yourself in the form of a certain person, for instance—then you can safely conclude that you are unaware of the fact that you are like that person under a certain aspect. Or if it is an animal, that you are unaware of yourself under the aspect of such an animal. You always assume it must be somebody else. So it would be quite natural if Nietzsche did not recognize that figure. But we have such dreams just in order to meet the thing in ourselves which is strangest to us, and that is the reason why Nietzsche meets that aspect of himself, a sorry sort of saltimbanque, a rope-dancer. It is a very flimsy kind of profession, you know, and very risky at that: one easily slips and falls down dead.

Now he begins his sermon about the Superman.<sup>15</sup> Here we encounter that concept of the Superman for the first time. He gives a certain definition of him as the being that can be created by man's making a heroic endeavor to create something beyond himself. Of course, any creation is a creation beyond oneself, because one is already in existence, and if anything is created it must be beyond. The essence, the very principle, of creation would be man-beyond-himself, and that is the Superman. Nietzsche says here, "Man is something that is to be surpassed," that ought to be overcome. Now what is the connection between the last statement of the chapter before, that God is dead, and this beginning of the new chapter?

Miss Hannah: It means that the possibility of projecting god into a thing outside of ourselves is over. That period is dead, and we have to find it in ourselves—or rather in the Self.

Dr. Jung: Yes, and that practically amounts to the question: What happens to man when he declares that God is dead? Something must happen, because other human beings hold that God lives, declaring by that that they delegate certain of their vital processes into an impersonal sphere which they call God.

Mr. Allemann: It is an increase of consciousness, a breaking of a taboo.

Dr. Jung: Well, not necessarily, but something is increased by it.

Mr. Allemann: The responsibility to oneself.

Dr. Jung: One could say “responsibility” if one assumes that consciousness is increased; without consciousness there is no responsibility of course.

Remark: If he is not guided, he has to depend upon himself.

Dr. Jung: Yes, he is without God inasmuch as he assumes that God guides him. But that is a special case: the gods don’t always guide, they also misguide. For instance, we pray to the Christian God not to lead us into temptation. One of my little daughters refused to say that prayer because God should not be doing such things. We are little ants, not even children, in comparison with God, and that he takes a fiendish pleasure in leading us into traps is really very evil.<sup>16</sup> But there is a definite effect which takes place when you declare that God is dead.

Mrs. Crowley: Inflation.

Dr. Jung: Of course. For you then declare that certain vital processes which you assume belong to a being outside of you, are now dead. They either do not exist any longer, or they have become your own activity. Now, since these processes are untouched by whatever you declare, they cannot die, they are never dead. They happen as they have always happened, but they happen now under the heading of your own fantasy, of your own doing. Instead of saying, “God spoke to me in a dream,” you say “I had a dream, j’ai fait un rêve, I produced, I made, a dream”: it is your activity. Then somebody comes along and says: “You terror, how can you produce such a hellish dream?”—and you think you must be an awful fellow to make such dreams! St. Augustine thanked God for not making him responsible for his own dreams.<sup>17</sup> He still believed in the impersonal activity. He would have gotten into a complete hell if he had thought God was dead, for then his dreams would have been his own, and any evil or any good that God had worked in the worth hitherto would have been his own doing. If a person is conscious of this, his responsibility can heighten to such an extent that he will have a hellish inflation of consciousness. But also if he does not realize it, if he does not know what he has done by saying that God is dead, he can have an inflation of his whole personality. Then his unconscious will get inflated; he will be hampered by the continuous presence of God in the unconscious, which is of course the most terrible thing. Things happen to him, and he thinks he is responsible. Suddenly a thought comes into his head, for instance, and he thinks he must be a most immoral person to have such a thought. We cannot be objective, we are exceedingly hysterical: we think we have done so and so, because we don't assume that those things just happen.

We are like somebody walking through a wood who thinks, when an animal crosses the path, "Why have I caused this animal to cross my path?—why have I created this animal?" But the mind is like a wood in which all kinds of things happen. Formerly, we believed that God could do marvelous things and so could put peculiar thoughts into the human mind, or that evil ghosts played bad tricks, and thus we were rid of the responsibility of certain activities. But if you declare that God is dead and that there is no spook whatever, then it is all your own doing; or worse still, the doing of your wife, or your neighbors, or their children, and so on. That is quite bad. Then God is not only introjected into you but he is also projected into mankind, and then what people do becomes extremely important, because you assume they know what they are doing and that only a devil could do such things. But those people are perfectly unconscious, as you are unconscious: you don't know what you do really, because you are not God. Yet you behave as if you were. That is the inevitable consequence, and then of course you become very important, responsible for a whole world. If you are inclined to be a good Christian, naturally you get the savior delusion. You think you are, in a way at least, a little savior, and that you must missionize the world and tell people what is good for the good cause.

<sup>17</sup> Though he felt commanded to refrain from the "lust of the flesh," Augustine confessed to God that certain thoughts in sleep not only cause pleasure but go so far as to obtain assent and something very like reality (Confessions, book 10). But Nietzsche, to the contrary: "Nothing is more your own than dreams! Nothing more your own work!" (Daybreak, book II, p. 78).

But your cause is exceedingly bad, because you only try to get away from your own inflation.

So when Nietzsche declares that God is dead, he is confronted with the rope-dancer, and the rope-dancer is what?

Mrs. Stutz: He represents the great risk of the inflation.

Dr. Jung: Well, the rope-dancer is that quantity of energy which has been in the god before. This is the diminutive form of the god in him, and he is a dancer because God dances the world. That a god should be a dancer is of course a very pagan notion, and the Hindu idea is that he dances the creation of the world and its destruction. But God as a creator, as the author, the maker of things, is a Christian idea as well. So God appears now like the rope-dancer who is himself, Nietzsche. And the rope-dancer leads an exceedingly risky existence. Therefore, through his identity with God, he is instantly forced into a heroic attitude, an attitude of possible self-destruction: he is increased beyond himself by that inflation. One could not say that this was very bad: it is the making of a hero. You see, a hero must have a large self-destructive tendency in order to be a hero. We praise a hero, and the hero contains a divine spark, or he would not be a hero. He encounters himself, then, as the hero, this rope-dancer, but that means the maker of his own destruction. For the moment, however, the rope-dancer plays no role. First, Zarathustra tries to teach the people his idea of the Superman.

The idea of the Superman is, of course, the consequence of the God that is dead, for then man cannot remain man. He is lifted out of himself, because all the vital processes that were embodied in God before are now in himself, and he becomes the creator of himself as God creates himself or the world. In the old Egyptian texts, God is the maker of his own egg, the builder of his own nest; he hatches himself out; he is the Phoenix that burns itself and rises out of its own ashes; he is the God that eternally re-creates himself.<sup>18</sup> So, whenever that inflation process gets into man, he becomes the maker of himself. Therefore, Nietzsche continues now to speak about the Superman as able to create himself; Zarathustra is now the expression of man plus God. He can undo himself and create a being beyond man, supposedly a product of man and God. Then he says that "All beings hitherto have created something beyond themselves," and that otherwise they would go back to the animals. Here is the interpretation of the old man in the chapter before: he didn't create any longer and so he went back to the animals, to nature. You see, those people who don't create themselves do go back to the animal. This idea of self-renewal is a general religious idea. In what kind of historical rites does it express itself?

Mrs. Baynes: In rebirth ceremonies and initiations.

Dr. Jung: Yes, all the rebirth ceremonies in all religions express this self-renewal, and it is always linked up with the idea that man in his self-renewal is doing the same thing that God does. To that extent, he is God himself. For instance, the baptism of Christ in the Jordan is the moment of his generation by God himself. According to the old Doketic teaching, it was the moment when God entered the man Christ. Christ was an ordinary man until his baptism, when God entered him and he became Superman, god-man. And he remained god-man until that moment in the garden before his crucifixion when he sweated blood. There God left him, and it was the ordinary man Christ who was crucified and not God at all. Therefore he said on the cross: "My God, why hast thou forsaken me?"<sup>19</sup> That old Doketic belief was of course a heretical teaching according to the Catholic dogma, but it lasted over many centuries and survives in certain more or less mystical sects still in existence.<sup>20</sup> Without the ceremony of rebirth, then, man is generally thought of as an animal. In the Catholic church, people must be baptized to save them from the natural state which is not capable of the vision of God, the special prerogative of that condition. They are then quasi modo geniti, as if newly born. And in pagan cults they were clad in white robes and fed with milk like little children for about a week after the rebirth. I was in one part of Africa where they have rather painful and complicated initiation ceremonies, and I was told that when the young men and women evade them, as they do now under the influence of the Christian missions, they are called animals because they have not submitted to the rebirth ritual. All rebirth rituals are a making over of man into something beyond man, and that is expressed in many different ways; for instance, that the real parents are no longer their parents, or that they died and came back again as sort of ghosts in comparison to the animal being they were before, and they are given new names, etc.

<sup>19</sup> Nietzsche elsewhere writes of Jesus' cry on the cross, that perhaps it gives "evidence of a general disappointment and enlightenment over the delusion of his life" (Daybreak, book II, p. 114).

<sup>20</sup> Doketics (from dokien, "to seem") such as Marcion argued that if Christ died on the cross he must have been only a man. Tertullian represented the orthodox doctrine that Christ was both man and god. The heresy opposite to that of the Doketics was that of the Ebionites who held that Christ was only man.

These many forms of rebirth rites show that it is a représentation collective, an archetypal idea, which means that the process in question is a regular quality of the collective unconscious, the original disposition of man.<sup>21</sup> And because it has occurred everywhere, it always comes back again in one form or another. If we live at all, we will always seek the fulfilment of the archetype of rebirth; one could say it came to pass on the slightest provocation. So when Nietzsche declares that God is dead, instantly he begins to transform. With that declaration he is no longer a Christian, he is an atheist or it doesn't matter what. He immediately gets into the process of that archetype of rebirth, because those vital powers in us which we call "God" are powers of self-renewal, powers of eternal change. Goethe felt that: there is a beautiful verse in Faust about the kingdom of the mothers where everything is in a continuous state of self-renewal, a continuous rearrangement.<sup>22</sup> And this kingdom of the mothers is the abyss of the deity; it is the darkness of the good, the deus absconditus, the auctor rerum, the dark father of created things. Also one can say it is the original mother. Now, we have a peculiar sphere in our unconscious which corresponds to such concepts, and we call that "God," the creative or the creating god. And as soon as this projection or this declaration, this creative god (whatever it is) is abolished, instantly that process begins in us. We are caught in those powers. If you don't want to be caught in them, then don't make such declarations; it is exceedingly foolish to make them, because you thus provoke the unconscious. Of course you think it is quite futile whether you make such a declaration or not, that you can say this or that about God and it makes no difference whatever. But I tell you it does make a difference in reality, only you won't connect it with things. You see, the man Nietzsche himself did not realize, when he said God was dead, that it meant that he would get into the mill, into the alchemical pot where he is cooked and transformed. As he did not realize, for instance, that thinking is a most exhausting creative process. He says that all his thoughts jumped out of his brain like Pallas jumping out of the head of Zeus,<sup>23</sup> but on the next page he complained about the terrible vomiting and awful headaches he was always pestered with when working.<sup>24</sup> That is generally so; we don't connect psychological and physical conditions. You see, that declaration is a very obnoxious thing: it gets him into trouble right away, but he does not realize it. The trouble is that he has to create the Superman. His first word is: I teach you the Superman, not realizing that he has to give birth to a Superman, that he is confronted with the task of creating the Superman. And what is the best proof that he does not realize it?

<sup>21</sup> Jung said, "I term collective all psychic contents that belong not to one individual but to many, i.e., to a society, a people, or to mankind in general. Such contents are what Lévy-Bruhl calls the représentation collective or primitives" (CW 6, par. 692). Lucien Lévy-Bruhl, How Natives Think, tr. Lillian A. Clare (orig. Paris, 1910), p. 35ff.

Miss Hannah: That he preaches it.

Dr. Jung: Yes, if he realized what a task he was confronted with, he would not teach it; he would keep it all to himself. You see, when one preaches such things, one practically says you ought to do it, but I am all right. But whether you realize it or not, you are confronted with an impossibly difficult task, perhaps really impossible, for who is courageous or bold or mad enough to suggest that he is capable of creating himself beyond himself, to assume that he is the carrier of a divine activity? That is too big.

<sup>24</sup> Nietzsche's health, except for brief periods, was unbelievably bad. In one year (1879) someone reckoned from his letters severe attacks on 118 days.

LECTURE IV

Dr. Jung:

I have here a question by Mrs. Bailward: "I understood you to say last time that the powers in us, which we call God, are powers of self-renewal. I suppose if this renewal process can take place, inflation does not?"

Yes, inflation is a pathological symptom and it only takes place when the actual creative self-renewal does not come to pass; that is perfectly obvious: an inflation is always a symptom of an inherited creative process.

Then there are two questions by Mr. Baumann. The first is: "Why is dancing a symbol for creation and destruction? Does it mean to be in the body and in time (time as the fourth dimension)? Materia or form moving and changing in time is creation, or destruction?"

You are asking really for a justification for the interpretation of the creative forces as destructive forces, why dancing for instance, should be a symbol for both creation and destruction. It is because ritual dancing under primitive circumstances is symbolic; it is always a representation of the creative powers in our unconscious. Therefore it often means the sexual act, or the fertilization of the earth, or it is for the production of a certain effect, whether constructive or destructive. And as a representation of the creative act, dancing necessarily symbolizes both destruction and construction. It is impossible to create without destroying: a certain previous condition must be destroyed in order to produce a new one. The most synthetic creation is inevitably also an act of destruction. The typical Hindu god of the creative forces is Shiva who dances in the burial grounds; he is the great destroyer because he is creative life, and as such both creative and destructive. You may have seen those Indian dancers who have been in Zürich; they represented the creative act in a most marvelous way. The many arms of the deity express of course his extraordinary efficiency; he works not with two hands, but with many. Then if you look at it psychologically, the life of a creative individual contains any amount of destruction, even of self-destruction.

Mrs. Crowley: In that case would not the inflation also be part of that creative process, even though it is destructive in a sense?

Dr. Jung: Inflation is something abnormal and it is not necessarily a part of the creative process, though unfortunately it happens of course to be connected with it very often. But a creative artist, for instance, can create without imagining himself to be a creator. He can create just because it is his damned duty to do so, or because he cannot help doing it. That is, a creative person without self-consciousness. As soon as self-consciousness comes in, there is inflation: you imagine that you are the creator and then you are God, because you feel, of course, like ten thousand dollars if you have time to think of it. If you have time, you have already split off from the creative process; you look at yourself and say: "Hell, what a fellow! Isn't he grand?" And then you are in for it, you are already living in your biography, you see it printed: In the year so and so, on such a day, he had such and such an inspiration. Then you have spoiled your creative process, but you have a most healthy inflation.<sup>1</sup>

Mrs. Crowley: You spoke of the tremendous archetypal forces in Nietzsche. How could he produce Zarathustra without identifying if the archetypes worked in him?

Dr. Jung: Ah yes, but they would not be working in him, he would be working in them: that is the natural point of view.

Mrs. Crowley: Do you mean in the sense of a dance?

Dr. Jung: Of course. They have you on the string and you dance to their whistling, to their melody. But inasmuch as you say these creative forces are in Nietzsche or in me or anywhere else, you cause an inflation, because man does not possess creative powers, he is possessed by them. That is the truth. If he allows himself to be thoroughly possessed by them without questioning, without looking at them, there is no inflation, but the moment he splits off, when he thinks, "I am the fellow," an inflation follows.

Question: Can it be avoided?

Dr. Jung: Only by obeying completely without attempting to look at yourself. You must be quite naive.

Mr. Baumann: It happens automatically?

<sup>1</sup> Jung was especially fascinated with the visionary poet or other artist whose creativity is a primordial experience, a "dictation" from unknown voices, "a tremendous intuition striving for expression." See "Psychology and Literature" in CW 15.

Dr. Jung: It happens automatically that you become conscious of yourself and then you are gone; it is as if you had touched a high-tension wire.

Mr. Baumann: You cannot escape it?

Dr. Jung: If you are simple enough. Nietzsche of course could not help looking at the thing and then he was overwhelmed with resentments, because the creative powers steal your time, sap your strength, and what is the result? A book perhaps. But where is your personal life? All gone. Therefore, such people feel so terribly cheated; they mind it, and everybody ought to kneel down before them in order to make up for that which has been stolen by God. The creative forces have taken it out of them, and therefore they would like to personify them, to imagine that they are Shiva, in order to have the delight of being creative. But if you know you are creative and enjoy being creative, you will be crucified afterwards, because anybody identified with God will be dismembered. An old father of the church, the Bishop Synesius, said that the spiritus phantasticus, man's creative spirit, can penetrate the depths or the heights of the universe like God or like a great demon, but on account of that he will also have to undergo the divine punishment.<sup>2</sup> That would be the dismemberment of Dionysos or the crucifixion of Christ. We shall come presently to the same problem in Zarathustra.

Mr. Baumann's next question is: "Establishing relation to the crowd requires going down to a lower psychological level. Is it necessary to go into unconscious, medial relation with people, a kind of identification or participation mystique with the crowd,<sup>3</sup> or has one only to show that one has inferior parts?"

One does not need to show that one has inferior parts, you know; that is generally known. You may be sure that there are people round you who are quite convinced that they see where you are inferior. People have the lovely quality of seeing the shortcomings of other people very well; they only fail to see their own. So we need never be too self-conscious in that respect; our shortcomings are noticed; we don't need to show them particularly. We only need to show them to ourselves; we are the audience that never hears or sees. Now, that going down is only possible if somebody has been on a higher level. You see, Zarathustra is the man or the spirit that, after his going down through the course of the centuries, has now begun to rise. The old man we met in the woods is the traditional Christian spirit that slowly receded into nature where it seemed as if it would finally disappear, but the spirit will not recede into nature entirely as long as there is man in whom to manifest. Therefore, in receding he emerges and the oncoming part of the spirit is Zarathustra. When the other one goes down, the personification of a new spirit comes up. So it is essentially the same spirit. Zarathustra has been up on the mountain and now he is coming down to the level of general mankind.

<sup>2</sup> Of Synesius, Bishop of Ptolemais, Jung said: "In his book De Insomnio, he assigns the spiritus phantasticus practically the same psychological role as Schiller to the play instinct and . . . creative fury" (CW 6, par. 174). Jung means here the reconciliation of opposites.

If we reduce this phenomenon to Nietzsche's personal psychology, it would run about as follows: Nietzsche was a professor in Basel for about ten years, then he withdrew from his profession and lived in Nice and Rapallo, and in Sils Maria in the Engadine; and much of the mountain symbolism in Zarathustra comes from such geographical surroundings. He used to walk in the mountains, and he wrote some very beautiful poems about them. So it is a part of his imagination that he felt himself as being isolated on the top of a high mountain where he could look far into the future of mankind, or where he could see life below at his feet. There he gained that new insight, a new gospel as it were. And then he came down like Moses from Sinai, to bring it to people. That is the way Nietzsche felt it, but inasmuch as he did not do it naively, without knowing what he was doing, he was identical with the creative spirit; he knew too much about it and therefore got an inflation. So there is a partial identification with Zarathustra. Now how can such a partially inflated man get down to mankind? Only in the form of a preacher who stands on a hillock and preaches. In that first sermon he is standing on a pedestal talking down to them, saying one should, thereby showing that his sermon is really inefficient because he is not on the same level. If he were naive he would not notice his message, but he would simply talk to the next fellow on the street, say how do you do and so on; and in the course of their talk he naturally would mention what his heart was interested in, and the other fellow would be shot to pieces. Then he would have had an effect. But you can say the grandest thing and if you are talking down it reaches nobody; it makes no impression because you talk in such a grand style that only the wrong people get you. So when Zarathustra was read in the beginning, only the wrong people understood what he really meant; all the cranks of Europe were filled with Zarathustra and nothing came from it at all.

You see, it is not inapt that we are only now attempting an analysis of Zarathustra; we need all the preparation of our psychology in order to understand what it really means. The second part of Faust, also, was understood by nobody; it takes a long and most painstaking preparation to get the gist of it: it is most prophetic. And we need the experience of the war and of the post-war social and political phenomena to get an insight into the meaning of Zarathustra. Now, if Nietzsche had been unconscious of what he did, he would have been able to come down to earth. But it is not worthwhile really to speak of the man Nietzsche, for he was robbed; he lived only that Zarathustra might speak, and when it came to his own life, it was as poor and miserable as possible, a sick neurotic existence in the pensions of the Riviera and the Engadine, and finally in Turin where the devil caught him for good.

Here is a contribution from Miss Cornford: "Zarathustra comes as a dancer since that represents the exact opposite of the Christian monk. Instead of 'mortifying the flesh' as the monk is taught to do, he lives in his body, is fully conscious of it, and makes use of it. So while the ascetic stands like an iron stake planted in the stream of life, the dancer is a plant that responds to every movement of the water. Thus it is natural that the preacher of the new religion should come as a dancer, since he brings movement instead of rigidity."

Yes, the movement in contrast to rigidity is also a point of view, it is another opposition, a pair of opposites which plays its role. There are of course many such sidelights, but they would lead a bit too far.

Then we have a question by Miss Hannah: "I had always thought of the self as a kind of objective though individual God, whom I hoped to discover; but when you say 'create something beyond ourselves' [Well, that is what Zarathustra says, I don't give myself the credit of having invented such a very apt formula], do you mean the self? And if so is it created by rebirth? Is rebirth submitting ourselves to a process of nature by will, or it is a still more active process?"

What do you understand by "still more active process?"

Miss Hannah: I meant, have we got to do something about it or is it done to us?

Dr. Jung: It is a more passive process.

Miss Hannah: If you submit to it, it is passive, isn't it?

Dr. Jung: Yes, but you can also submit by will and very actively. Well now, let us assume that the Superman would be Nietzsche's formulation for the self. He understands that by creating beyond yourself you create the Superman, by will as it were; he even says one should will it, which shows very clearly that the Superman to him is an active creation by man. But we cannot create beyond ourselves; we would have to be gods to do that. You see, this confusion comes from the fact that he identifies in his language with the creative process. The right perspective in which to see it is that the creative process in you is not your own doing. It simply takes you and uses you; it is a different will from your own. Then you understand that it is something else, something beyond yourself that is creative. It is necessarily beyond yourself, because the creative forces were before and after the act of creation. They were when you were not, when you were unconscious; and what you produce is necessarily beyond yourself because those forces are beyond yourself. You cannot rule them; they create what they choose. Of course, you can identify with it more or less, but that is really childish; then you are like a naughty boy who in spite of your warnings not to climb onto the chair, insists upon doing so and of course falls down. You say: "Now you see!" And he says: "But I wanted to!" It is an illusion when one identifies with these processes. So creating something beyond ourselves is only a formulation which comes from the idea that we are creating. We are not creating. We are only instrumental in the creative process: it creates in us, through us.

Now we will continue the third chapter where the rope-dancer is first mentioned. Zarathustra says here: "Even the wisest among you is only a disharmony and hybrid of plant and phantom. But do I bid you become phantoms or plants?" How do you understand this peculiar expression? In how far is the wisest of mankind hitherto a hybrid of plant and ghost?

Mrs. Baynes: Is he speaking there of the wisest among the preceding Christian wise men or the whole of humanity?

Dr. Jung: It would be the wisest of the people of that crowd, the people of our time. He characterizes the particular kind of wisdom which has been preached to them, and I want to know in how far that is a hybrid of plant and ghost.

Mr. Nuthall-Smith: Inasmuch as the earthly and spiritual are divided, people are not unified.

Dr. Jung: But a hybrid is not divided. The point is that it is a oneness but consisting of two things; a hybrid plant is a mixture, but it is a oneness, as a hybrid word consisting of Latin and Greek words is drawn together into one.

Remark: It is just a oneness of the vegetative and the spirit.

Dr. Jung: But he does not say spirit, he says ghost.

Mrs. Adler: The animal is not between, it is missing.

Dr. Jung: The animal would be the contrast, the opposite. Nietzsche will speak later on of the blond beast; that is his idea, the Superman in contradistinction to the plant and ghost-wisdom. But I should like to know why just plant and ghost. You see, he says even the wisest is only a discord, or disharmony, and discord is Entzweiung in German, which means something that does not fit exactly. A hybrid is a united discord, so it is an objectionable sort of union of opposites. The plant is completely unconscious and the ghost has no flesh, no body, so it is an absolutely metaphysical ghost connected with a plant and forming a unit, something utterly unconscious and close to matter.

Mrs. Baumann: Doesn't the plant life usually mean spiritual development symbolically?—and insofar as it is plant life, it has natural life, and insofar as it is a ghost it is dead, too far away.

Dr. Jung: Yes, the flesh dies and then it becomes a ghost. So that hybrid consists in a natural growth on one side, perfectly sound, yet something died in between, the animal man: the flesh died, and only the ghost remains. The original natural spirit, anima naturaliter Christiana, that flesh in which this natural Christian soul once lived, then vanished; and what remains is this hybrid of plant, a sound beginning, and a ghost, a sad end of human life. I call your attention to this peculiar metaphor because Nietzsche inserts the middle part, he preaches the flesh again. In other words, the blond beast comes to fill the gap there, so that the plant and the ghost are united once more, and he then concentrates upon the middle part which was lacking before. So Nietzsche's whole philosophy can often be seen in the smallest detail of his metaphors.

Now we will continue the text. Here he begins with his real philosophy, interpreting the Superman as the meaning of the earth. "Let your will say: The Superman shall be the meaning of the earth." He makes it imperative—you shall make him so. For the earth of course could have other meanings; that the Superman is the meaning of the earth is not the most obvious conclusion to draw. Biological science drew very different conclusions in the days when Nietzsche wrote, for instance. Now, in how far is the Superman the meaning of the earth? How do you understand it?

Mrs. Crowley: The earth is what man makes it; it is what it means to man.

Dr. Jung: That is the implication, that it is left to man to create the meaning of the earth—man should show us that the Superman is the meaning. But why should the earth be given such a meaning?

Mrs. Crowley: Because from his point of view it is a sort of embryonic form; it is always to be renewed, it is a potential.

Dr. Jung: No, you see the question is really: what is Zarathustra's relation to the earth?

Dr. Escher: It is the same as between plant and ghost. In the middle is the earth, flesh.

Dr. Jung: Yes, instead of calling it flesh or animal he calls it the earth, and the earth is the body. So the body is the mediator between the plant and the ghost. You see, the plant is not yet an animal body and the ghost is no longer; the animal body of man is in between. As you know from dream symbols, the meaning of the earth is essentially the body; matter always means something like the bowels or the lower parts of the body. Now, in how far is the Superman the body? We were supposing that Superman to be the self.

Miss Hannah: The meaning is always in what you have lost, and Zarathustra has lost the body, has he not?—he is too high.

Dr. Jung: Well, the one who lost the body is surely the man who receded into the woods. He withdrew, lost the earth; and Zarathustra is going to seek and to preach it. The man Nietzsche, of course, lost his body to a considerable extent. But it is Zarathustra here, so it is a general kind of spirit; our general spirit has lost the earth, lost weight. For the body is a terribly awkward thing and so it is omitted; we can deal with things spiritually so much more easily without the despicable body. If you understand the Superman as the self, then, how does the self express itself—or, if you are only spirit how can you express yourself?

Miss Hannah: The body is the only way in which the spirit can be seen.

Dr. Jung: Of course. You can be anything if you are a spirit, because you have no form, no shape, you are just gas. You can assume any form; you can be this or that; you can transform at will quite arbitrarily into God knows what. "But you should not think like that," or: "You should believe something, that will save you." Believe if you can! You see, that is just the trouble. And why can't you? Because you have a body. If you were a spirit you could be anywhere, but the damnable fact is that you are rooted just here, and you cannot jump out of your skin; you have definite necessities. You cannot get away from the fact of your sex, for instance, or of the color of your eyes, or the health or the sickness of your body, your physical endurance. Those are definite facts which make you an individual, a self that is just yourself and nobody else. If you were a spirit you could exchange your form every minute for another one, but being in the body you are caught; therefore, the body is such an awkward thing; it is a definite nuisance. All people who claim to be spiritual try to get away from the fact of the body; they want to destroy it in order to be something imaginary, but they never will be that, because the body denies them; the body says otherwise. They think they can live without sex or feeding, without the ordinary human conditions; and it is a mistake, a lie, and the body denies their convictions. That is what Nietzsche means here. The Superman, the self, is the meaning of the earth; it consists of the fact that we are made of earth.

Therefore, when you study symbols of individuation, you always find that no individuation can take place—I mean symbolically—without the animal, a very dark animal, coming up from primordial slime, enters the region of the spirit; that one black spot, which is the earth, is absolutely indispensable on the bright shield of spirituality. Sometimes people have the fantasy that the self consists of particles or molecules of iron or lead or any other heavy substance. That is the same idea; all those heavy metals are the very soul of the earth. The center of the earth consists of heavy metals, and so they become the symbol for the elements that constitute the self. The essences of the body, then, constitute the self. There is no other limitation, and as soon as you enter the world of the spirit, your self evaporates—looked at from the human point of view. Of course, from the other point of view it is eternal and cannot evaporate, but the personal Atman in Hindu teaching is really personal; it is the spirit of this particular body, and it is the body that makes this thing particular.

It is the essential metaphysical meaning of the earth that it gives specification to things, that it makes things distinct. Objects only become distinct in space and time, where they form a mass with different chemical or physical qualities by which they can be distinguished. Otherwise, you can be aware of nothing that exists or is supposed to exist. They say in the East that God was all alone in the beginning, and he didn't feel well at all because he didn't know who he was; so he created the universe in order to see who he was. He created distinct beings in which he could mirror himself. For you never know who you are unless you can look at yourself from without: you need a mirror to see what your face is like, how you look. If you live somewhere in the desert where you have no mirror, and where you never meet anybody who mirrors you, how can you know who you are? The old philosophers always supposed of God that he was without an opposite, without the second one; but he needs that in order to become aware of himself.

Now that means separation, distinctness of things in time and space. And really the essence of differentiation, the idea of the self, could not exist for one single moment if there were not a body to create and maintain that distinctness. We may suppose that if the body vanishes and disintegrates, the self in a way disintegrates, for it loses its confines.<sup>4</sup> You can observe such things in participation mystique; inasmuch as your consciousness is then not fully aware of the reality of your body and all its given facts, your spirit or your psyche overlaps the body and is mixed with other psyches. And then you don't know exactly who you are; you might be something else just as well—you are a bit in doubt. Experience tells us that in many respects we behave as if we were somebody else, our mother or father or brother or anybody else with whom we happen to be in more or less intimate contact.

People who are not consciously aware of the body suffer from a certain unreality of life in that inter-relatedness through participation mystique; they don't know when they are hungry, and they neglect the simple functions of the body. I had a case, a girl of twenty-eight, who no longer heard her steps when she walked in the street. That frightened her and she came to me. She dreamt that she was riding in a balloon—not in the basket but on top, high up in the air—and there she saw me with a rifle shooting at her from below. I finally shot her down. She was that girl I have told you about who never had seen her body. I suggested that she must bathe once in a while, and then she told me she had been brought up in a nunnery where the nuns taught her that the sight of the body was sin, that she should always cover her bath tub with a linen, so she never saw herself. I said: "Now go home and undress and stand before your long mirror and look at yourself." And when she came back, she said: "It was not so bad after all, only I think my legs are a bit too hairy!" That is the truth, that is the way people think and feel when they have such symptoms.

Now we will go on to the next paragraph: "I conjure you, my brethren, remain true to the earth." What does he mean by remaining true to the earth?

Miss Hannah: It is just what you were saying, that you can be anything but you must stay in your body.

Dr. Jung: Yes, he is talking here of superterrestrial hopes, and that is of course an attempt to divert attention from the real individual life to spiritual possibilities beyond. The spirit consists of possibilities—one could say the world of possibilities was the world of the spirit. The spirit can be anything, but the earth can only be something definite. So remaining true to the earth would mean maintaining your conscious relationship to the body. Don't run away and make yourself unconscious of bodily facts, for they keep you in real life and help you not to lose your way in the world of mere possibilities where you are simply blindfolded. This is of course a somewhat one-sided teaching, and to a person who is nothing but the body, it is all wrong. You must not forget that by far the majority of people are nothing but body. This teaching, therefore, is only valid for those who have lost it, who have been deceived by the spirit—like Klages, for instance, who defined the spirit as the enemy of the soul, the soul being the life of the body, because he assumed that most people had lost the reality of the body as he had lost it.<sup>5</sup> But as a matter of fact there are plenty of people who are entirely in the body, and to those one ought to preach early Christianity, or heathen gods at least, because they haven't an idea of a spiritual possibility.

You know, a truth is never generally a truth. It is only a truth when it works, and when it doesn't work it is a lie, it is not valid.<sup>6</sup> Philosophy and religion are just like psychology in that you never can state a definite principle: it is quite impossible, for a thing which is true for one stage of development is quite untrue for another. So it is always a question of development, of time; the best truth for a certain stage is perhaps poison for another. In such matters nature shows that it is thoroughly aristocratic and esoteric. It is nothing that our liberal minds would hope or wish it to be: that one thing is true and the same everywhere, and such nonsense. There is an extreme uncertainty about truth; we are confronted with the utter impossibility of creating anything which is generally true. I often think, when I am analyzing, that if another patient should hear what I was saying to this one, he would jump right out of his skin: he could not stand it. I talk stuff that is complete blasphemy to the other, and they often come just after one another. So I have to turn right round and talk black instead of white. But it is absolutely necessary. I learned long ago that there are steps, stages of evolution, a sort of ladder. There are different capacities and one has to teach accordingly. If you teach generally you must be mighty careful to put things in such a way that they are either not understood, or if they are, that the understanding tumbles over on the right instead of the wrong side. But even that does not always help. Therefore, it is not a grateful métier to teach philosophy or religion or psychology.

Mr. Baumann: Could one not say that new spiritual life has to come out of the natural mind in a way? The natural mind, I understand, comes out of the earth.

Dr. Jung: Well, Zarathustra has something to say about that. He is merely critical here: he says one should not listen to those who preach superterrestrial hopes. But what the Superman says is another question, and he is very strong on this point. He says the most terrible thing is to blaspheme against the earth and to overvalue the unknowable over against things as they are, which is the meaning of the earth. The individuality of the earth lies in things being just so and nothing else. You see, only one who has been too long under the spell of the delusion that things can be quite different from what they are, feels the impact of Zarathustra's message. Only a real Christian mind or an essential spiritualist—no matter whether he confesses Christianity or not—can feel the extraordinary novelty of such a message. And of course he does not welcome it, he hates it. He thinks it is sheer blasphemy against the spirit to say that one should be true to the earth, or that one should value the body more than the spirit. But it is perfectly logical that after an age that has exhausted the importance of the spirit, the flesh should have its revenge and conquer the spirit—perhaps overcome it for a while. Of course we express these things by the terms spirit and matter, not knowing exactly what we designated by those words. In Chinese classical philosophy you would use the terms Yang and Yin, and say it was according to the rules of heaven that they changed their positions. Yang eats the Yin, and from the Yang, Yin is reborn; it bursts forth again, and then Yin envelopes the Yang, and so on. That is the course of nature. The Chinese are not so upset, because they have watched this peculiar natural process for a much longer time. But our history is not old enough, so we are astonished to see that the spirit eats the flesh, and then the flesh eats the spirit. It is exactly the same process. We were taught that God sent his son to overcome the flesh by the spirit as a unique event in history; and now we learn the reverse truth that the flesh eats the spirit. And we still cannot believe it, though it becomes still more obvious than when it first appeared in the time of the Reformation.

Dr. Reichstein: You said that the spirit consisted of kind of indefinite possibilities. But the spirit can also be a very definite law which establishes quite definite facts. I think this kind of spirit here is something that has degenerated.

Dr. Jung: We are speaking of spirit in the pure essence. The spirit that creates definite laws is a human spirit, not the spirit as it exists in our unconscious, where it really consists of absolutely indefinite possibilities. You know, even if one creates quite a number of definite laws—and the number is restricted—there are very few which will not be overthrown in a short time. Also there is an enormous possibility of new laws, new discoveries—new points of view which are latent in us, and that really makes the life of the spirit. It does not consist in a law which is definite forever; the life of the spirit consists of a new life which is forever creating.

Dr. Reichstein: I did not mean a definite law valid for the moment.

Dr. Jung: Can you give me an example so that I can see more clearly what you mean?

Dr. Reichstein: For instance, the Christian spirit had its validity in its time: it chose out of a number of possibilities just one.

Dr. Jung: Oh yes, quite so. Of course that is spirit. There is no doubt that the spirit has its validity but it is a relative validity, and it is either supplanted by another kind of spirit, or it can be supplanted by the Yin, the opposite principle. It can be completely subdued until it disappears almost completely. There was such a time of complete obscurity between the fourth and eight centuries A.D., and there have probably been other times in history. We are little informed about the time that followed and the time that went before the downfall of great empires; we suddenly discover a new civilization, and the events in the preceding period of time are hidden in deep obscurity.

Well now, Nietzsche often speaks of contempt. Here he says: "Once the soul looked contemptuously on the body, and then that contempt was the supreme thing." This idea of contempt is rather strange. It is almost a technical term. He means by "contempt" a negative attitude dramatically expressed. The negative attitude of Christianity was against the flesh—that the flesh should be overcome was the highest ideal even. But he says it reached even the soul; the soul itself became meager, hideous, and famished because it lost the body. That statement does not coincide with the Christian teaching at all, where the more you overcome the body, the more you are supposed to become beautiful and fat in heaven. But psychologically you find that the soul really becomes thin because it loses its raison d'être. What becomes beautiful and big and fat is a certain system of ideas called "a belief," "a conviction," but your soul lives in such a system of ideas only as long as the thing is new, as long as you see the danger from which you escape. It is as if you had passed the mountains with very bad roads and had reached the plain, and you say, "What a beautiful plain!" having in mind still those high mountains behind you. And whenever you think the plain is not particularly interesting, you look back and realize that it was very rough there and the plain is at least a smooth road. But lose sight of those mountains and you will long for them, because the scenery was much more beautiful than the plain, which is horrible, and you are thoroughly sick of it. And when you come to the first foothills where you can climb up instead of going on the level all the time, you praise the moment. So it is with such a truth. As long as the system of Christian ideas worked, the soul lived. The soul itself produced them because those formulations were needed.

One should try to imagine the actual conditions of late antique civilization, the Greek and Roman civilizations for instance, and what their leading ideas were. Usually one has very little knowledge of it, so we cannot value the sayings of Jesus, because we don't know to whom he spoke. We cannot understand certain things at all, because we are unable to reconstruct the conditions in which those words were said. It has been pointed out with a sort of surprise that in the Hinayana Buddhism—the original small school of Indian Buddhism—there were no gods apparently. But if you know that Buddha's first teaching was over against a pantheon of two million Hindu gods, you quite understand why he did not feel the need of inventing new ones. He was already sick of all those gods so he ceased talking of them. Just as a person who hears every day of God, in prayers and all sorts of allusions, will get tired of it; so if one has grown up in pious surroundings, one cannot even say the word Jesus without a feeling of disgust and contempt. And Nietzsche was the son of a parson. He heard those words all the time, and that explains why he used the word contempt. The early influences of his youth are of course very important. So you must not only keep in mind the condition of the world to which the prophet spoke, but also the condition in which he was himself as a child. Prophets coincide in a way with their time. He would not have gotten the full impact of the spirit of our time if he had not been the son of a parson, the representative of a dying system and a dying spirit. He could taste the thing in its purest substance: he got the essence of his time.

Nietzsche's idea, that with all that theological talk the soul is not fed, is perfectly plain: only the mind eats and the soul is far from being properly fed. On the contrary she is famished and therefore eager for a change, for a new idea that really would give her food. And the new idea came because the original condition, in which the Christian teaching was entirely right, had vanished into an antique world. Out of the background of the Christian medieval world the new idea was necessary in order to feed the soul against the time when the spirit had been over-valued: a teaching was needed that emphasized the body and the flesh again. There is a new book by Keyserling, La Révolution Mondiale et la Responsabilité de l'Esprit, in which he speaks of the révolte des forces telluriques, the forces of the earth, and he says that man himself consists of 80 or 90 percent of forces telluriques. His idea is that this revolution ought to be quenched by the spirit; the spirit should settle that force tellurique. Now this is exactly the Christian idea: the spirit says, you ought, but "hélas! avec combien peu de succès." He says himself that it won't help at all, but nevertheless he follows that spirit. What he sees quite truly, however, is the complete reversal: all the spiritual values come down, and up comes the earth and man as he is, not as he ought to be or as we would like him to be. He comes up as he is, inexorably, and if we suppress him he becomes worse, and this being claims recognition. That is the task, and it will lead to an entirely new valuation of man and an entirely new religious idea: the recognition of man as he really is and of the world as it really is over against a background of illusions and projections. And that will last until the world as it is has been more or less accepted, and then that truth will become dry, most uninteresting—and something else will follow.

These waves make the periodicity of history. Presumably they follow the months of the Platonic year, but we have only had the experience of about three months, and that is very little indeed in comparison with the fact that each Platonic year contains twenty-six thousand ordinary years. But man of course has existed for quite a number of Platonic years. The consciousness of man goes back for many hundred thousand years, of which twenty-six thousand is only a small part; so he has gone many a time in a more or less conscious condition through all the seasons of the Platonic year and has therefore the experience of those seasonal changes in his bones. For instance, we have now the change from the spring into the winter sign. That has nothing to do with the stars. It is merely a projection of a peculiar periodicity in man that probably shows itself in this change of religious and ethical values; also probably in a change of temperament or something like that, a change in the constellation of the unconscious. Now, a bit further on in this chapter Zarathustra says: "Is your soul not poverty and pollution and despicable ease?" What does he mean by "despicable ease"? That is not the translation in the book by the way. There it is "wretched self-complacency."

Mrs. Baynes: He means that people prefer to sleep rather than to take life problematically.

Dr. Jung: Exactly. It is the tendency of people to live and not to bother, and he was confronted with a world which was thoroughly materialistic. It was the eighth century and they did not like to be bothered—as the world never likes to be bothered; it always likes to take things as easily as possible. And people who don't realize this despicable ease never can understand the meaning of the Superman. Nietzsche thought it was a duty, our highest moral obligation, to produce the Superman, that man higher than ourselves. This does not exhaust his idea of the Superman of course, as we shall see later on. Here he gives us a new idea. He says the Superman is the sea: "in him can your great contempt be submerged." What does he denote by this comparison of the Superman with the sea?

Dr. Reichstein: All life comes from the ocean. It is the collective unconscious.

Dr. Jung: Yes, the ocean is always the symbol of the collective unconscious. It is an all-embracing general symbol, and the self, the Superman, is also the ocean, according to Zarathustra. So the self is the whole collective unconscious, the origin and the end of life, the origin of rain and of all rivers, of the whole universe, the end of all distinctness.

Mrs. Baumann: Is it not the same as "smaller than small yet greater than great"?

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is the formula of the self: there is a peculiar correspondence with smallness and greatness. The self is all-embracing yet the smallest—a paradoxical concept which is beyond our grasp, as it needs must be.<sup>7</sup> Well, that shows that Nietzsche does not understand the Superman as a higher, more differentiated sort of man. We are the ape-man, for instance, which would be more human. Often it looks as if he meant just that, but he had intuitions about it, and in such a passage we see that the thing is far more complicated.

<sup>7</sup> One of the particular attractions for Jung of the early Gnostics was their belief in a god at once before and beyond the opposition necessary for consciousness and still in complex relation to other supernatural beings. In Jung's theory, this condition of containing the opposites—small/great, male/female, etc.—was a description of the self. See CW 9 ii, ch. 4.

LECTURE V

Dr. Jung:

Here is a question by Miss Hannah: "It seems to me so odd that Zarathustra should use the expression 'bowels of the Unknowable One,' as one is more inclined to connect bowels with the earth?"

But this expression seems to me very apt, for "bowels" simply means contents, and in "the Unknowable One," Nietzsche surely refers to the unknown god who, he said, was dead. It is a funny thing, however, that throughout the whole of Zarathustra you get a feeling as if this god whom he calls dead were not absolutely dead. He is somehow lurking in the background as the great unknowable one of whom you should not speak; you simply should not take him into consideration: he is too dangerous to be mentioned. So his peculiar expression that you should not be interested in the bowels of the unknowable one means that there is somebody there, only he is utterly taboo. You see, that is explained psychologically by the fact that Nietzsche calls himself an atheist, for anybody who calls himself an atheist is a negative theist; naturally he would not deny a thing if he did not think it was there to be denied. He would not add the a. It is an admission of God when you call yourself an atheist, because whether you assert a thing or deny it, you confirm that it is: you cannot deny a thing without giving it a certain existence. It does exist somewhere even if you assume that it exists only in the minds of other people; that it exists in the minds of other people means that it does exist. So Nietzsche's God exists somewhere and has contents but he must be careful not to mention them.

That an atheist is particularly concerned with God is not understood with us because we are still unspeakably barbarous in that respect, but the East is a bit more differentiated in such matters. They have the saying that a man who loves God needs seven rebirths in order to be redeemed or to reach Nirvana, but a man who hates God needs only three. And why? Because a man who hates God will think of him much oftener than a man who loves God. So the atheist hates God, but he is in a way a better Christian than the man who loves him; Nietzsche is a better Christian and far more moral than the Christians before and after him. You see that explains a great deal of Zarathustra, which is a highly moral book. If anybody should try to live that teaching, he would have astonishing experiences. He would certainly feel himself to be a better Christian than all those before him. He could buy a halo for his own private use and make himself the first and only saint of his private church. It is true of course that we use that expression "the bowels of . . ." rather in connection with the earth, and in a psychological sense we mean the contents of the unconscious, which we think of as below. But to the Christian era the unconscious was by no means below; it was a fiery and luminous heaven above. All the heavenly "powers and principalities" of the Catholic church are really the contents of the unconscious,<sup>1</sup> but at that time they projected the unconscious into the world above, and only through the descent which has taken place in the last four hundred years, has it been brought down into the lower regions, the earth, into the real bowels, the intestinal region, the kingdom of the sympathetic nervous system.

Then there is a question by Mrs. Bailward: "Is the artist the person who can frame the here and now of the creative forces? Does the body do the same for the self?—and is the self under the law of the uniqueness of the moment in time?"

That is an exceedingly philosophic question. The artist can of course frame the here and now of the creative forces; his creative force consists in the fact that he can express the actual creative moment because he is creative, or the instrument of the creative force, which is synonymous. Through being creative one creates the thing that has come into existence in this moment, that was in a potential existence before. And the body in a way does the same for the self; the body is the expression of a preexisting uniqueness. It is as if built up by a preexisting uniqueness; it is the realization of a unit of life. Naturally, that is not the biological way of expressing it. Biological science tries to explain life through a sort of physiological causality, the causality of the chemical transformations of the body, as we try to explain the evolution of certain forms by certain climatic conditions or other physical or physiological conditions. The success of that explanation is not very great, however, on account of our profound lack of knowledge. Why, for instance, in a certain geological period should a certain species of animal prevail. Of course, there has always been a certain amount of sea, but in one period we had water animals and in another land animals; and we only can assume that the water animals moved slowly out of the sea and became amphibious, and then developed into animals that preferred to be on firm ground. But why and how they could do so remains absolutely dark. We can not imagine how a fish could suddenly change into an animal that walks on four legs and breathes through lungs; an indescribable fact must have taken place that provided those animals with lungs. Even the principles of Darwin cannot explain why they did not just die out instead. If there was a lake or part of a sea, for example, that became more and more shallow and slowly dried up, then the water would become more and more salty and the fish would have perished because they cannot live with more than a certain percentage of salt. In the Red Sea there are no fish, no life can exist with that concentrated amount of salt.<sup>2</sup> We can assume that the sea was continuously filled with fresh waters and so evaporated slowly, but from what we know, while the lake was drying out, the fish simply perished and they did not develop lungs.

As a matter of fact the strange thing that paleontology now teaches us is that in a new age a huge number of new species appear, perfectly finished and developed; and we can find no traces of the stages where they were half-baked. It seems as if all those animals were suddenly there. So, in most recent times, among the people concerned with those problems—the biologists and zoologists and so on—there is a growing inclination to assume a peculiar creativeness in life, able to produce a new species in an unknown way. We have a certain analogy in the so-called mutation of plants, where a new plant comes into existence, finished, like those famous beeches with red leaves, for example, which suddenly sprang into existence about the middle of the nineteenth century: it just happened.<sup>3</sup> And there are other well known cases of mutation of trees. So, such experiences have led modern biologists to think that there is a peculiar creative factor in life.

Now, if we apply that idea generally we come to the conclusion that there is a preexistent uniqueness, or a unit of life, that creates a certain body according to its own peculiar uniqueness, creating it exactly as an artist creates a work of art out of a preexisting vision. And if the body is created by the self, and the self is called a uniqueness, then we identify this uniqueness with the uniqueness of the moment of creation.<sup>4</sup> This is substantiated in a way by the very awkward fact that the uniqueness of the particular moment in time in which a thing is created is characterized by certain qualities, as is proved by the fact that the horoscope can give the character of an individual.<sup>5</sup> If it were impossible to deduce a human character from a horoscope, then of course that whole idea of the identity of the uniqueness of the self with the uniqueness of the moment when a thing comes into existence would not be valid; but as a matter of fact you can deduce from a horoscope, you can show the character of an individual to an amazing extent.

We will now continue our text, the last part of the sermon of the Superman:

It is not your sin—it is your self satisfaction that crieth unto heaven; your very sparingness in sin crieth unto heaven!

The German word for sparingness is Genügsamkeit. I would call it frugality: your frugality crieth unto heaven.<sup>6</sup>

Where is the lightning to lick you with its tongue? Where is the frenzy with which ye should be inoculated?

Lo I teach you the Superman: he is that lightning, he is that frenzy.

Here again is this term “great contempt.” He says—several paragraphs before this—that the greatest thing one can experience is the hour of great contempt. He obviously makes rather a point of it, so he must mean some definite psychological fact. What do you think he means by it here?

Mrs. Baynes: Does it not mean reaching a point of view where you are prepared to give up the most precious thing that you have?

Dr. Jung: We will see whether that hypothesis fits. When I ask what they desire the most, the most precious thing, plenty of people will say, to be happy. A whole continent believes in being happy-go-lucky, that is proverbial, we all believe in it to a certain extent. Then, others will say they desire reason the most. You know the Goddess of Reason was put upon the throne in Notre Dame instead of God—I think it was in 1796.<sup>7</sup> Then, virtue is the best you can desire according to certain convictions. And righteousness is surely praised by many people as the very finest thing they can possibly possess; you also can call it respectability, because if you feel very respectable you are quite righteous. And the most wonderful of all is pity, because pity is at the bottom of Christian love. The pity for all things living is the very essence of Buddhism also.<sup>8</sup> It even goes so far that every morning one of the priests in the temple carefully wipes the floor with a broom, not to remove the dust but the insects that might be trodden upon, so they are invited to leave the sacred precincts to preserve themselves from possible injury to their legs or little bodies. You see, we have here a series of very noble things which humanity has always held to be the most precious. So the hypothesis put forward by Mrs. Baynes surely explains this contempt as the contempt of all those virtues. Now why should the hour of this contempt of all the noble ideals, the most desirable precious things, be the greatest moment in life?

Answer: Because these qualities are only the compensation for the shadow.

Dr. Jung: So you would conclude that Nietzsche is really looking for the dark things that lurk behind all these beautiful virtues, as if they surpassed all the good mankind could desire.<sup>9</sup> This is another hypothesis. He says: Not your sin but your frugality, your niggardliness even in sin, crieth unto heaven. So the contempt really comes from the fact that the shadow is so great and thick that one begins to despise all the virtue mankind has praised in the past. For what is it? It creates in consequence a shadow as dark as hell, so overpowering that it is really not worthwhile to praise all those virtuous qualities; the greater reality is in the darkness and not in those ideas of beauty and light. That he says your frugality in sinning cries unto heaven means that he sees those ideals as a sort of pretext or subterfuge over against the overwhelming fact of the sin in man. Here you see the good Christian but with the a in front of him; he sees all that as sin, which is the way the Christians would speak. He is still under the shadow of the church; he is within the sacred precincts, and therefore he feels quite blasphemous. You see, the dark things which are understood to be sin are only sin when you are entirely upon the standpoint of the preceding list of good qualities; if you once imagine that these are really the most wonderful ideals man could aspire to, then naturally everything which is less good seems to be dark and sinful or immoral. So he wishes for a spark of lightning to sting people out of that idea of despicable ease, to wake them up so that they can see the real truth of man. And he holds that this lightning which should lick people with its tongue is the Superman.

One could call that a sort of speech metaphor, conveying the idea of a situation in which everybody was more or less asleep, without realization, and then something suddenly happens which wakes them up, a terrible crash or a stinging pain, and for that lightning would be a good simile. But there is something more in this image of the lightning. This simile turns up, for instance, in a Chinese inscription, which surely was quite unknown to Nietzsche. It is a verse and I cannot quote it literally, but the idea is that from time to time mankind gets into an inexplicable state of sleep or of torpor, exactly like the mood in nature before a thunder storm. The air is heavy and man and beast fall asleep; the trees are without movement; everything becomes like lead. The Chinese text says that something is spread over the earth like a wonder which cannot be explained, and then follows an invocation to the dragon to rise. He is lying coiled in the deep, but he should rise and strike with the lightning of his tail so that the whole of nature would wake up again.<sup>10</sup> It is exactly the same metaphor, but the symbolism is more conspicuous. For that dragon means what?

Mrs. Crowley: If it were Hindu it would suggest the Kundalini.

Dr. Jung: Yes, but what would be the Chinese meaning?

Mrs. Fierz: The Yang principle.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that former condition is the Yin condition, where everything has taken form. Everything is real, concrete, indubitable; and when things have become, they go to sleep. That dormant condition means that the Yin principle has swallowed the Yang principle completely. It is like a dark cloud spread over the earth, but within that cloud is the lightning lying coiled, ready to strike. Then the Yang strikes and the cloud opens, the rain falls, the air becomes clear, the rivers begin to move, new plants come up from the parched soil, and new life is created. So that simile most certainly refers to a psychological condition underlying the symbolism, which you see very clearly in the Chinese text. It is a close analogy, as Mrs. Crowley has just mentioned, to the Kundalini serpent which is called the coiled one; the serpent is coiled in a dormant condition in the depths of the darkness, in the cave, and when the moment comes when something has to happen, the Kundalini suddenly rises and hisses and causes something like a lightning flash, a sudden sting. This peculiar quality of the Kundalini describes a psychological moment, the breaking up of an old order, and it starts to break up through a sort of intuitive flash; somebody suddenly has an intuition, and that is the first lightning which then dissolves a whole complicated situation which one thought would last forever.<sup>11</sup>

Nietzsche understands the idea of the Superman in that sense. He holds that man has gotten accustomed to the idea that it is worthwhile to live for all those virtues, for all sorts of ideals and beautiful things, and would always remain the same. He is in a certain order: he has his position, and it is just as if it had been ordered for eternity. You know, no treaty is made which people don't suppose to be forever; no state, no church, is founded which is not for eternity: everything should last forever. It is an apparently desirable condition which has been brought about and which should always last, in spite of the fact that we know very well how long treaties usually last. But again and again man seeks to establish something for eternity. And that is not ridiculous because it is the essence of civilization or culture that it can and should resist time; it is the characteristic of anything man-made that it is able to resist the continuous dissolving activity of time and nature. That is why we build houses instead of having mere shelters under trees, or tents, or any other very transitory contrivance; we make things as du-nable as possible in order to establish the victory of man over nature and over the transformation of things in nature. If you should make a philosophy with the idea that it was only for the next fortnight, of course you never would make it; you make a philosophy with the assumption that you are going to bring out a truth that will last for several thousand years at least. This tendency to create a form of civilization—any form, religious, political or social—always has that claim of durability, of resistance against the onslaught of time and nature. And it is such a condition, the tail end of the Middle Ages, into which Nietzsche was born.

You see the Middle Ages reached right up to the beginning of the great war; we still had the feudal system, we had kings and feudal princes according to the ideas of the Middle Ages—of course in a somewhat different form, but more or less as it always had been during the last two thousand years. The best proof of that is that we still founded our religious and philosophical convictions upon the New Testament. That is the highest authority and it has naturally created a certain social form and morality, and certain religious and philosophical convictions; even if these convictions have an a to them, even in the negation of those old beliefs, they are and have remained as they always were. Nietzsche was born in such a period, as I said, and he felt that it was a dormant condition which had to be exploded by the idea of the Superman, which means that man is not a definite form, a definite entity that remains the same for millions of years, but that he can change, undergo a mutation as it were, and suddenly transform into something else.

Of course, that is again a very Christian idea: it is the idea of Christian conversion. In the early days of Christianity, they held the same conviction, that when a man had undergone the mysterium or the sacramentum (the two terms are synonymous: in the early church it was called the mysterium and later they preferred to call that old mystery ritual the sacramentum, but the process was exactly the same), he was made sacred, or mana, by a transformation into something else. He was nearly drowned in water and pulled out of it as if out of a womb. The baptismal font in the church was still called the uterus ecclesiae in the Missale Romanum, and the people who had undergone the transformation were quasi modo geniti.<sup>12</sup> It was understood to be a complete and thorough change of man; he was made into something new, no longer the old Adam. He put on Christ, the new body, and was made into a child of God, an immortal being. Without baptism or without taking communion, one misses the pharmakon athanasias, the medicine of immortality, and is merely mortal like the animals; one has no soul. That belief went so far that old Tertullian was convinced that if a man was baptized he could not sin any longer, and if by chance a man should sin again, something must have been wrong with the baptismal ceremony, so it had to be repeated. He was enormously surprised to find people who went on sinning in spite of the second baptism; then he thought they were children of Satan and utterly lost: they simply had to be dropped. Nowadays, when a person in a religious movement is not behaving according to rules and is not saved, he is called neurotic and sent to the analyst. And then the analyst asks quite justifiably, what can he do, is he greater than God?

This belief that through a religious conversion we become quite different beings, is still alive among us. Somebody becomes a Christian Scientist, for instance, and is supposed to be an entirely changed man; formerly, he was a rascal, and now look at him: he does not drink or waste his money running about with women, so Christian Science must be the truth. Then the Methodists and the Baptists and the Salvation Army and the Oxford Movement and four hundred other denominations walk upon the stage and tell you that all their members have become entirely different people. Therefore, they all contain the truth. Now, what truth? It is the old belief that that thing is the living truth which changes people completely; the criterion for the truth is that man is changed, proving that there is some secret magic in these forms or convictions. That was the belief of early Christianity, and it is the same idea which Nietzsche proclaims here: the idea that the Superman would be the lightning which would upset the dormant condition of his world, so that man could change. It is not exactly the Christian transformation through the grace of God or baptism. It is due to man, because when God is dead he appears next in the one who kills him; then the divine creative faculty needs must dwell in man. And then man has the faculty of transforming into the Superman, by which is not meant a man of greater virtue but a man who is simply beyond this man of today, a different creature obviously, a man who can deal with the darkness in human nature.

Dr. Reichstein: I think the oldest picture of this idea is the Iranian myth of the original primordial man who sleeps and must be awakened.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is a similar idea, and there are other primitive beliefs that the first couple, or the first god, was asleep and had to be awakened.

When Zarathustra had thus spoken, one of the people called out: "We have now heard enough of the rope-dancer; it is time now for us to see him!" And all the people laughed at Zarathustra. But the rope-dancer, who thought the words applied to him, began his performance.

To whom does the rope-dancer refer here?

Remark: To Zarathustra?

Dr. Jung: Well, I must say it is not quite clear. We only know that there is a man who is really a rope-dancer, and when the people call for the rope-dancer he sets to work.<sup>13</sup> There is a certain confusion between the real and the symbolic rope-dancer here.

Mrs. Baumann: It might be the Superman.

Dr. Jung: Yes. You see, the ordinary man could not be compared to a rope-dancer; he lives in good houses in safe cities that are watched over by the police, and there are excellent laws, and boundaries to every country, and settled conditions. But the rope-dancer walks on a very high rope in the air; it is an acrobatic stunt and if he falls down he is killed. It is a tremendous risk, the symbol of a dangerous transitus. So the Superman could be man in the situation of a rope-dancer, running as great a risk as the rope-dancer who risks his life. It is as if there were a misunderstanding here between the audience and the speaker. The people think Zarathustra is speaking of the real rope-dancer while he is really speaking of the Superman of whom the rope-dancer would be a symbol.

Now, we have been reading the sermons or reflections of Zarathustra, and there has been very little action, but here we come upon action again, as in the descent of Zarathustra from the mountain and the meeting of the old wise man. And whenever talk transforms into action there is a reason for it. Do you know what it is? Why should talk suddenly become action?

Mrs. Fierz: If what is to be told is not clear, not conscious enough to be said in words, a sort of symbolical action would take the place of the word.

Dr. Reichstein: Speech is always one-sided, and this action could be the reaction from the unconscious brought out by the speech before. He teaches more the Yang side, and the action might be the reaction of the Yin side.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that would more or less coincide with what Mrs. Fierz said. Something is lacking in the sermon apparently; with that statement, "I teach you the Superman," a certain culmination is reached, and for the moment he cannot go beyond. He says he is the lightning and he is the madness, and now of course the sermon should continue and say where it starts, and of what the effect of the lightning or the frenzy consists, and how it shows. But there he seems to have hurt himself against a snag, so the sermon goes underground. It is like a pause in a speech: one's thoughts suddenly leave one and one has to do something about it and then it turns into action, and the action must be expressive, symbolical of the spoken word.

Mr. Nuthall-Smith: It would be when he gets tired of talking.

Dr. Jung: Zarathustra is not easily tired of talking.

Mr. Nuthall-Smith: But the people get tired.

Dr. Jung: He pays no attention to the people, as we have evidence for in the next chapter where it says: "But Zarathustra, looking at the people, wondered, and then he spoke thus: . . ." You see, he continues; he is not afraid of tiring people with his talk, and it is quite a while before the rope-dancer can get to work, because Zarathustra is still speaking. No, he has hit upon something there, he has hurt himself against an invisible snag, and that is of course the transition over to the question how that idea will work, what it means to man and what it means to himself above all. For instance, when somebody says a whole mouthful and then suddenly stops and cannot find the next sentence, you can be sure that he has hit upon something in himself which caused the hesitation.<sup>14</sup> If a person announces as his sacred conviction that things should always be done in such and such a way, and then doesn't know what to say next, it is because the devil has hooked on, asking: "Do you really know your own conviction?" or "Do you really mean what you say?" And obviously he does not know then what he has said or what his conviction was. It often happens when people say more than they can swallow, that they are suddenly disturbed from underneath; they forget what they wanted to say because the unconscious has withdrawn it. They were just gliding along, it was all plain sailing, and then they struck upon a shallow piece of ground where the unconscious was close to the surface: suddenly the unconscious hooked on. In such cases, the symbolic or symptomatic action follows.

This is such a moment. Zarathustra hesitates, he looks upon the people as if he were wondering about them. As a matter of fact he should wonder about himself, because here Nietzsche touched something that gave a spark for the time being. He is able to go on, but in the meantime, while Zarathustra goes on talking, the symbolic action begins to work. Now, this rope-dancer is quite obviously a relation of Zarathustra—he is his symbolic action—and I think we are quite safe in assuming that he represents Nietzsche's inferior side, because all the preoccupation with the rope-dancer in subsequent chapters shows that he is really concerned with that man and sees himself in him. So we may assume for the time being, as when one dreams of an inferior person, that this is the shadow figure, the inferior man in himself. And it really is the inferior man in him that has hooked on here, saying: "Now what about that transition to the Superman? How can you become the Superman? For it is expected of you, Zarathustra; of you personally, Friedrich Nietzsche. How do you get beyond your migraines, your vomiting and sleeplessness and chloral and all the other narcotics, and your terrible sensitiveness and irritability?"<sup>15</sup> You see that would happen in every one of us. Now he starts again to speak about the Superman, because he begins to wonder what the effect or the idea of the Superman really means to him personally. So he says in the way of reflection:

Man is a rope stretched between the animal and the Superman—a rope over an abyss.

This is the answer he is giving to the doubts as to how man can get across to the Superman, by what means that change can be made, and why it should be made. Those are the doubts of the inferior man, so this is almost in the way of an admonition.

A dangerous crossing, a dangerous wayfaring, a dangerous looking-back, a dangerous trembling and halting.

What is great in man is that he is a bridge and not a goal: what is lovable in man is that he is an over-going and a down-going.

<sup>15</sup> "Constant headaches, constant vomiting, all my old ills are back again, wrapped up in a nervous exhaustion which renders the entire machine useless. . . . I am not suffering from a disease of the brain" (To Franz Overbeck, 4 July 1888, in Letters/Middleton).

In German it is Übergang and Untergang, which would be literally a going-over or a going-beyond, and a setting like the sun. He says:

I love those that know not how to live except as down-goers, for they are the over-goers.

I would prefer to say: "I love those who live not, save as suns setting, for they are going beyond."<sup>16</sup>

I love the great despisers, because they are the great adorers, and arrows of longing for the other shore.

By these words he is soothing himself or explaining to himself why the longing for the Superman or going beyond man is a greater virtue than remaining the ordinary man. He says to himself that he loves those men who don't remain what they were, but who live in order to change, to live beyond themselves in order to become.

I love those who do not first seek a reason beyond the stars for going down and being sacrifices, but sacrifice themselves to the earth, that the earth of the Superman may hereafter arrive.

He denies the Christian idea of self-sacrifice for a thing which is beyond the world, for an extra-mundane spirituality. He doesn't see any merit in killing the body for the sake of the spirit, and moreover, one would never be changed by sacrificing oneself merely to the spirit. His idea is that it takes greater courage, greater virtue, and a greater sacrifice, to live, to sacrifice oneself to the earth, to reality; for if one sacrifices oneself to the actual concrete reality, one is changed and thus one prepares the way for the Superman. One occasionally comes across such problems in people in analysis, particularly in cases of transference. You see it sometimes happens to pious people that they get neurotic and unfortunately enough they have to go through an analysis, and then—Oh Lord!—they even fall in love with the analyst. They get a transference which at times takes on a most disquieting religious aspect—the analyst takes on the aspect of Jesus: they would like to kiss his feet and call him Jesus. Then, they develop a most formidable resistance against such a blasphemous transference. But the more they resist it, the more they project—till he is almost overwhelmed by the negative Christian projections. Of course he is then not only Jesus but also the devil himself. Naturally, the conflict is great in such people. The thing to which Nietzsche alludes happens to them: they get neurotic because they exaggerate their own spirituality. They identify with the spirits in heaven and imagine themselves spirits and nothing else.

But unfortunately they have a thick shadow. They have a body underneath all that show which won't agree with the spiritual show on top; it revolts against such spirituality, and that causes the neurosis. Then, in analysis, naturally they become aware of the fact that there is such a thing as body, that the spirit does not pay for the whole performance. The body has to pay the damage too. The unconscious insists very much then upon the physical presence of the analyst; and transference has the meaning that they should be brought to recognize the projection of their religious contents into as ordinary a human being as an analyst. Of course, they are mighty glad if he is not quite ordinary. "Such a great man!" His great mind excuses the fact that they have a transference, for if it were on any ordinary human being, it would be insupportable. But mind you, it is not his mind at all, I have known that for many years. At my last lecture at the University,<sup>17</sup> I walked downstairs behind some girls and I overheard their remarks: "I didn't understand a word of what he said today." "You did not understand? It was as clear as a bell." "Then can you explain such and such a thing?" "Oh well, I did not quite get it, but I know he is right, he is so strong and so healthy!"

So it is an awful thing to find all your values projected into an ordinary human creature with a body, particularly all your religious values. And mind you, if that figure has a mind, it is an obstacle, by no means an asset, because you have then to cast away all that mind business in order to see that it is a body. To see great religious values in the body is a very horrible discovery for a good Christian. It is just that to which the Lord himself alluded when he spoke of the possibility that he might be seen in the shape of the lowest of our brethren, that in the lowest of our brethren we would be able to recognize the Lord. A very wise word, but of course a more loathesome word to a Christian. It is not accepted, because they only want to pity the lowest of our brethren; the idea of seeing anything of high religious value in them is much too dangerous. I explained that once to a conference of theologians in Strasbourg and they all averted their eyes and walked round it. It was too hot a stew; they would not put a finger into it. Yet, it is of course a most important point; it is the problem of our time, in which of course Nietzsche also was concerned. He understands the acceptance of the man of earth as the self-sacrifice of greater merit than any sacrifice for the sake of spirit. He sees that acceptance of the real concrete man, identical with his body, as the greatest meaning of our time, for such a sacrifice would put modern man before a problem of almost unsurmountable difficulty. We would rather accept anything in the world, any devil or any hell, than accept ourselves in our particular concreteness. That is the thing of which we are most afraid. You see, that being is not even very sinful, not even superb in its sins—just hellishly banal and of a low order, not interesting at all. We would prefer superb sins than to be ourselves with all the banality which we represent. Therefore, he says:

I love him who liveth in order to know, and seeketh to know in order that the Superman may hereafter live. Thus seeketh he his own down-going.

Here is again the famous Untergang, the setting of the sun of all his ideals about himself; it is an extraordinary disillusion and an increase of knowledge. Without disillusion you never acquire knowledge, and without knowledge you never acquire a new consciousness, and without consciousness you never change: living unconsciously you remain forever the same.

I love him who laboureth and inventeth, that he may build the house for the Superman,

That is the new man who knows, whose consciousness is exceedingly individual if he can once swallow the fact of himself.

and prepare for him earth, animal, and plant, for thus seeketh he his own doing-going.

He goes down into the concrete reality. He becomes again man and disidentifies with his ideals. In other words, he creates a new ideal which is coincident with the real man, with man as he is in the body.

I love him who loveth his virtue; for virtue is the will to down-going, and an arrow of longing.

Again the virtue of the doing-going, the approach to the earth, to man as he is. And the arrow of longing is the changing, going beyond, because by accepting oneself as one is, one gets a longing to be different and that moves the whole world forward. We don't want to be ourselves, because we cannot stand ourselves; therefore, we never make progress. We remain as we are because we don't accept the only thing which can be motive power enough to bring it about. Only when we accept the thing which is loathesome to us, have we a real will to change, not before.

I love him who reserveth no share of spirit for himself, but wanteth to be wholly the spirit of his virtue: thus walketh he as spirit over the bridge.

That means that he loves the one who has the intuitions of such virtue, who at least intuitively grasps the meaning of that virtue, and thus in spirit crosses over the bridge.

I love him who maketh his virtue his inclination and destiny: thus, for the sake of his virtue, he is willing to live on, or live no more.

This shows that it is really a self-sacrifice because you risk living on or you risk dying. It is an enterprise which has all the risks of a real enterprise, which includes its specific dangers. It is amor fati.<sup>18</sup> This is the attitude now prevailing in Germany. It is the inner meaning of National Socialism. They live in order to live on—or to die. When you hear the really serious people talk, you realize that Nietzsche simply anticipated that style. They praise the attitude of being ready, and naturally any rationalist asks, for what? That is just the point—nobody knows for what. Therefore, they have no program; they have no mapped-out scheme which should be fulfilled. They live for the moment. They don't know where they are going. Very influential and competent people of that party acknowledge that they don't know, but one thing is certain: they are going, there is no return, they must risk it. Then, the rationalist asks: "Risk what?" The answer is, "Risk it." They don't know what they are risking; they simply take it as a matter of course that they must have this attitude, that one risks it, whatever it is. This is of course pure madness from a rationalistic standpoint, and that is what Nietzsche means. Therefore, he says the Superman is the lightning or the madness. One can say it is all pathological, or that it is a divine or a demoniacal madness, but that is exactly the madness Nietzsche means.

So Nietzsche is in a way the great prophet of what is actually happening in Germany.

I love him who desireth not too many virtues. One virtue is more of a virtue than two, because it is more of a knot for one's destiny to cling to.

This is a very wise word because the more virtues you are looking for, the more you get away from your real task. There is only that virtue which makes you live what you are.

I love him whose soul is lavish, who wanteth no thanks and doth not give back: for he always bestoweth, and desireth not to keep for himself.<sup>19</sup>

This is again the idea of the down-going, pouring life out. You see, we always try to retain, to economize our lives, but he preaches an attitude that is wasteful, that wastes oneself. So it means giving the whole of oneself without restriction, again a self-sacrifice to fate, to the things that have to happen from dark reasons—a complete surrender to life and fate.

I love him who is ashamed when the dice fall in his favour, and who then asketh: "Am I a dishonest player?"—for he is willing to succumb.

To perish. That is clear.

I love him who scattereth golden words in advance of his deeds, and always doeth more than he promiseth: for he seeketh his own down-going.

Again this attitude of out-doing oneself, of doing more than one really meant to do. It means following the impulse which is always behind everything we do, the organic instinctive impulse which has the character of a natural reaction, as all instinct has. It means to go the whole length of the way; you meant to go for two miles, but it carries you along for fifty miles, and you let it happen. Otherwise, there is no going down. You cannot manage fate; you never wind up with yourself if you can manage yourself, if you can say to God, "This and no more."

I love him who justifieth the future ones, and redeemeth the past ones: for he is willing to succumb through the present ones.

That complete surrender to the present necessities means of course a fulfilment, a redemption of the past generations, and of the unfulfilled lives that are waiting to be fulfilled. If we live completely, we surrender to their lives and redeem them. Also, we prepare for a future generation, because we have lived out our own lives; we have fulfilled them, and we leave no curse for the following generations—the curse of economized life.

I love him who chasteneth his God, because he loveth his God: for he must succumb through the wrath of his God.

You see he is at it again, without the a this time.

I love him whose soul is deep even in the wounding, and may succumb through a small matter: thus goeth he willingly over the bridge.

I love him whose soul is so overfed that he forgetteth himself, and all things are in him: thus all things become his down-going.

That would mean going down into reality in the sense of downfall. For he gets entangled; he easily gets wounded; fate takes hold of him and so he becomes complete. This is a complete, very perfect acceptance of what one is, drawing the last conclusion from the fact of being what one is.

Question: From one's own doing?

Dr. Jung: Well, it is a sort of religious teaching: it is very absolute.

I love him who is of a free spirit and a free heart; thus is his head only the bowels of his heart; his heart, however, causeth his down-going.

That is a confession. The heart is speaking through Zarathustra, not the mind. This is again exactly what is happening in Germany now, their heart is speaking through their head. And this heart desires destruction, because a world full of old ideas must be destroyed. It is not because the heart has invented the idea of destruction, but because in the heart is the secret source of a will that speaks through the head. But that is taboo to Nietzsche. He doesn't touch it.

I love all who are like heavy drops falling one by one out of the dark cloud that lowereth over man:

Here we have the image of the dark cloud spread over the earth, in which the lightning is hidden.

They herald the coming of the lightning, and succumb as heralds.

Lo, I am a herald of the lightning, and a heavy drop out of the cloud: the lightning, however, is the Superman.

That means the coming man of course. A coming attitude, a new spirit, should fill the human form and make over our hitherto prevailing world and culture. In Nietzsche's mind, the Superman is a new type of man with such an attitude.

LECTURE VI

Dr. Jung:

There are several questions. Mrs. Crowley asks: "When you spoke of symbolic action interrupting the discourse of Zarathustra, did you mean the flow or progress of the conscious realization was interrupted? In that case doesn't it put a negative construction on the action? Yet if a dream is the messenger of the conscious realization, why isn't such symbolic action another step in the development of the inner reality? In other words, do not the discourse and action serve as two aspects of the same reality? If it is to be looked upon as a negative interruption, that gives one the sense of a break in the rhythm of its growth and I would like to know which you meant."

I did not intend to convey the idea that the symbolic action was in any way inferior to the sermon. It is simply that the sermon has led up to a point where another element must come in; as if you pushed an argument to the very edge where you cannot go any further, and then instead of discussing, you do something. For instance, in Voltaire's Candide, just at the end, when the philosopher Pangloss has finished his long talk about the world, that it is le meilleur des mondes and that everything in it is the best thing possible, Candide calls his attention to his most disgusting venereal disease. But Pangloss proves that even his disease is most respectable, because he got it in a straight line from Columbus through the intermediary of a cardinal and his mistress. (That is true Voltairian style!—I am not responsible.) When he has finished his argument, Candide is quite overcome and says: Tout cela est bien dit mais il faut cultiver nôtre jardin, meaning that after all that talk they must do something reasonable because they had nothing to eat: they must plant their cabbages. Now, that is by no means an inferior interruption, it is surely much better to be planting and manuring cabbages; everybody was glad when that long speech was interrupted.<sup>1</sup>

In this case, the sermon stops for the time being and of course it is difficult to see what is now coming up. One usually notices in a series of fantasies that it is suddenly interrupted by something new, a different motive or an action. Or in a dream you wake up and you understand why you wake up: it is because the situation has become intolerable, or because the dream argument is finished. You have reached a certain amount of clarity and so it can vanish, and then another theme comes up. Now, here Zarathustra reaches a real culmination when he says: "Lo, I teach you the Superman: he is the lightning, he is that frenzy." That is the very essence of the idea he wants to convey to the audience. And what would you expect after such a statement?

Mrs. Crowley: That the lightning would fall; it would have to be illustrated.

Dr. Jung: Yes, you would expect that the lightning would now descend and that the audience would be struck by it—like the miracle of Pentecost, where the Holy Ghost descends in the form of tongues of fire.<sup>2</sup> Nothing of the kind happens, however. But something happens; the rope-dancer starts to work, the lightning has struck, as a matter of fact, but one does not see the effect. Yet, it could be shown that an effect has taken place. It is not visible here in the text, because the whole trend of thoughts is going underground, but it is the real man Nietzsche who writes those words. It is not Zarathustra and it is not the rope-dancer; and as he writes, the lightning strikes him. That will become obvious afterwards.

Mr. Allemann: Is it not also the word madness which struck him?

Dr. Jung: Exactly. Nietzsche could not have known his fate, but when he writes those words, the unconscious cries, "Halt!" Then the whole thing goes underground, and a peculiar action begins which symbolizes the coming events that could not be consciously foreseen.

Now Mrs. Baumann's question: "Would you kindly say a little more about the heart being the secret source of a will that speaks through the head? You spoke of it last time in connection with the paragraph where Zarathustra says: 'I love him who is of a free spirit and a free heart;

mistic philosophy of preestablished harmony, keeps insisting to the wide-eyed Candide that appearances to the contrary notwithstanding, all is for the best in this the best of all possible worlds, until at the book's end the young man sensibly remarks: "All this is well said, but we must cultivate our garden."

<sup>2</sup> "And there appeared to them tongues as of fire, distributed and resting on each one of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Spirit and began to speak in tongues as the spirit gave them utterance" (Acts 2:1-4).

thus is his head only the bowels of his heart; his heart, however, causeth his down-going.”

The idea is that his head is contained in the heart and the heart talks through the head. It is simply a sort of metaphor indicating that there is a secret will in the heart, behind the head and superior to the head. It is a well-known idea that people can argue in an apparently logical and rational way while really speaking the wishes of their hearts. I think it is Isaiah, for instance, who reproaches the false prophets for speaking the wishes of their hearts instead of the words of the Lord.<sup>3</sup> There, of course, it is a sort of depreciative remark. In this case it is appreciative. It means that there is a will to self-destruction in the heart, which leads finally to the Superman. The heart wills the drive towards the destruction of that lame and tame and despicable being called man, the most contemptible of all things to Nietzsche—the thing which should be overcome. So the will of the heart, that secret will to destruction, forces the head, and no matter what the head may think, it will be forced by the heart which knows that goal. The Superman can only live through the destruction of man as he is. The political analogy to this is the secret will to destruction all over the world, not only in Germany; of course, you see it very clearly there at present, but it is everywhere. Our actual collective unconscious seeks the destruction of millions. Why do they heap up ammunition and cannons? Surely not in order to play chess with them. Why do they invent poisonous gases? To kill of course. And why can nobody put a stop to it, damn it? We can only explain it by the fact that there is a superior will which forces all heads. And Nietzsche says here that he loves that will to destruction; therefore he preaches war. That is of course a sort of horrible nightmare to us, but the Eastern attitude would not see so much nightmare in it. They would say, where there are too many people, the number must be lessened, and so naturally a time will come when people will be exterminated to a certain extent: that simply has to be.

Mrs. Crowley: Is that not the very argument between Krishna and Arjuna in the beginning of the Bhagavad Gita?<sup>4</sup>

Dr. Jung: Well, you don't need to read it in the Bhagavad Gita. You can hear it in the East from the man in the street who has a natural wisdom in his veins; he is quite convinced and therefore he has no particular commiseration. You see, we make a hell of a fuss in Europe when several hundred thousand Chinamen are dying of starvation, or drowned by the floods of the Hoang Ho or the Yangtze-Kiang. The Chinamen don't bother so much. They say: Too much folk, they must go. But we Christians have so little faith in life that we think we must preserve every little nuisance that has come into existence. Of course, it is not nice for the individuals who are actually under the wheel, but, you know, we shall all be under the wheel when those bombs begin to rain down upon our cities. And we ourselves are continuously bringing that about—nobody wants to but everybody is doing it.

Now here is a question by Mrs. Baynes in reference to a lecture given by a professor of the philosophy of law from Paris. He was speaking about the psychology of power and the so-called antinomy of power, namely, that power is both good and evil, which makes an insoluble antithesis in the very being of power.<sup>5</sup> She says: "The lecturer at the Psychological Club on Saturday evening seemed to think that his standpoint was in direct agreement with that of analytical psychology. He said that the solution of conflict was by the reconciliation of thesis and antithesis, or in a word, by the transcending function which takes into consideration each of the opposites to be reconciled. But then he put forward the view that Christianity is still our best guide in the conduct of life. Is it possible to deny that Christianity demands the sacrifice of everything to the one principle, i.e., spirit? And has not analytical psychology shown that the psyche of modern man is in open revolt against this one-sidedness and forces to seek a new way that allows him to live the body as well as the spirit? Is not this the sum and substance of Nietzsche's point of view?"

That is, of course, Nietzsche's point of view, but on the other hand we must say that Nietzsche's point of view is exceedingly mysterious to the majority of even highly educated people. They don't understand it. When Zarathustra came out, I was living in Basel and I heard them talking about it, and they were all profoundly bewildered; they had not the faintest idea what it was about. It gave Jakob Burckhardt, the famous historian, a sort of shock. He was frightened by it.<sup>6</sup> And when the rumor got abroad that Nietzsche was in a lunatic asylum, they all said, "Thank heaven!" Then the case was clear: a nightmare was dissolved, and everybody was glad that that man Nietzsche was behind the bars. He had said awful things, but happily enough it was all foolishness, the dream of a madman. Something like that was the mood about fifty years ago, and nowadays it is not very different. Mankind has not become so much more intelligent in the meantime. Of course, we have had some experiences. The world war helped a great many people to realize what Zarathustra means, or to what it refers at least. But, for the most part, people were happily asleep in the dream of the Middle Ages and had no idea of such problems, as untold millions are still sleeping. They could live just as well in a time when the sun was still revolving round the world. So for such people the whole problem does not exist, and for them Christianity is still the best guide for their lives, no matter how the Christ symbol is understood. You see, it can be understood in many ways, in the Catholic way, in the Greek Orthodox way—there are four hundred Protestant denominations making a fuss about nothing. And then there are all sorts of nonorthodox and nonorganized ideas upon the subject. But the central figure is still Christ. As long as people are unable to realize what individuality is, what the self is, it is projected and there is nothing to be done about it. If it is not projected in Christ it is projected into another leader or a mythological figure, a Buddha or a new religious system. And, of course, the number of people who are not conscious of the self, who have not begun to realize that there is such a problem, are countless.<sup>7</sup> Therefore, one has to reckon with the fact of Christianity and to take it quite seriously as the best guide in these matters; for two thousand years, this system has been the best guide for us, as Buddhism has been in India.

<sup>5</sup> This was Professor Boris Vyacheslavzetz (1877-1954), a moral theologian and philosopher of law. His 1936 Eranos lecture, "Two Ways of Redemption: Redemption as a Solution of the Tragic Contradiction," was published in a translation by Ralph Mannheim in The Mystic Vision, vol. 6 of Selected Papers from the Eranos Yearbooks (Princeton, B.S. XXX, 1968).

<sup>6</sup> For Burckhardt, see above 9 May 1934, n. 7. Jung's years in Basel, where he attended the Gymnasium and the University, extended from 1886 to 1900. Nietzsche died in the year when Jung, a new doctor of medicine, moved to Zürich. After Nietzsche collapsed

As long as people can live in such a system, if it really expresses the facts of the unconscious, then it is good and there is nothing to be said against it; you cannot even criticize it. That means, of course, inasmuch as people are serious and have not simply put an a before their creed—instead of theism, atheism. I should not call atheists serious: they don't see that they are still theists in denying God. I understand by "serious people" those who know that such a thing as a religious experience is possible, and that it means the greatest good one could possibly imagine. Such people realize, of course, that the Christian symbol in Turin he was taken to Basel and then to an asylum in Jena where he stayed only briefly before being taken to his mother's home.

<sup>7</sup> See CW 12, par. 12, for an account of how religious projection may cut off unconscious content "from all participation and influence upon the conscious mind."

as it is handed down, as it stands now, does not provide a form through which a complete life is possible. And inasmuch as this is again a truth, we have the problem of what we can do or how we can live when that symbol fails us. For instance, we can assume that people who have such a problem are abnormal, that it is a sort of choice of unbalanced minds that simply cannot bow to tradition, who are too abnormal to be expressed by a fairly collective or normal symbol, so that even Christ as a comprehensive symbol, or what Buddha is in the East, is unable to express those particular whims of modern minds. That is the attitude of very intelligent people. They take it that these so-called modern problems are just sort of neurotic protuberances, more or less morbid, because they hold that everything that reasonably can be, is already expressed in the Christian dogma.

I had an opportunity lately to talk to some French people who are Catholic to the marrow of their bones, and for them that whole sphere of psychological or religious experience, which is so conspicuous in primitives for instance, simply does not exist. It does not exist, because it is in the church. But then you would assume that they believed in their Catholicism. Not at all! They are Catholic with an a, a-Catholics, but they are in the church. When they are positive, they say the soul is a religious problem, dealt with by the church, which has nothing to do with them; only inasmuch as they are connected with the church does the soul play any role at all. If they are negative they say that everything in the church and the whole psychological experience is nonsense. And they have to repeat it very often, with a spirit of insistence, in order to help the stored-up unconscious to abreact. They organize themselves most probably in a free-thinking society or a society for atheist propaganda. But their whole psychology is still in the Catholic church in its positive or negative form. To say anything about Nietzsche, or to mention analytical psychology to such people, is perfectly preposterous—you could talk to the penguins just as well. I felt like St. Malo, only I was not blind and deaf: I saw that they were penguins.<sup>8</sup> They were only the conscious half of man—the unconscious didn't exist—and the conscious half was the walls of the church.

The Christian symbol is still alive because millions of people are alive who need it very badly even, and for them everything is still contained within it, anticipating, one might possibly say, what we get through the collective unconscious in a certain form. For we constantly need Christian concepts in order to understand the collective unconscious. We apply Eastern concepts as well, but we also amplify them in order to explain what is in the Christian symbolism. It is true that late Christianity has a peculiar one-sidedness which doesn't fit our time, but that so-called spiritual attitude was once perfectly sound—it had to be. The knowledge of the conditions of antique civilization makes you understand why such a religion as Christianity was needed. Every emphasis laid upon the spirit was absolutely necessary; one cannot imagine what the world would have come to if such a reaction had not taken place. You know, when Buddhism first reached the barbarous people behind the borders of India, it came quite naked, without gods, because there were already two million gods in India. They were simply swamped by them, so, of course, as Buddhism was a sort of protest against the prevailing Hinduism, they thought they did not need them. They thought the decisive action took place in the sphere of man and not of the gods; even the gods had to become men in order to be redeemed. But when Buddhism reached Nepal, Tibet, and China, that condition of the Hinayana, the so-called small vessel, did not fit. They found there only the old tribal gods and fetiches and shamans, and all sorts of black magic, like the Bung religion in Tibet. So Buddhism instantly felt the need of gods again, and they had a series of prophets who revealed the existence of the Mahayana deities. The ideas of the bodhisattvas, who became even more important than Buddha himself, originated then, and all the goddesses, like Kwan Yin and the white Tara. They naturally had to invent female gods, of course not artificially, but through special revelation for this purpose, coming from the unconscious.<sup>9</sup>

So when this professor showed a very positive attitude to Christianity, I supported him, because I also have a positive attitude toward it. I could give you, for instance, absolutely psychological proof of certain most abstruse dogmatic concepts, like the trinity, or that point they made against the Arians (the followers of Arius) in the early church, that Christ was homo-ousios, of equal nature with God. The Arians said that he was only homoi-ousios, similar in his substance to the Father. That looks like pure nonsense to us, but they killed each other over the question, and it is of course of tremendous importance looked at from the psychological point of view.<sup>10</sup> We can be grateful to the old fathers of the church that they came to the conclusion that Christ must be homo-ousios, of the same substance as the Father: such a conclusion was absolutely necessary for our psychological development. Also it was for certain psychological reasons that Gnosticism had to be abolished. I am against the destruction of Christianity, because I hold that for thousands of years, the majority of people will not be able to get beyond the Christian conception; therefore, it ought to exist, one cannot abolish it. One should cease the foolishness of thinking that all people are the same and have the same creed. It is absolutely impossible. We are converting negroes for their own destruction, for example. It would be better to go to Africa and shoot them down than to make them degenerate by becoming Christians. The missionaries preached that they ought to wear clothes, but then the English became intelligent enough not to allow it—well, they couldn't help becoming intelligent after a while, there is no merit in that. In certain parts of Polynesia they give a good thrashing to the natives who wear trousers. They must go naked. But missionaries have unclean sexual fantasies if people are naked, so they tell them they are indecent. People would have far fewer sexual fantasies if they did go naked—but it would be “horrible.”

Here is a question by Mrs. Bailward: “With reference to the prophecy about Christ that he might appear as the lowest of the brethren, does this mean a kind of Valentino, Mussolini, or mediumistic prize-fighter?”

It is exceedingly improbable that Christ would appear in such a form, unless Mussolini, or the prize-fighter, should fall in love with you or you with him. Then it could be. As long as such people are somewhere on the horizon or painted upon the wall, they do little damage. Christ, being the symbol of the self, is the innermost thing and that only reaches you in the innermost. Mussolini would never do that. The reason why many people fall in love with fantastic tenors and Valentinos is because they are far away, so they are perfectly innocuous; every woman in love with a tenor knows in the bottom of her heart that he does not care a hang for her. It only becomes dangerous when real love comes in between and then people run away as quickly as they can, for where God is the nearest the danger is greatest.

Mrs. Bailward: Where is the quotation from?

<sup>10</sup> Arius (d. A.D. 336), in preaching that the substances of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost were separate and only similar, made the Christ one who came into existence. The Nicene Creed, aimed directly at the Arian heresy, insisted on the identity of substance among the Trinity, thus making the Son, like the Father and Holy Ghost, eternal.

Dr. Jung: Miss Hannah also asks that in her question. The quotation is from the fifth chapter of St. Matthew: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." That Christ can be the least of your brethren is, of course, very important.<sup>11</sup> The same thought is expressed in the more primitive Islamic mysticism, in a somewhat different and more complete way. (I have already quoted to you what my Sufi head-man said to me.)<sup>12</sup> You see, the Self is such a disagreeable thing in a way, so realistic, because it is what you really are, not what you want to be or imagine you ought to be; and that reality is so poor, sometimes dangerous, and even disgusting, that you will quite naturally make every effort not to be yourself. Therefore, the idea has been invented quite suitably that it is even very bad morally to be yourself. You also should not think of yourself; you should love your brother or your neighbor but not yourself. But unfortunately Christ said you should love your brother or your neighbor as yourself, and how can you love your brother if you don't love yourself? Or how can you forgive your brother if you don't forgive yourself? So one of the earliest Gnostic philosophers, Karpokrates, translated a certain passage in the gospel of St. Matthew in a very peculiar way—that passage where Christ says:

Whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment; and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council; but whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire.

Therefore if thou bringest thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee,

Leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift.

But Karpokrates interprets that last verse: If thou bringest thy gift to the altar and findest anything against thyself, go first and reconcile thyself to thyself.<sup>13</sup> That is a custom in red Indian tribes; when a man is not at one with himself on the day of the council meeting, he doesn't go to the meeting for he recognizes that he is not fit to be just and impartial and true if he is fighting himself. Therefore, Karpokrates rightly assumes that you cannot forgive if you don't forgive yourself; you cannot love if you don't love yourself. And that is really Christian. But late Christianity, hoping to find a means to get away from oneself, invented this infernal idea that you should love your neighbor and trample yourself underfoot, in contradistinction to the words of the Lord that you should love your neighbor as yourself, supposing that you naturally do love yourself. Otherwise, how can we be impartial, or how can we forgive? Therefore, that Christian love of your neighbor has become most suspect. If anybody tells me that he loves me more than himself and wants to sacrifice himself, I say: what does it cost?—what do you want afterwards? For afterwards a long account will be presented. Nature will present it because it is not unselfish; there is no such thing as unselfishness in that sense. But if you can love yourself, you will be on the way to unselfishness. It is such a difficult and disagreeable task to love oneself that if you can do that, you can love any toad, because you are worse than the most disgusting animal.

Now Miss Hannah also says: "I understood you to say last time that you have to cast the mind away in order to see it is the body, and that this was what Christ meant when he said you may find him as the lowest among our brethren. I suppose I am like the Strasbourg theologians, but I can't understand what this means."

Well, not necessarily the body, but the body is naturally under the same prejudice; the body being the lowest in man is, of course, the lowest among the brethren. Those Strasbourg theologians did not understand what I meant, because no Christian of these days understands this point; we are all twisted in our minds through education.<sup>14</sup> We are only told to love our neighbor and that it is wrong to love ourselves. For instance, one of the most ordinary arguments against analysis is that it makes people self-conscious: they only think of themselves. I say that is the very best thing you can possibly do if you do it systematically. You have done it in a dilettante way—you have only made fantasies—but from now on you write those fantasies, and as they are apt to be disgusting, they instantly draw attention to themselves. You find then that man is worth studying and also that it is well worthwhile to live with the body. Otherwise, what on earth are you going to live with? You will probably evaporate. Well, if you are going to disappear in a fast train to heaven within the next fortnight, I have nothing to say against it, but you cannot live as a disembodied spirit who by chance got into the body of a woman and doesn't even recognize her own hands.

<sup>14</sup> "Psychotherapists or the Clergy," a lecture given before the Alsatian Pastoral Conference at Strasbourg in May 1932 and published as a pamphlet in that year, and then in CW 11, pars. 488-538. Herein occurs the famous statement: "Among all my patients in the second half of life—that is to say, over thirty-five—there has not been one whose problem in the last resort was not that of finding a religious outlook on life. . . . This of course has nothing whatever to do with a particular creed or membership of a church" (par. 509). Doubtless the pastors could not understand how anyone could consider a psychotherapist a substitute for a clergyman, could identify a religious problem with the need for life-meaning, or could say that Catholicism is right for one person, a different denomination for another, and none at all for a third.

We will now continue our text. You remember the fourth chapter ends with: "Lo, I am a herald of the lightning, and a heavy drop out of the cloud: the lightning, however, is the Superman." Those are almost the same words as in the end of the chapter before and again we have the interruption.

When Zarathustra had spoken these words, he again looked at the people, and was silent.

Waiting, obviously expecting that something ought to happen.

"There they stand," said he to his heart; "there they laugh: they understand me not; I am not the mouth for these ears.

Must one first batter their ears, that they may learn to hear with their eyes? Must one clatter like kettledrums and penitential preachers? Or do they only believe the stammerer?

They have something whereof they are proud. What do they call it, that which maketh them proud? Culture, they call it, it distinguisheth them from the goatherds."

The German word is Bildung, which means a sort of education rather than culture.

"They dislike, therefore, to hear of 'contempt' of themselves. So I will appeal to their pride.

I will speak unto them of the most contemptible thing: that, however, is the last man!"

Zarathustra is expecting some effect from the lightning, yet nothing happens apparently, so he assumes that he has not yet said the right word to reach the audience—the word which penetrates—and he thinks that he might reach them if he speaks of the most contemptible of all things. You see, that feeling of not reaching his audience shows that in that inner event which is in the writer's mind while writing, there is a similar situation. He speaks the words and apparently something in him does not answer, something withholds his reaction. Then naturally, as a writer always does, he projects the inner fact outside of himself into his writings. Now what is the thing which does not react in him? What is so dull?

Mrs. Fierz: He speaks of Bildung here but he himself is gebildet.<sup>15</sup>

Dr. Jung: His conscious conclusion is that they are proud of their culture or education and therefore would not react. But I want to know why it is that when he speaks of the lightning, either the rope-dancer goes to work or nothing happens at all—his audience doesn't react, at least.

Dr. Bahadurji: Because the self in him does not come up to the level of his expectation, it doesn't respond to him. He thinks with his head, but the self in him is not in it.

Dr. Jung: Yes, one could put it abstractly like that. And one could also say that the thing which doesn't react in him is the collective man, because the collective man in the symbolism of the unconscious is always represented by an assembly, an audience, a crowd. And he is standing before the crowd in himself, so it would mean that the man of the crowd, the ordinary collective man in himself, does not react: he is dull. But that man has very much to do with the self; in an integrated self that man is present. He is even the outer fringe of the self; the self is like a crowd, therefore, being oneself, one is also like many. One expresses a totality. One cannot individuate without being with other human beings. One cannot individuate on top of Mount Everest or in a cave somewhere where one doesn't see people for seventy years: one only can individuate with or against something or somebody.<sup>16</sup> Being an individual is always a link in a chain; it is not an absolutely detached situation, in itself only, with no connection outside. It is sort of neurotic late-Christian prejudice that you should not love yourself. It is assumed that you would then be like a round ball lost somewhere in the universe without any reference to anything and with no relation to anybody. But as a matter of fact, if you can think with concentration, you realize how much you are connected with other human beings, how little you can exist without being related, without responsibilities and duties and the relation of other people to yourself. And all that remains completely in the darkness of participation mystique as long as you don't think of it.

So if you are, as it looks, an egotist, indulging in your own fantasies, then you are simply indulging in the fantasy of being cut off, all alone with yourself. Of course, public opinion helps you in that prejudice, assuming that anybody alone with himself is necessarily an egotist. When a person is quite modest and does not speak because he thinks he is not competent, people say he is proud; whereas he may be a decent fellow who doesn't want to make the same fuss as the other people, talking about things which they really don't understand. Individuation is only possible with people, through people. You must realize that you are a link in a chain, that you are not an electron suspended somewhere in space or aimlessly drifting through the cosmos. You are part of an atomic structure, and that atomic structure is part of a molecule which, with others, builds up a body. Life is a continuum, and nothing is absolutely severed from man within the living continuum; such a thing would instantly die and be cast away. Inasmuch as we live, we are in the continuum of life. If you think you are separated, it is nothing but a neurotic imagination, and that is of course morbid. But that you are thinking of yourself does not mean that you are morbid. It can be systematic. So if a man feels as the writer does in this case, talking to an audience that does not understand him at all, it means that he is not in touch with his own collective man, or he underrates or overrates something in himself. There is a lack of balance in his judgment.

Later on, Nietzsche explains it by the fact that he has been alone for too long a time, talking to the woods and the brooks and the trees. It is perfectly true that if a man is too much alone, he loses the connection with the collective man in himself and talks about matters which are above the heads of other people; and that is egocentric, too much in his own sphere, so that he does not know the language spoken in collectivity. Of course, that he has a new message is an additional difficulty. Nietzsche did in reality live much alone. He naturally moved in a lonely sphere; then he discovered something new, which one can only discover in solitude, and he tried to convey that new message through language which was absolutely new and exceedingly difficult. He didn't know the collective language, so he naturally would choose the most impressive form, hallowed by age, a beautiful epic or hieratic language. Such people always instinctively choose what we call a biblical style, in order to make an impression on people; it carries a certain authority. It stirs up all sorts of reminiscences of very early youth, and so is likely to strike home.

Even that language does not help in this case, however. It glances off, as it were, and people remain quite dull: the collective man does not react. But a certain reaction has taken place; even the collective man, though quite impervious to such language, can be reached through the unconscious. So, while he was speaking of the lightning or the madness, something in himself was reached: the unconscious was beginning to stir. It is also possible that in the collective man outside, the unconscious was stirred. That is true historically. One could not say that Nietzsche was completely understood—even those who made a great fuss about him did not understand what he really meant. But he created a stir, he tickled something in the unconscious; for he tried to formulate what is actually happening in the collective unconscious of modern man, to give words to that disturbance. Of course, Nietzsche could not expect an immediate reaction to his sermon because it must first go into the unconscious, into the belly of collectivity, and the reaction will appear in a quarter where he did not expect it at all. Well, he now tries another technique, he tries to speak to them about the most contemptible of all things, the last man.

It is time for man to fix his goal. It is time for man to plant the germ of his highest hope.

Now, how do you understand this? What is on Nietzsche's mind here? That is all spoken out of certain emotion.

Mrs. Baynes: Doesn't it mean that he feels it to be a critical time for himself and for humanity?

Dr. Jung: Exactly. He expresses here his conviction, his great emotion, over the fact that it is now time, that it is even exceedingly urgent. You find that in the chapter where Zarathustra is going to visit the happy islands and down into the volcano: Es ist Zeit, höchste Zeit.<sup>17</sup> Nietzsche's feeling was that we are now at a great turning point in history and in the evolution of man. One calls that a "chiliastic mood." This is an ecclesiastical word, having to do with the Book of Revelation, and the idea of the kingdom of God to come, the millennium.<sup>18</sup> And this feeling of the great turning point was not realized by Nietzsche alone. For instance, that book by Spengler, Der Untergang des Abendlandes, is in the same mood.<sup>19</sup> There is the same conviction that something is going to happen, that the times have been fulfilled and something new is coming. Therefore, Nietzsche says that it is now time for man to think of himself, or to fix his goal; it is time for man to plant the germ of his highest hope, which is of course the Superman. It is the idea that man must be ready to cast off or to change his former external attitude in order to give birth to a new being. St. Paul speaks of casting away the old Adam and clothing oneself or taking on Christ, which is the same idea of a complete change, like a snake shedding its skin and creating a new one; or like the phoenix burning himself in his own nest in order to resurrect again from the ashes in a rejuvenated form.<sup>20</sup> These are all archetypal symbols for a time when old things are destroyed in order to make place for the new. Now, whether that is true or not we cannot prove, but, sure enough, Nietzsche had the feeling that some great new revelation ought to take place, and he saw that in the idea of the Superman.

<sup>18</sup> In Revelation 20, it is said that holiness will prevail during a thousand-year period in which Christ will reign on earth and the ancient dragon, Satan, lie imprisoned.

Still is his soil rich enough for it. But that soil will one day be poor and exhausted, and no lofty tree will any longer be able to grow thereon.

Alas! there cometh the time when man will no longer launch the arrow of his longing beyond man—and the string of his bow will have unlearned to whizz!

I tell you: one must still have chaos in one, to give birth to a dancing star. I tell you: ye have still chaos in you.

He obviously speaks here of the last man in contradistinction to the people of our time who are still chaotic. The unconscious is not yet synthesized; that is, there is still a sort of melting pot in them where the elements can be re-formed, where new figures or new orders can be created. The old alchemistic philosophy tried to do that. The original condition of man was represented by chaotic pieces of elements that found themselves together with no order, quite incidentally; and then by the process of fire they were melted together, producing, it was assumed, a new spiritual development. That was due to a fundamental idea of alchemistic philosophy which expressed itself by symbols of chemistry. They could not use philosophical or even psychological terms, because the church made it much too dangerous to talk of such things. But the existence of chemistry was in itself an evidence of the powers that were breaking loose immediately after the beginning of the Reformation. That movement, however, which was really equal to modern psychology, had to move underground. It has to express itself by intricate symbols, just as early Christianity used mystery terms. Instead of saying "Christ," they used the word poimen, for instance. In the whole book of Hermas, which is surely Christian—at least, he was supposed to be the brother of the second pope—the name of Christ is not mentioned at all; he is referred to only as the poimen.<sup>21</sup> And baptism and the communion could only be alluded to by certain symbols, because of the danger of persecution. To have somewhat radical or liberal views was a very serious matter in the Middle Ages: one risked being roasted. Of course, Nietzsche knew nothing of alchemy. I am quite certain that he never read such stuff, for in his time those old medieval philosophers were thought of as being sort of idiots with idiotic fantasies. So that idea of the chaos in everybody is to him like a speech metaphor, but it is apt symbolism for the disordered condition of an unconscious that is not yet synthesized.

This is expressed in every individual by a certain lack of orientation, a vagueness, a feeling of being suspected, and of drifting, finding no direction and no meaning in life. In certain stages of analysis, particularly in the beginning, people realize very clearly that they have chaos in themselves and they feel lost in it. They don't know where that chaotic movement leads: often they don't understand at all what they are doing or what the analyst is talking about. It all looks perfectly aimless and incidental. Now, Nietzsche's idea is that out of that lack of order, a dancing star should be born. Here is the symbol of dancing again. Where have we met it before?

Dr. Jung: Exactly. So the dancing refers to Zarathustra, but there are other parallels later on. The dancing star would be in the twinkling star for instance, and the star would symbolize what in this case?

Mr. Baumann: Individuation.

Dr. Jung: Yes, it would be a symbol of individuation, a symbol of the concentration of one living spark, the spark of fire that fell into creation, according to the Gnostic myth.<sup>22</sup>

Mr. Baumann: Zarathustra said that one might find the germ of the highest hope in man. Does that mean that the individuated man is the last hope of man?

<sup>22</sup> Perhaps the central motif of Gnosticism is the presence in man of a divine spark (pneuma: spirit) which at once represents his removal from and his possibility of returning to higher spheres. See Kurt Rudolph, Gnosis, R. MdL. Wilson, ed. of translations (San Francisco, 1983), pp. 57f.

Dr. Jung: Well, this germ of the highest hope is the star. Man should plant a germ, which would grow up in the form of plant, and the plant would create a flower which would be the star. It would be what we call the Yoga plant, with the star flower. It is an age-old poetical metaphor to call a meadow full of flowers an image of the sky with its thousands of stars; flowers have those starlike forms, symmetrical structures. So if man succeeds in planting that germ, it is as if he were pregnant with a twinkling star. That explains also the dancing movement, the incessant twinkling of a star symbolizes its peculiar emanating activity. And this idea or feeling or intuition—whatever one calls it—explains the many arms of the Hindu gods. They represent the extraordinary twinkling activity of the divine body. Those arms are all moving. They symbolize an enormous activity emanating from the god. The figure of the creative Shiva, Shiva in his perfect manifestation—particularly in the Lamaistic cult—has thirty-six arms, or sometimes even seventy-two. They form a corona round him like the emanating rays of a sun or a star.<sup>23</sup>

Therefore, Nietzsche says later on, speaking to man: “Art thou a new power and a new law, a first movement, a wheel that rolls out of itself? Canst thou force the stars that they turn round thyself?” Here we have that same symbolism, the rotation and also the star. Then again, later: “It is terrible being alone with the judge and the revenger of thine own law; thus a star is cast out into the empty space and into the icy breath of solitude.” That is also a symbol of individuation. Another reference to it is: “But my brother, if thou wantest to be a star”—meaning the Superman. And again, speaking of individuation: “The ray of a star may shine in your life and your hope may be called: ‘I am, I give birth to the Superman.’” Then besides the star and the wheel, there is the symbol of the golden ball. Perhaps you know the German fairy tale about the princess who lost her golden ball in a deep well where the frog prince was watching it. She wanted to get it back, but he said: “Only if you allow me to share your seat at the table, eat from your own dish, drink from your own goblet, and share your little bed.” She agreed very reluctantly, but when he crept into her bed, she threw him out against the wall, and then he transformed into a beautiful prince.<sup>24</sup> Here Nietzsche says: "Verily, Zarathustra had a goal, he threw his ball, now ye others, I throw the golden ball to you," meaning: I, Zarathustra, have accomplished individuation and I now throw the golden ball to you; this is the idea of the Superman again.

Now, Nietzsche speaks here of the last man who is not able to individuate, who has no chaos in himself and therefore no motive to give birth to a star. That would be the man who is completely exhausted, who is absolutely satisfied, and who doesn't know of any further evolution. Therefore he asks:

"What is love? What is creation? What is longing? What is a star?"—so asketh the last man and blinketh.

The earth hath then become small, and on it there hoppeth the last man who maketh everything small. His species is ineradicable like that of the ground-flea, the last man liveth longest.

"We have discovered happiness"—say the last men, and blink thereby.

They have left the regions where it is hard to live, for they need warmth. One still loveth one's neighbour and rubbeth against him; for one needeth warmth.

Turning ill and being distrustful, they consider sinful: they walk warily. He is a fool who still stumbleth over stones or men!

What is this? What kind of attitude does he describe in this last man?

Mrs. Bailward: Playing for safety.

Mrs. Fierz: In that book by William James about religious experiences, there is a good passage where he says we must be prepared for everything, we don't know whether God exists or not, so we must make ourselves as if he lived and yet as if he did not live; we must say yes, and yet make safe and say no.<sup>25</sup>

Dr. Jung: Safe in every case. Yes, it is a sort of opportunism, as what he describes here is a sort of opportunistic attitude. He describes the collective man of his day, hoping to reach them by describing them to themselves; he paints a picture of the last man for them and they think it is far away in the future, but what he describes is simply the ideal man, an ideal rationalist or the ideal opportunist. He hopes to touch them in that way, that they may see, that their eyes may be opened to what they really are. But, you know, it is not at all foolish that people should be conservative to a certain extent, or that everybody should have their little pleasures for the day and for the night, and have a regard for their health. Nietzsche himself had no sense of pleasure—well, perhaps he had a certain amount of pleasure out of life, but it was precious little—and as for his health, he lived on bottles. He could not sleep, he took chloral by the heap, so if he had discovered a little happiness, it would not have been so bad. You see, he reviles the collective man who really can live. Of course, if one is doing nothing but that, life is not worthwhile; it is not meant that one should do that and nothing else. But he means the ordinary collective man who unfortunately believes in the righteousness of his principles, his only mistake being that he overlooks the fact that the world has a certain depth, that there are certain things behind the screen, and that the future of mankind already casts its shadow. Zarathustra is very impatient with that poor collective man, which is of course the reason why he does not reach him.

Mrs. Baumann: It sounds as if he were describing the Christian Scientists. Or is sickness regarded as a sin more personal to him?

Dr. Jung: His description would fit Christian Science or any other “ism” because it fits the collective man as he is. Then at the end of the chapter he says:

“And now do they look at me and laugh: and while they laugh they hate me too. There is ice in their laughter.”

That shows his attitude. He feels a tremendous split between himself and the collective man. You see, he no longer talks of the lightning. He realizes that there is a great split, and that he looks to them like a “mockers with terrible jests.” They take what he says as something comical, a sort of cruel mockery. The chapter ends with the recognition of an almost incurable difference between himself and the collective man of his time. Now, that is of course a critical moment. Here he simply gives up hoping to reach them by the lightning, that the lightning could kindle fire in them. He says that he feels them to be cold like ice. There is no warmth, no connection, nothing that would bridge the gulf. That is the key word of the situation, and in that moment the rope-dancer begins; in that moment the rope-dancer is bridging the gulf, going from one side over to the other on the thin and dangerous rope. For the speech now ceases and the symbolic action begins. And the action will show what it means to Nietzsche to establish a connection between the Superman and the collective man—in other words, what individuation means.

LECTURE VII

Dr. Jung:

I read last time the part in which Zarathustra deals with the most contemptible last man, and I want to ask you how you are impressed by that fellow. Do you like him? I heard a rather interesting reaction about him the other day.

Mrs. Baynes: I thought he was contemptible.

Miss Hannah: I thought that he was all right as a piece of an individual but not as a whole.

Mrs. Baumann: I thought he was the boring side of the banal existence of man.

Dr. Jung: Well, somebody who is a great enthusiast about Nietzsche told me that he found the last man not so contemptible after all; he thought he was a fairly acceptable individual and that his ideas were not so bad. For instance, Zarathustra says: "Turning ill and being distrustful, they consider sinful: they walk warily. He is a fool who stumbleth over stones or men!" I would not contradict that. "One still loveth his neighbour and rubbeth against him, for one needeth warmth." That is a perfectly tenable truth. And having regard for health, I should say was not too bad when you remember what Zarathustra says about the valuation and appreciation of the body. Later on there is a chapter where he curses those who despise the body, and these last men surely have high regard for health, which means the functioning of the body. So that last man is a very ordinary and quite reasonable individual, with nothing particularly excessive. Then he says: "One no longer becometh poor or rich; both are too burdensome." Again a very reasonable standpoint. If people did not follow such ideals the world would be even more a hell of a chaos than it is today. If people would be a bit more reasonable, with less passion for being very poor or very rich, perhaps things in general would be quieter and better. You see, he is cursing a fairly normal human being, and if Nietzsche had accepted that man in himself as an indispensable fragment, at least, of his make-up, he would have been better perhaps. He would not have been so excessive, and he would not have injured himself. Another allusion which is characteristic is: "One still worketh, for work is a pastime. But one is careful lest the pastime should hurt one." They don't overwork apparently. Nietzsche, on the other hand, was a man who passionately wasted his energies and no doubt injured his brain through a most uncanny intensity. Of course one can say that if that intensity had not been one of his characteristics, we would not have had Zarathustra nor any of his other books. But obviously the two things are true, not only the one.

Now while Zarathustra is delivering that sermon, he again has to realize that it doesn't reach the ears of his audience, and the next chapter begins:

Then, however, something happened which made every mouth mute and every eye fixed. In the meantime, of course, the rope-dancer had commenced his performance: . . .

How do you understand the fact that the rope-dancer has begun his task while Zarathustra was still talking about the most contemptible of men? That is a bit of psychological causality. We must think of the whole procedure here as a process in one person.

Dr. Reichstein: If we take this rope-dancer as the Superman, it would be a contradictory point of view, a contrast to this last man, who is quite entangled in matter, most materialistic.

Dr. Jung: You think that a sort of compensatory process is now beginning. Yes, the sermon is getting thin, one almost feels it. First of all he doesn't reach his audience; then, what he says is pretty thin because it is unjust. He really curses the man on whom he lives, the ordinary man. He lives on health for instance, and he is making just that thing in himself most contemptible. So what he says is contradicted from within by the facts; he says something which has no longer anything to do with the facts. And then whatever one says is thin and ordinary, as if it had been emptied of libido. There is no power in it, or there is only willpower, that miserably small amount of disposable libido which constitutes the so-called willpower of man. It is as if pressed out of him by a concentrated effort of will, but it is not supported by the instinctive truth, by the deeper layers of his personality. They then begin to proceed by themselves, to become automatic; they appear in the rope-dancer in an activity which is no longer Zarathustra's activity. But the rope-dancer is also in a way Zarathustra himself. That does not mean Zarathustra as he is here in the book, where everything is split up into different figures, but it is a drame intérieur of the author himself. While he is talking in the form of Zarathustra, somebody else is going to work in the form of the rope-dancer. Then what kind of figure would the rope-dancer be in Nietzsche, looked at from this basis? Have we any category into which we could put him? Here is Zarathustra and the figure of the old wise man, and now we come to the passage where that terrible jester appears, the buffoon. There are a number of figures.

Mr. Allemann: It is that part of Nietzsche which goes over the gulf to become the Superman.

Dr. Jung: Yes, the rope-dancer is Nietzsche's attempt to become the Superman. You see, that was doomed to come off; he burns his bridge talking about the last man, telling the people they are utterly contemptible in forgetting to become Supermen. Naturally they then want to see the Superman. They call for the rope-dancer, because they cannot believe that it is possible to cross over the gulf, to walk on that thin rope over the abyss which separates them from the Superman. He should show them how one becomes a Superman: that is the urgent question. You see they can say: Tout cela est bien dit mais il faut cultiver notre jardin.<sup>1</sup> It is like the sort of empty talk which is going on now in the world. It is in every newspaper and book. They all say, one ought to, one must, but nobody shows how the thing can be done. There are even people who say it would be quite simple to regulate prices, for instance; we have ten thousand good propositions but nobody shows the way to carry them out. They say; if only people did so and so, but we have to deal with man as he is, we cannot make a system or a scheme where everybody is doing his duty to the utmost. It never has been done. Well, there have been some particular enthusiasts or particular blessed fools who did their duty to the utmost; they were either great fools or marvelous beings whose pictures were put into chapels and worshipped. But people in general would never come to the conclusion that they ought to do their duty to the utmost, because it has already been done by one and that is enough. Be careful not to imitate it; that is their morality. So of course when Zarathustra talks of the Superman, people are interested in the rope-dancer who is actually going to perform the great feat. This is the reality test. Tout cela est bien dit, but now let us see how the thing is done. And Nietzsche comes to an end; he doesn't know, for he is the figure that lives in ideas. Now, that is the archetype of the wise old man, who is a system of beautiful ideas. He consists of a tissue of the most marvelous ideas that have ever been visualized, but nowhere is it said how to do it. It is only sometimes put before you as a sort of ethical program; one ought to. But as soon as you begin to apply it, there is only a spasmodic attempt of willpower. It means a terrible effort, and you feel that it is unreal. Therefore, it is unavoidable, when the sermon becomes thin, that there should be libido running over into another system, a practical system which will show how the thing is done—or how it fails perhaps.<sup>2</sup> I will read the text:

he had come out at a little door, and was going along the rope which was stretched between two towers, so that it hung above the marketplace and the people. When he was just midway across, the little door opened once more, and a gaudily-dressed fellow like a buffoon sprang out, and went rapidly after the first one. "Go on, halt-foot," cried the frightful voice, "go on, lazy-bones, interloper, sallow-face!—lest I tickle thee with my heel! What dost thou here between the towers? In the tower is the place for thee, thou shouldst be locked up; to one better than thyself thou blockest the way!" And with every word he came nearer and nearer the first one.

And what kind of system in Nietzsche would the rope-dancer be?

Miss Hannah: It is the shadow. Nietzsche does not do it himself, the shadow makes an effort.

Dr. Jung: That is a possibility. The rope-dancer could be the shadow, as we said before, but we must have evidence for such a diagnosis. Have you any evidence?

Miss Hannah: It seemed to me that he was the shadow, because the attempt failed; attempts that one leaves to the unconscious always do, because they are too fragmentary.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that could be called evidence. It is obviously an attempt that is destined to fail and insofar one could say it was a shadow attempt, an attempt left to the unconscious. The whole man is not in it.

Mrs. Baumann: I had an idea that it must be the last man as it is in Nietzsche, because that is the thing which has been left out.

Dr. Jung: Yes, we were dealing with the last man just before, so it is very probable that that figure would play a role here too. The first part is simply the mapping out of the task, making a program, and then the question arises about how that is to be carried out, and here the way is being shown. Sure enough, Nietzsche means: get up, ye last men, and try to cross over the gulf; and these so-called last men, these most contemptible ordinary men, are now trying to get across. Now, they are surely shadows. They are not heroic in the least. They are utterly inconspicuous, and chiefly characterized by more or less negative qualities. All heroic attempt has vanished, apparently; you would not call them especially positive natures. It is quite generally true that our consciousness is chiefly in the foreground—our attempts are chiefly conscious—at least we like to say so. Therefore, we call the person behind our backs our shadow, and the assumption is that no particular heroic attempts will be made by this person. The conscious ego is the one for that. The shadow figure has no body; it is relatively inefficient, and we assume that efficiency, willpower, energy, and all that, are in the conscious. So this more or less inadequate rope-dancer would about fulfil the role of the shadow also. And what about that terrible fellow who comes out after him?

Miss Wolff: Is there not a certain complication in this case? Nietzsche's real shadow, that is, the ordinary man in him, was not at all included in the problem. So the rope-dancer is like a sort of surrogate figure. At the same time, the image of the rope-dancer looks to me like a reflection and a criticism on the whole situation. It means to say that the way Zarathustra has just proclaimed of how to become the Superman is an unreal one. It is acrobatic, a sort of circus-stunt. It is a dangerous unreality, and therefore a catastrophe is bound to happen.

Dr. Jung: Quite. So it would be a symbolic demonstration of Zarathustra's psychology; it is performed as a sort of symbol before the crowd. Under ordinary circumstances that rope-dancer would have gone across as he has often done, and it is merely that Zarathustra has made his appearance in the place this disaster happens. He is interfering with the rope-dancer by his presence.

Mrs. Jung: I should have thought that the rope-dancer was the mind or intellect of Nietzsche insofar as Nietzsche is identified with it, and the buffoon would be the shadow who jumps over him. For, that Nietzsche's mind broke down is really the whole tragedy. I cannot see how the rope-dancer can be the last man. It seems to me he is the opposite, because the last man is here described as not at all daring, taking no risks: he would not fall down. But Nietzsche himself fell down really.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that could be true too. Well, as a matter of fact it is exceedingly difficult to judge from the beginning as to the real nature of the rope-dancer. We have to anticipate a little. Later on, we see that the rope-dancer is killed and Zarathustra takes care of his body, but before he dies he says to him: Thy soul will be dead even sooner than thy body. This is the prophetic word, it prophesies Nietzsche's fate. His soul died in 1889 when his general paralysis began, but he lived on for eleven years more. His body lived but his soul was dead. So the fate of that rope-dancer symbolically anticipates the fate that overcame Nietzsche: Nietzsche himself is the rope-dancer and the same fate will befall him. One could say it was Nietzsche's mind or his consciousness; or I think I would say this rope-dancer symbolizes Nietzsche himself, though in a way he is much less than Nietzsche, insofar as he is a shadow only. Of course, the whole event here is a sort of play of shadows or a writing projected against the wall, which forecasts the fate that Nietzsche the man will experience. So we can say that under the disguise of the rope-dancer, Nietzsche himself appears as a real man who tries to go across that rope. And in that case, who would the buffoon be?

Dr. Reichstein: That is the real demoniacal force which Nietzsche thought the first rope-dancer to be. I think the first rope-dancer was the conscious part of what Nietzsche preaches, and the real demoniacal force which we saw in the speech comes here in the form of the buffoon.

Dr. Jung: Indubitably, this figure that comes out after the rope-dancer is a demoniacal figure; he is characterized as such. We hear nothing more of him here—whether he really goes across the rope. For the moment he seems to vanish into thin air. The whole attention then concentrates upon the body, the accident. So it is evidently not the purpose of the buffoon to show how one gets across. His task seems to be to kill the rope-dancer. That figure returns later on, however. But if the rope-dancer is Nietzsche himself, then what would the hostile figure be?

Mrs. Baynes: Could he not be taken as the negative feeling that Nietzsche has created in the crowd, which makes the crowd determined to thwart his effort?

Dr. Jung: That is indirectly true, but I think this figure really arises from Nietzsche himself. It would be the active shadow, a shadow whose power has been underrated. This shadow takes its origin really in those most harmless last men. Therefore the whole catastrophe is predicted in the last sentence of the chapter before: "But they think me cold, and a mocker with terrible jests." They already see in him the terrible jester, this buffoon that will eventually kill the rope-dancer, because they hold that what he says of the Superman is well-nigh impossible, and if anybody should try to carry it out, he would fall dead, which happens in fact immediately after. So the buffoon could be called an active shadow. The shadow is as a rule inactive, a mere background, or an indication that somebody has body—three dimensions—since a thing that has not three dimensions casts no shadow. If a person is more or less complete, his shadow is visible; if it is not, you feel that person is as if painted flat upon the wall. With more or less shadow, there is more or less negation or contradiction, and without that nobody is complete. People who have only two dimensions are identical with a sort of persona or mask which they carry in front of themselves and behind which they hide. The persona in itself casts no shadow. It is a perfectly clear picture of a personality that is above board, no blame, no spot anywhere; but when you notice that there is no shadow, you know it is a mask and the real person is behind that screen.

Mr. Baumann: Is that thin quality not expressed by the scene? There is a marketplace and two windows and a rope, but it leads nowhere in particular. I mean, if there were a river or an abyss that one had to go over, it would make the whole thing real, but a rope goes over nothing.

Dr. Jung: That is due to the fact that the whole thing is simply a symbolic show. You think you have gone across an abyss but you have merely crossed the stage, you have gone nowhere. You think you have crossed the Red Sea perhaps, but it is only a symbolic performance, like a play in a theater.

Miss Wolff: What I meant to say is that Nietzsche, in as far as he identifies with Zarathustra, is a rope-dancer. Zarathustra has just preached that man ought to grow beyond himself into the Superman. But Nietzsche does not grow, he does not take roots by assimilating his shadow. Instead, he identifies with his vision, and so it all becomes a sort of trick, like walking on air. The buffoon is the shadow which is left behind, "the last man," the ordinary man, and because it is left behind, in the end it overtakes Nietzsche.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is the psychology of it; that is just what I mean.

Dr. Reichstein: Is not the symbol of the rope-dancer very unusual for this situation? I think it never could be in itself a symbol for a real surpassing of difficulties.

Dr. Jung: Well, it is a great risk, and for that the rope-dancer is an excellent picture.

Mrs. Crowley: He is able to hold the balance also.

Dr. Reichstein: I think that a symbol must be more connected with the earth than a rope-dancer, in order to fit into a real situation.

Dr. Jung: But that the thing is not connected with reality is exactly the trouble; therefore, the rope-dancer is such an excellent symbol, or an arrow over a river.

Mrs. Baynes: It is because he himself has to find the Superman.

Dr. Jung: Yes. You see the idea of bridging a gap is most characteristic for this affair of the Superman. And then, as Mrs. Crowley points out, the necessity of keeping the balance between the two sides.

Mrs. Bailward: Is it the balance between the opposites?

Dr. Jung: Exactly, it is the crossing from one condition to another, which is a symbol of the pairs of opposites, and the way by which one gets to the Superman. And the opposites are connected by the transcendent function; that is beautifully demonstrated by the rope stretched between the two towers. Of course, that the whole thing is in the air is characteristic too.

Mrs. Crowley: I think there is another reason for the symbol. Nietzsche is always referring to the bridge without a goal, and this is just a bridge: there is no goal.

Dr. Jung: Yes, he says man is a bridge between two banks. So the picture is very much to the point in every respect.

Dr. Reichstein: Perhaps in a teleological way it might mean to show Nietzsche that what he wants is not good for him, that he is not on the real way; the symbol would mean that the whole thing is in the air, circuslike, not real.

Dr. Jung: Well, it is like dream symbolism. When a dream picture is impossible or absurd, it conveys the idea that what one does is absurd, but at the same time it shows the way. If one takes it concretely, as it stands in the vision, of course it is absurd, and then of course the catastrophe is due. But if Nietzsche only could abstract it, dissolve it; if he could say, ah, a rope stretched between two towers, pairs of opposites which should be connected, and walk from one side to the other, then he would be on the right way. Then he could say, "I have the conflict in myself, a dilemma, and I should bridge that gulf," and then he would discover the problem of the pairs of opposites.

This is an exceedingly important point, because Nietzsche in a way continues the discussion which was begun by Friedrich Schiller, the first of the German philosophers. Schiller is to me a philosopher. I think little of his poetry, but I think a great deal of his philosophy.<sup>3</sup> He was the first German to become aware of the problem of the opposites in human nature; that psychological split became manifest to him probably under the influence of the impressions of the French Revolution, which was a sheer horror to the people of that time. It was the first time in history that the Christian god was dethroned. Nôtre Dame was desecrated and la déesse Raison put upon the throne and worshipped instead of the Christian god.<sup>4</sup> There was wholesale slaughter, heads cut off by the score—and killing the most Christian king was a thing simply unheard of. You see, values began rattling down like anything, as they are today, and as they were during the great war. Sensitive, thinking people were tremendously shaken by all those events in France, and it was under the immediate impression of those events that Schiller discovered that problem of the pairs of opposites: the problem that man, on the one side, is a fairly civilized being, and on the other, quite barbarous. He sought a way of overcoming that condition, a way that might lead to a sort of reasonable state; and the only medicine he found was in the vision of beauty, the idea that in the contemplation of beauty you can be united with yourself. Curiously enough, as an example of beauty he chose the Juno Ludovisi, an antique bust that has nothing particularly interesting about it. If he had said Apollo, or a head of Zeus, or Homer, it would be more understandable, but just that Juno Ludovisi is perfectly foolish. I think he must have had such a bust in his study, and he probably contemplated it and thought it a most marvelous face. So that if everybody would do something of the sort—if they could behold beauty—they could unite the pairs of opposites.

Now this problem apparently went to sleep again, but once touched upon it never goes to sleep really; it keeps on causing bad dreams, and Nietzsche took it up again. After Schiller, the line goes through Schopenhauer, but Schopenhauer was entirely pessimistic as to its solution; also he did not see it in just such a light. He was convinced that the world was a tremendous error. He felt that split as being, not psychological, but as a split in the world, as if there was somewhere a profound mistake in the calculation of the world; and he came to the conclusion that the evil was ineradicable. He felt that the world was merely and drama, but his Letters on the Aesthetical Education of Man were particularly important to Jung, not least in anticipating Jung's distinctions between introvert and extravert. See CW 6, ch. 2. It is not clear why Jung calls him the first of the German philosophers, since Kant, an even more important influence on Jung, was earlier—not to mention Leibniz. Nietzsche was influenced by Schiller's comparison of art and play.

incidental, that there was an unconscious will through which in the course of eternity, at an absolutely unaccountable moment, the world came to pass; that it had not developed historically, but came into existence as a dream image of the blind will. There was no foresight, no intention in the making; it simply happened. He went further than the Gnostics who assumed that there was a creator, the Demiurgos, who was at least half-conscious; Schopenhauer was absolutely pessimistic. But though to him the split was projected into the world and not into man, it is very much the same thing; he unites the pairs of opposites. Then he said it also happened that man developed an intellect which was able to mirror itself. He must hold this mirror before the intellect and it will see its own face and say, "No more of this, we will stop that whole show, make it invalid—and return to Nirvana by a complete denial of life in general."<sup>5</sup>

That is what you do when you project a problem into your relations or friends, for instance: you help them to annihilate each other, to do all sorts of damage to each other, in order to settle your own problem. One represents one side of your character and the other another side, and you try to get them to meet either in a friendly way or to fight each other. This explains the intrigues that always surround neurotic people; they are embedded in a tissue of intrigue. They suffer of course terribly from poisonous projections, but they always cause them; they even instigate them. Other people seem to be sort of actors in their private theater: one laughs and another weeps, and they tell this or that story to put those people against each other—and there they have the play they want. Of course, they pay the expenses in the long run, but the others do too if they are fools enough to fall into the trap. Also, in the history of a patient who is still embedded in his family, you will see that he usually succeeds in getting members of his family into pairs of opposites, dressing them up to play different roles. The daughter projects into the father and mother, for instance, or the parents into the children. Or in political groups, they even project their problems into the political parties.

The next figure to deal with the opposites after Schopenhauer was Nietzsche, who was also a sort of moral philosopher, and in Zarathustra he is actually at grips with the problem. His other works, The Will to Power and The Genealogy of Morals,<sup>6</sup> for instance, are chiefly criticisms of our civilization—of course always with a view to the dark shadow behind. So Nietzsche is really a modern psychologist. In our days, he would have made a famous analyst, for he had an ingenious flare for the dark background and the secret motivations; he has anticipated a great deal of Freud and Adler. But Nietzsche had by no means a merely critical mind. He had, of course, a critical intellect, like those French aphorists of the eighteenth century, but he did not get stuck in mere criticism. He was beyond that; he was positive, and in Zarathustra he also made the heroic attempt to settle the conflict. And here he encounters the shadow, which he has already clearly shown in his other works. He tries to build up an attitude or a system by which one can overcome that terrible shadow which undermines everything and checks every movement, and it is interesting to watch the development. In Schiller, it was a sort of aesthetic solution, very weak, as if he had not realized the length and the depth of the problem. To try to solve it by the vision of beauty is like trying to put out a great fire with a bottle of lemonade. Schopenhauer made a more heroic attempt, but he annihilates the whole world; he annuls all existence in order to settle the conflict of man, and that is going too far. It is like cutting one's head off because one has a headache. Nietzsche came more truly and more specifically to grips with the psychology of man; therefore, his critical work was chiefly psychological, and he felt that the regeneration of man was needed, a readjustment.<sup>7</sup>

He makes this attempt, and you see it is not only a personal whim of Nietzsche's very personal neurosis; it is really a secular attempt of the human mind to deal with that problem. It has, of course, been dealt with in history many times before in other ways. Up to the time of Schiller it had been sufficiently dealt with by the church, which simply took the whole domain of the unconscious, the shadow part of humanity, and expressed it in symbols; and they represented the whole thing as settled once and forever. If there should be any disturbance, there were the means of grace of the church. It was, and is still, a most elaborate magic system by which to settle every question. But the moment when that system becomes invalid through historical events like the French Revolution, the problem appears in the psychology of man. People who are still really in the Catholic church have no unconscious. For instance, a book has just appeared, by a Catholic, called Das Dunkle Reich in Uns, The Dark Kingdom in Us, which is about the psychological problem; and the author says that there is no proof of the existence of the unconscious—that there really is no unconscious—it is merely imagination.<sup>8</sup> Of course, almost any man nowadays in his normal senses, as we must assume he is, is simply unable to make such a statement; but a Catholic can easily, because he really has no unconscious. It is in the church.

I have talked to very intelligent people in France about this question, and the Protestants and Jews understood what I meant, but the normal French Catholic does not understand at all, because for him the unconscious doesn't exist. Even if he doesn't believe in the church, he is at least an atheist, which means a good Catholic. I once treated a patient who was considered most conservative, the blackest of Catholics—she even had very close relations with the cardinals in Rome—but after I had known her for ten years she told me, “I don't believe in God, I don't believe in the Pope, in the immortality of the soul, in Christ, in the forgiveness of sins. I believe nothing of all that, yet I shall die in the church.” You see, such a person has no unconscious. It is a most remarkable fact, which we can hardly understand. Then a very educated and intelligent Catholic with an academic training said to me, “I really cannot see why you take such trouble with psychology; if there is any question, I ask my bishop and he tells me what to think about it; and if he doesn't know he writes to Rome and there in the Propaganda Fide they tell him exactly; for two thousand years they have sat there and unraveled these matters.” Now even if it were true that the Propaganda Fide<sup>9</sup> could answer certain questions, if I didn't understand it, if it did not express myself, I could not accept it. But they can accept it because it has never been in them. It is exactly as if it were a matter of some detail in the life of the Polar Eskimos. I never have seen the Polar Eskimos, but I know there is such a tribe and I know a man who knows about them; so if I want to know what the Polar Eskimos eat for their midday meal, I simply write a letter to that man and he tells me they eat walrus steak, and I think he must know and accept it because I never was in the country. So these Catholics have never had any experience of the unconscious; they were never concerned with it, so they easily can accept what they say about it in Rome. But the Propaganda Fide is in the church, you know, and funnily enough it remains there. Even if they don't believe the whole dogma of the church, they still have it there; they just put an a before it: if only a negation, it remains. Those fellows to whom I talked were convinced atheists. Therefore, Bernard Shaw makes that joke about a man in the extremity of doubt who finally breaks down and says: I am absolutely shaken in my atheistic belief.<sup>10</sup>

Mrs. Case: Is it not a very immoral position, leaving all those questions to other people?

Dr. Jung: I should say so. Such people ought to be punished. It is really very mean, particularly for other people who get the bad end of it.

Now, we are still concerned with the buffoon, and we concluded that this was really an active shadow. Ordinarily, the shadow is not an active figure, but is only a sort of passive appendage, a background, a mere exponent of the fact that there is a three dimensional body. In itself the shadow has no existence; it follows very closely where the body goes, and that is of course the normal condition, as it should be. But as soon as there is a split, a disagreement with the negative qualities of man, the shadow takes a form, and it even goes so far as to separate itself from the person. That excellent film The Student of Prague is an illustration. You remember, he detached from his shadow which then committed awful crimes. The man himself kept his word, he was a man of honor; but his shadow broke his word, and that led to a terrible entanglement and a catastrophic denouement.<sup>11</sup> It is a demonstration of a certain psychological condition, where the conscious is merely persona-like, painted on the wall as two-dimensional only. Then the shadow is set apart and leads a life of its own. This is always the case when one does not realize what one is doing. You know, some people don't realize themselves; they don't know what they are doing. And other people know themselves but they don't know what is happening around them—the two types of course. That is the unconsciousness of the shadow.

The shadow is indispensable for making the whole of a personality; nobody is whole without negative qualities. This is lightly said, but in reality it is an enormous problem, looked at from an ethical point of view. It is so difficult that one knows no other solution practically than to shut one's eyes; if one doesn't look at it, one can live. But the moment one sees it, it is almost impossible, an insupportable conflict. If one takes the moral conflict seriously, it becomes insoluble. Therefore, people choose the way of the church or something like that, in order to escape the terrible responsibility. There the church steps in with her means of grace, or with the conviction that somebody has dealt with the problem of our sin, or is going to deal with it, so we are relieved of that awful problem. Numerous have been the attempts of man in that direction. The Gnostics, for instance, made very interesting attempts, but I won't go into that now, as we are here concerned with a very modern problem. If the shadow is separated from consciousness, it always has body, reality: it is a spontaneous and active agency. And inasmuch as the separation of the ego consciousness and the shadow prevents the integration of the whole of the personality—individuation—the shadow also contains the self. Behind the shadow looms up the self, but then in a negative form. In that case, the shadow has a most destructive power; that is the origin of the demoniacal forces of the shadow. Therefore, it is so important to have the right way with it. For without the integration of the shadow there is no individuation, and no reconciliation of the pairs of opposites, because the shadow is the opposite.

Mr. Baumann: There is an interesting picture in Bamberger's Apocalypse of a man who is connected with the devil: they are back to back.<sup>12</sup>

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is of course the problem. In medieval psychology it is the innocent little man with a huge devil behind him.

Mrs. Case: That would be connected with the problem of the freeing of the will, wouldn't it?

Dr. Jung: Yes. Inasmuch as you cannot integrate the shadow, of course the libido invested in the shadow is not disposable.

Mrs. Case: So individuation is really very much bound up with the freedom of the will?

Dr. Jung: Well, the problem of the will is also connected with it, but that is a side issue. It is one of the handicaps of the individuation process that the more you are split, the less you have free will, and then the process of individuation is inhibited. First, you must gain a certain amount of freedom, and you only gain that by the assimilation of the shadow. You must learn to deal with the shadow to a certain extent at least, and then proportionately you acquire free will. One has no free will in a state of complete dilemma, of complete dissociation or disintegration; that is obvious. So the demoniacal power of this buffoon is due to the fact that, being with the shadow, it is activated by the superior power of the wholeness of the self. For the self is the concept which expresses the totality of conscious and unconscious, and inasmuch as the unconscious is a limitless, indefinable, and irrational concept, the self is necessarily also an only partially rational concept; it covers something which cannot be defined fully. You can define the ego, the extent of consciousness, but you cannot define the unconscious, because it is infinite. You cannot establish a definite borderline which would separate the conscious clearly from everything that is non-ego; you can only say that your consciousness comes to an end here, and there begins the unconscious. But how far the unconscious extends, nobody knows. So the self is an indefinable concept because it covers the whole, the conscious and the unconscious; and inasmuch as the unconscious contains an extraordinary power, the self is an expression of that power. Therefore, one could say in this case, that inasmuch as the shadow, this terrible jester, is a tremendous problem, he must have a tremendous power. Now, under what conditions does the shadow appear in such a terrible form?

Mrs. Fierz: Is it not connected with the appearance of Zarathustra? In a figure like Zarathustra you see only its positive side, so the shadow would be enriched by the unconscious side, the shadow of Zarathustra.

Dr. Jung: That would explain why he appears in such a terrible form, but why should it be so destructive?

Mrs. Fierz: Because the self is so dangerous.

Dr. Jung: And why is it so dangerous?

Mrs. Crowley: Because he has not recognized it, as he must. He has been far away from the shadow, preaching the Superman, and it is as if that lightning had two sides, the constructive and destructive.

Dr. Jung: Yes, the conscious is very far away; it is identified, as Mrs. Fierz pointed out, with the figure of Zarathustra, the wise old man, with an all-embracing, benevolent truth, very beautiful, very meaningful and all that. Apparently there is no shadow in the wise old man, so there is a great distance between that figure and the shadow, naturally. But why should the shadow be so hellishly destructive?

Miss Hannah: It seems to me to have something to do with the will of the heart, which in spite of all disarmament attempts is stronger than we. In the same way, when he talks about destructive powers, he doesn't fully realize.

Dr. Jung: Obviously, because it is then not so bad; one can say that just because we don't realize the destructive powers of the shadow, it appears in a particularly dangerous way. It is so terrible because we are far away and underrate it. It might seem to be a mere appearance, not real, but this case proves that it is real, because it is the anticipation of Nietzsche's fate. It is as if this whole scene had performed itself in Nietzsche's life. Now, assuming that the shadow has jumped over him and killed him, why would that be? Have we evidence for the fact that the other side of the self is so exceedingly dangerous?

Mrs. Bailward: Has it something to do with the former inflation that you talked about?

Dr. Jung: Well, if anyone has a one-sided identity with a certain figure, it causes a certain inflation; that simply expresses the distance from the shadow.

Mrs. Baumann: I think that, inasmuch as it is a part which he cannot accept or get connected with, that part rises up and says: "If you do not accept me I will kill you."

Dr. Jung: Yes, but do you think it is necessary to put the pistol upon his chest? Could it not be said more civilly?

Mrs. Baumann: I was taking it for granted that it had been said many times before.

Dr. Jung: As a matter of fact, these things are said once and not many times.

Mrs. Baynes: Would it not be so dangerous because the shadow carries part of the god powers of the self?

Dr. Jung: Exactly. The point is, inasmuch as you are not Zarathustra or anything like him, inasmuch as you are a rational well-meaning normal being, you are convinced that you choose your life, pick your way in a more or less reasonable way, with a sort of virtuous effort and good intentions, and make something quite nice of it. And you don't reckon with the fact that while you are thinking like that, you are forgetting that you are under an inexorable law which is a thousand times stronger than man.<sup>13</sup> You see, we have experienced that. We make contracts with each other and they work for a while, so we make them a bit more certain; we increase the safety of our way of existence still more, until in the end we exclude every kind of interference. And the more we work along that line, the greater our safety becomes; but the greater also the chance that if anything happens, it will be a terrible mess. We increase the size of the ships on the ocean, we increase their means of safety, their speed, and all that, so of course an ordinary storm means nothing; but if there is a catastrophe, which never can be prevented, it is a most horrible one. We try to prevent wars, we make our situation as safe as possible, but of course we create by that the best chance for having a war. We gather a large army and enormous heaps of ammunition to prevent anybody from attacking us, but the other side is doing the same for their own defence, and finally everybody is defending themselves and this means a war with the most wholesale slaughter. Former wars were just Sunday evening rows in comparison with what we can do now with all our means of safety. Thus, our good intentions are always double-crossed by an unaccountable, unforeseen power which one calls chance or something like that. And we call everybody superstitious who is afraid of chance, who assumes that something ought to be done against it; we don't believe that anything can really interfere, because we don't see it. Yet the primitive man is always hellishly afraid of chance, for he knows that whatever he does can be double-crossed by whatever this cunning chance may devise. Some demon may interfere, and therefore he takes quite extraordinary measures of precaution. Certain things which might offend the demons must not be done, for they would take a terrible revenge. This consciousness has become obliterated in us, so we never really think whether God will interfere with us or not. As a matter of fact, he does and we call it chance, but that is simply another name for the same old thing.

Mr. Baumann: "His Majesty, Chance."

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is a recognition of this extraordinary power. Of course, we try to break its power by saying it is blind, it just happens, but if you study it carefully, you finally reach the conclusion that chance is a very peculiar thing. It is as if it had analysed that particular case and put this thing just in the right place, like the wasp that in order to lay its eggs in that place, lames the caterpillar without killing it by putting its poisonous sting into the third dorsal ganglia, knowing much better where the motor center is than the zoologists. Zoologists have to work for years to find out. One could say it was mere chance, but unfortunately these things don't happen as if they were chance. There is regularity and enormous teleology. It is the same with the unconscious. In the words you speak by chance, the truth is what you just blurt out. We first think the interfering factor has to do with the shadow; we make a slip of the tongue or something else happens to us and we recognize it and say, "Oh well, that was the shadow, it is due to such and such a complex." And we think we can unravel and eradicate it, and then it will stop and not bother us again. But the further we go, the more we see that behind that shadow is a much greater power, and finally we see it is that totality of conscious and unconscious. Then we again think that we have now come to something which is circumscribed, something tangible, within the reach of human reason. But the self is just as far-reaching as the unconscious; we don't know how far it reaches. We get into an enormous continuity with life in general, not only life in the present; it contains all the ancestral life of the past and intimations of the things to come—all of humanity. So we arrive at a conception of the self which is worldwide, a sort of conglomerate and accumulation of individual minds, and that is simply a conception of a god.

Then when you have arrived at such a conclusion, you naturally begin to realize all the things that humanity in former ages used to think, that the god is very dangerous, exceedingly sensitive, most susceptible to any kind of offence. (I don't speak of the Christian God now, but the god generally.) You must tread very warily in order not to disturb his peace, and you cannot cheat him; you must fulfil his laws, you have to observe all the necessary rites, you must be very ceremonious in the presence of god because he could take a terrible revenge. And it is a psychological fact that the self, the whole of man, is an exceedingly dangerous proposition. Every single individual believes in his own absolute importance, in spite of his weaknesses, his dullness, his unimportance; and we forget that through each human being that universal being is working and can produce the most horrible results. We should learn fear again. We suffer from fear in all sorts of phobias, but the reason that so many people suffer from phobias is because their fear is not in the right place. In the Old Testament, the very first principle is the fear of God.<sup>14</sup> It has been overcompensated in the New Testament by the idea that God is love and one should not be afraid of him. But God is the one and the other. The New Testament is just a compensation for the terrible truth of the Old Testament that in the beginning was the fear of God. If you arrive at the idea that he is also benevolent, it is a sort of secondary experience. Naturally, it depends upon our attitude. We can assume, for instance, that if we fulfil the demands of the terrible god; we don't need to be afraid of him any longer; then he will give us his grace, he will be kind to us. Or we can assume just as well that God is a kind father provided we fulfil what he in his terrible form has demanded of us.

Now this whole aspect is lacking in Zarathustra because his god is dead. And then god appears in the place where one would expect him the least, and that is in the shadow. The shadow is by definition something which seems to be utterly impotent, trailing just behind the body of man, an appendage, entirely dependent upon his existence. It is a most absurd and improper place for anything to appear, and therefore we don't recognize its uncanny power. Of course you can say the shadow in itself is not powerful, but simply an accumulation of all sorts of bad qualities in man; you can always depreciate it. But the curious thing is that if the god is dead and so appears in the shadow, then the negative qualities of the shadow become the armor of a new and terrible god. That is the experience which is still waiting for us. That is just the thing we are going to experience—that God appears to us from the most unaccountable and unexpected quarter. And so this buffoon who suddenly jumps out of the tower after the rope-dancer, represents to us something completely unexpected, nobody would have thought that out of the shadow such a horror could come. We are quite certain in this assumption because later on the buffoon says to Zarathustra that the next time he will jump over him too, degrading Zarathustra to the role of the rope-dancer. This substantiates our interpretation that the rope-dancer is Nietzsche himself in his own form or in the form of Zarathustra; and the buffoon is the part of the shadow that holds divine power, the power over death and life. If he chooses to jump over Zarathustra, he will do so and Zarathustra will be killed in no time, just in order to show Nietzsche himself that he is dealing here with a power as great as any god's power.

<sup>14</sup> Once when Martin Buber (who accused Jung of psychologizing God) was asked why there was the emphasis upon fear in the Bible, as in "Fear of God is the beginning of wisdom," replied that the emphasis there was on "beginning."

LECTURE VIII

Dr. Jung:

You will have noticed that the psychology of these figures—Zarathustra, the rope-dancer, and the buffoon—is extraordinarily mixed. It is difficult to explain their relation to each other, as well as their position in the psychology of Zarathustra and in Nietzsche's own psychology. Sometimes I speak of the rope-dancer as a shadow, for instance, then of the jester as a shadow, and naturally one becomes confused because it is hard to keep in mind the major proposition. It all depends upon the point of view from which we envisage the problem. I tried to make that actual standpoint clear, but of course it is quite easy to lose the premise if one doesn't quite follow the argument.

Therefore I have made up a so-called soreites syllogismos; although dealing with elusive aspects, we can introduce a certain order by using this. Soreites is the Greek word for a piece of logic. (You know logic is a science in itself.) The Latin word for this is acervus, meaning a heap of something. The German word is Haufenschluss, meaning an accumulation, conclusion. Syllogismos means the conclusion. There are always a major proposition and several minor propositions, and then the conclusion. The major proposition is the most important, one assumes that to be a sort of certainty.<sup>1</sup> If there are a number of propositions, it amounts to this soreites syllogismos, the rational conclusion from an accumulative argument. Now, I will show you such an argument, which is quite necessary in order to clear up these most complicated differences of levels and aspects.

In this case Nietzsche the man is the certainty: Nietzsche himself, Nietzsche the citizen, Nietzsche the anatomical and biological human being. And he is equal to that man, the first rope-dancer, who falls dead and so anticipates Nietzsche's own fate; they are identical because their fate is identical. That is perfectly safe, a certainty. Now we come to the second proposition. The figure second in importance is Zarathustra who is equal to the Superman; he is the Superman. The third proposition is that the buffoon, the jester, is equal to the shadow of the rope-dancer, because he follows the rope-dancer, he jumps out after him and overcomes him in the typical way that the shadow overcomes the conscious man—as for instance, when I say, "You can assume such an artificial position if you like, but be careful that your shadow doesn't get you by the neck or attack you from behind."

(1) Nietzsche = Rope-dancer
(2) Zarathustra	= Superman	(3) Jester	= Shadow of Rope-dancer
(a) Superman	= Demon	(a) Rope-dancer	= Nietzsche
(b) Jester	= Demon	(b) Jester	= Shadow of Nietzsche
(c) Jester	= Superman	(c) Jester	= Shadow of Zarathustra
(d) Jester	= Zarathustra	(d) Nietzsche	= Zarathustra
(e) Jester	= Shadow of Zarathustra

We start the argument with proposition 2, that Zarathustra is the Superman, and under (a) I put: The Superman is equal to a demon because the Superman is a demoniacal man; he is more than man, which would be of course a demon in the antique sense of the word. (b) Then there is another demon in the play; the jester is described as a demon, so the jester equals the demon. And from that follows (c) that the jester is equal to the Superman. You can also say, for instance, that the demon is the jester, and also the Superman; therefore, the jester is the Superman. If A is equal to B and B is equal to C, then A is equal to C. That is a so-called categorical conclusion or judgment.

Mr. Nuthall-Smith: Is it the same demon?—are all demons equal?

Dr. Jung: Of course you cannot say that all demons are equal if speaking of different individual demons. I use the expression, as I said, in the antique sense of the word, which is mana, demoniacal, the daimon. As Socrates used the term, the demon was neither female nor male, neither succubus nor incubus, but was neuter; he called it daimonion, which is a neutral thing. In German we would say: der Dämon, die Dämonin, or der Incubus, der Succubus, and das Dämonische. Socrates used it simply as a concept of mana, an uncanny or a peculiarly efficient thing, more than man, in a way superior to man, and in that sense to daimonion, the demoniacal. And that applies to the Superman as well as the jester, in that they are equal. Then another conclusion (d) is that the jester equals Zarathustra, because Zarathustra is equal to the Superman. The Superman is equal to a demon and the jester is equal to a demon; therefore, the jester is equal to the Superman and the Superman is equal to Zarathustra. You see, that follows logically; it is like mathematics. Now comes the major conclusion, the end of this particular argument. One cannot say the jester is quite equal to Zarathustra, but he is equal in his demoniacal aspect, or one could say the shadow of Zarathustra simply, the negative demoniacal side. So the jester would correspond to the shadow of Zarathustra (e). In other words, the jester is the negative side of the Superman. Therefore, it is understandable that Zarathustra says: "But they think me cold and a mocker with terrible jests." He there feels his identity with the jester; namely, his identity with his own shadow.

The major proposition is now that the jester is equal to the shadow of the rope-dancer, and the conclusion of the former proposition is that the jester is equal to the shadow of Zarathustra. So one gets entirely mixed up. That needs to be explained: one cannot assume that identity at first sight—that because Zarathustra is the Superman, the rope-dancer would be a Superman. It is apparently impossible, but we will follow up that argument. The figure in question, the rope-dancer, (a) is Nietzsche himself. Now if the rope-dancer is equal to Nietzsche himself, then it is Nietzsche himself who is jumped over or killed by the jester, inasmuch as the jester follows the rope-dancer as if he were his shadow. So (b) the jester is equal to the shadow of Nietzsche himself, because Nietzsche himself is equal to the rope-dancer; and the shadow of the rope-dancer is equal to the jester. But the jester is equal to the shadow of Zarathustra, the conclusion we reached here (c). Therefore, the end of our argument and at the same time the conclusion of the whole soreites is what?

Mrs. Baumann: Zarathustra is Nietzsche, or Nietzsche is Zarathustra.

Dr. Jung: Exactly. Nietzsche the man is equal to Zarathustra. Voilà! That is black magic. We can write at the end q.e.d. You see, it means that this whole complication starts from the fact that Nietzsche is identical with Zarathustra, and it would not exist if that were not so. To put the thing in this form helps to keep the picture in mind; one needs such a complicated, magical argument. It is like higher mathematics. One cannot express certain functions or connections or conditions unless one makes a pretty difficult calculus: it is necessary in order to hold the whole argument together. One gets into these complications as soon as there is such an identity; the root of the whole thing is that Nietzsche is equal to Zarathustra, so the two figures are mixed together. Therefore all the trouble, the whole tragedy. And one can only clear up the peculiar interchangeable aspects of the figures in some such way.

Dr. Reichstein: Do you mean that it is an unconscious identity between Nietzsche and Zarathustra?

Dr. Jung: Oh yes, I mean an identity in fact. He would not be conscious of it. If he were conscious of it, it most probably would not exist, or only partially, so there would still be an identity. The complete consciousness of a projection always destroys the identity; when you are entirely convinced, really understand that a certain thing is a projection, it can no longer be experienced as something outside of yourself. As a symbol is destroyed if it is understood: it is then completely superfluous. You don't need to express yourself through a symbol if you know what it means. Why not call it by its right name if you know what it is? Why make a detour? It is infantilism. You only need a symbol for a thing which you cannot express in any other way. Otherwise, it would be mere allegory, and then one asks why you should talk in such a stilted way.<sup>2</sup> Why not be natural, why be so allegorical, talking through projections?

Question: Then if one were absolutely conscious, there would be no such figures in the unconscious?

Dr. Jung: Yes, if one were. Of course that is an assumption. If a complete or divine consciousness were possible, there would be no projection, which means that there would be no world, because the world is the definiteness of the divine projection. According to the Hindu myth, inasmuch as God dreams, he creates a world, he produces objects. But a state of complete consciousness obliterates the world. The assumption is in Buddhism that the attainment of perfect illumination, or consciousness, means nirvana, positive non-existence. The perfect consciousness is the complete identity with divinity. Man has returned into the deity, the world has returned to God, and nothing is because there is no object any longer. Now of course we don't know whether perfect consciousness is possible, but we know that with the progression and extension of consciousness, the number of known projections becomes diminished, so we assume that if consciousness were capable of still greater extension, still more projections would enter the field of our vision. We would destroy more of the world, as it were.

<sup>2</sup> Jung considered his way of conceptualizing symbol to be a major difference between Freud and himself. Thus, if a so-called phallic symbol "means just phallus and nothing else, it is better called a sign—or in the case of a narrative, 'an allegory'." This saves symbol for an untranslatable way of representing. See CW 18, pars. 481-83.

Mr. Nuthall-Smith: I don't follow the argument that (a) and (b) are really identities, that the Superman and the jester are both equal to the demon. The demon seems to be a quality of the Superman and the jester, but not an identity.

Dr. Jung: Well, both are superhuman inasmuch as they both have demoniacal quality; therefore, I say you had best express this demon by the term Socrates used, to daimonion; the Superman is das Dämonische in man.

Mr. Nuthall-Smith: They are interchangeable?

Dr. Jung: You can say, "paradoxical aspects of one and the same thing." The proof, as I mentioned, is that Zarathustra makes the remark: "But they think me cold and a mocker with terrible jests." You see, that is the jester, but it is Zarathustra at the same time. So the jester is simply another aspect of Zarathustra, and they have their common root in the daimonion. In the case of Socrates himself, the voice of the wise old man, his daimon, always advised him, told him what to do or warned him. He told him he ought to make more music, for instance, and then Socrates bought a flute. And he was walking with his friends through the streets of Athens one day, when his daimon whispered in his ear: "Take the other road to the right, leave this road." Socrates obeyed and suddenly down the road they had left rushed a herd of swine, trampling down all the passers-by into the mud.<sup>3</sup> A nice picture of the conditions of public hygiene in those days! You see, the daimon was very careful to forewarn him. That is the prophetic voice of the seer in our unconscious, usually symbolized by the wise old man. So the daimon is the Superman, the thing that is greater than man, yet it seems to be in man. If you have some vision or premonition, you are tempted to assume that you are perhaps the wise old man yourself, and then one calls it an inflation. Nietzsche himself was in the condition for an inevitable inflation. That explains his almost pathological megalomania, which was criticized during his lifetime, that megalomaniac manner of speech was a considerable obstacle in his way; people thought he made tremendous assumptions. It was simply an inevitable inflation through the coming up of that figure and his identification with it.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Diogenes Laertius in Lives of Ancient Philosophers says that Socrates in his old age learned to play the lyre (1.4.32). But in the Republic, Socrates proposed to banish from his ideal state flute makers and players alike (Republic 399D). Something about Socrates' personality attracted an immense amount of gossip and tales, both short and tall.

<sup>4</sup> Nietzsche himself, in a letter to Lou Salomé and Paul Rée, spoke of "my fits of megalomania. . . . Do bear in mind, you two, that at bottom I'm sick in the head and half insane, completely confused by long isolation" (N/Letters/Fuss, p. 68).

Mrs. Baumann: If Zarathustra is equal to the demon, then would Nietzsche be equal to the demon?

Dr. Jung: Obviously, all that is included in the demon because Zarathustra is the demon; he is the wise old man. Whatever Zarathustra is, Nietzsche is also. Nietzsche is the awful jester so he is also the demon that Zarathustra is.

Mrs. Crowley: If Nietzsche had been quite conscious, what would have happened to Zarathustra? Obviously he would not have been in this form.

Dr. Jung: I am afraid that is like asking what would have happened in the history of the world if the old Romans had known gunpowder and rifles. One can only say, if the same problem should happen to one of us, I hope he would have learned analysis enough to avoid that identity. You see, the daimon cannot be completely wiped out by the assumption that it is a mere projection or an identity with a fantasy; on the contrary, you can assume that you have built a certain fantasy and that the identity would not have been if you had not made just that fantasy. But if you detach from the fantasy, from that agency which works in you, then you become aware of the extraordinary reality of the thing; only when you detach, when you make that sacrifice, do you know what it is worth. As long as you hold onto it, you don't know what it means, nor how it functions, and then you cannot develop and it cannot develop. So when I have an idea that the wise old man has had his hands in something, I try to go back to my humble self and make sure that I am in no way identical with him. Then it is freed from my cumbersome presence, and I am free from the awful assumptions of that figure, I don't need to talk in such a stilted way, to produce hieratic language, to establish the truth of the world and the law of life, and to be infallible; I can be quite fallible, an ordinary human being. Naturally, I try sometimes to do my best and sometimes my worst, but I am in no way that marvelous being who talks so beautifully, in such a heavenly way, like the old parson on Sunday afternoon at two o'clock.

Therefore, I always say you had better leave God alone and then you will see what he can do. Most people who are on such good terms with God assume that it is their virtue, but if you leave the whole thing alone you can see how it works. For instance, perhaps you assume that you should not eat salt in your food because you don't understand why you need it. Then don't bother about salt, eat your food without it, and you will soon discover what it does. For heaven's sake, don't believe these things, the wise old man, the collective unconscious, etc. Try it, and see what happens without. It is very simple; don't touch it and you will see how it works. So if Nietzsche were a contemporary of mine and asked my ideas about it, I would say: "Be your humble self, say you know nothing, you have no ideas, and if you feel that there is somebody who wants to talk, give him a chance, clear out of your brain and leave it a while to the old man. Then make notes of it, take it down and see what he says. And then you can make up your mind whether your ideas fit in with it or not. But don't identify with it." Of course, the thought probably would not enter his mind to ask my advice or anybody's advice about it.

I often meet very religious people who identify with the wise old man and I follow a certain principle in dealing with them. I enter upon their proposition and, according to principle, whatever they want I let them have to the end, so that they finally get sick of it. That is the old principle of Heraclitus, who said to let the Ephesians have plenty of gold so that their viciousness would come to the daylight; without gold they would have to work, but if they have gold enough, they can develop their vices, and then they will become obvious.<sup>5</sup> So if you have to deal with people who suffer from megalomania, just favor them until they explode—that is the best way. If anybody is convinced that he is very good, let him believe that he is good to the very edge of his existence, for if you tell him he is evil, he will make a desperate effort to be good and never get beyond his conviction of his virtue. I always follow that principle with lunatics also—of course people with inflations are mild lunatics and sometimes not very mild. If a man says he is the triple god or the pope or Jesus, I say: "Why not?—anybody can be Jesus." But it happened once that I had another man in the same ward who said he was Jesus too; we had two Jesuses, and how could I make out which was the one? I simply put them together in the same room to let them have it out. About half an hour later I went and listened, but there was no noise, so I went in and one was standing behind the stove and the other tapping on the window looking out. I asked one of them, "Now what about the Jesus? Who is the real one?" And he pointed to the other and said, "Of course that is a mad ass." He saw right away that he was a mad man but that he himself was mad he could not see. So what can you do? Of course, you cannot cure them. But people who have inflations are not lunatics in the sense that their brain is already split and congealed into that form. In cases of inflation it is functional; it is still in a liquid condition, and the cure depends upon the attitude people take, whether they take a sort of compensatory or contrasting attitude or whether they agree and submit to the majesty of an inflation. Sometimes there is a very great majesty in inflation, something marvelous. Now we will continue our text:

When, however, he was but a step behind, there happened the frightful thing which made every mouth mute and every eye fixed:—he uttered a yell like a devil, and jumped over the other who was in his way. The latter, however, when he thus saw his rival triumph, lost at the same time his head and his footing on the rope; he threw his pole away and shot downwards faster than it, like an eddy of arms and legs, into the depth. The market-place and the people were like the sea when the storm cometh on: they all flew apart and in disorder, especially where the body was about to fall.

Zarathustra, however, remained standing, and just beside him fell the body, badly injured and disfigured, but not yet dead.

The fact that Zarathustra did not run away, but remained glued to the spot, means that he had a very particular relationship to that event; the rope-dancer who fell down had an intimate connection with him.

After a while consciousness returned to the shattered man, and he saw Zarathustra kneeling beside him. "What art thou doing there?" said he at last, "I knew long ago that the devil would trip me up. Now he draggeth me to hell: wilt thou prevent him?"

"On mine honour, my friend," answered Zarathustra, "there is nothing of all that whereof thou speakest: there is no devil and no hell. Thy soul will be dead even sooner than thy body: fear, therefore, nothing any more!"

This is the classical passage in Zarathustra, the prophecy, the unmistakable anticipation of the final catastrophe, his madness, where his mind or his soul was dead long before his body. And during his madness he was utterly gone—there was absolutely no connection with him. It was an a-typical form of the general paralysis of the insane, and he was quite bad; one could not talk to him. There was no reasonable connection. Occasionally, he ran away. Once he ran away from his sister's house, and was caught naked in one of the gardens of Weimar. Then he had quiet times when she could walk with him but he could not react if talked to; there were only a few intelligible remarks. For instance, he once said to his sister: "Are we not quite happy?"—perfectly reasonably, and then he was gone, confused. People have concluded from that that his madness was a divine mania—what the Greeks called maniá, a divine state, the state of being filled with the god; one is entheos, the god is within. The remark was quoted as evidence that he had reached a sort of nirvana condition.

You see, we can assume that behind madness there is a sort of nirvana condition. That would explain why in people who are quite mad there are still voices which are entirely reasonable; and when they are physically ill often they become quite reasonable. I remember the case of a crazy woman who was full of the most absurd megalomaniac ideas, but the voices she heard, which she called her telephone, told her the truth. Once she told me something perfectly absurd, a megalomaniac idea expressed in an awfully involved and artificial way. I tried a long time in vain to get at the bottom of what she meant, and suddenly she became impatient and kicked against something, and said: "The telephone always disturbs me." "What did the telephone say?" She would not tell me but finally I wrested it from her. "You are leading the doctor by the nose; it is all bunk, you really belong to the lunatic asylum." And on another occasion when she was very unruly, I said: "But look here, if you behave like that, everybody will think you are not quite in your senses. That is the reason you are here in the lunatic asylum; one must keep such people locked up." She remonstrated and then suddenly was interrupted by her telephone: "The doctor is quite right; of course you are mad, and you need to be locked up." They were voices of perfect normality and insight.

Another case was a man, one of the noisiest individuals in the ward. He usually began at about five o'clock in the morning to be excited and unapproachable. He cursed everybody up and down and was sometimes quite violent, one had to keep him locked up. Then from ten on he was left in the open ward or in the garden, and when I came at that hour he usually shouted: "There is one of that dog and monkey crowd of doctors who want to play saviors and cure lunatics; it is all bunk." It was almost a stereotyped speech. But once when I came, that fellow was perfectly quiet. The nurse said he was quite nice and gentle, and he spoke to me in a normal voice. Then I noticed that his hands were hot and found he had already thirty-nine degrees of fever. They put him to bed and it turned out to be a case of typhoid fever which lasted for about six weeks. During that time he was a gentle simple being, most obedient and never noisy. Whenever I came to his bed, he said, "Thank you doctor, it is very nice of you to look after me." And he always thanked the nurses; he was a soft, charming person, really. We got used to his complete transformation, but one morning, when he was still very weak he said feebly, "Ah, there is again one of those dogs and monkeys of doctors who play saviors." I thought, "You are getting up, old man," and within a week he could loudly croak his case, and then I knew he was cured. He was back in his normal state from an abnormal condition of health. Now, that man was in a lunatic asylum for almost twenty years and it is assumed in such a case that the brain is somewhat disturbed, that whole layers of cells are atrophied, but during the typhoid he was perfectly all right; then suddenly he fell back. That is a well-known fact. Therefore, originally, if these cases were treated at all, one made them artificially ill by using poisonous ointments or something which would cause an infection, because it was noticed that when suffering from high fever or infection they became relatively normal.

So the idea that there is a sort of normal or superior condition behind the diseased state of consciousness is by no means nonsensical. It is also possible that behind Nietzsche's condition there was a superior self which had no chance to come through. Consciousness was diseased, but the self was sane. For instance, I have just written a preface to a new edition of the works of Dr. Carl Ludwig Schleich, an older contemporary of mine. He had the idea that the soul of man is not at all connected with the brain but with the body, with the sympathetic nervous system, so that even if the brain is disturbed the personality is not necessarily affected.<sup>6</sup> It was observed in the war that tremendous losses of cerebral matter did not affect the personality at all; there were only relatively slight disturbances of another kind.

Now, Mrs. Case has just asked me this question: "You stated that if there were complete consciousness, the world would no longer exist. Do you hold the opinion that outer reality is nothing more than a projection of the unconscious?"

Of course that is a bit too quick! I cannot say that I have any conviction about such problems. I say such things with an if. They are not articles of conviction or faith, inevitable conclusions or scientific truths. It is psychology, and psychology is a world of facts, events, all having their own nature. If you meet an elephant in Africa, it proves nothing about the being of the world. It is just that you run across an elephant in Africa. It can mean your end or nothing at all. It is simply a fact. And so you run across certain ideas in human heads. They are just there and they don't necessarily mean anything. We must free ourselves from this most unscientific prejudice that our thoughts mean something in the sense of producing something; it is exceedingly rare that a thought produces anything. A thought is a phenomenon in itself; it proves nothing. That a certain crow is flying across the lake at this moment proves nothing and means nothing. It simply flies. There is such a bird. So we have such birds in our heads and they prove nothing as to the real structure of the world. But it is important that we know that our world is a psychological fact; whatever we judge is a psychological fact. For instance, you would say that this matchstand was real. But what is real in the thing? It is what you feel. You see it here but you don't feel here; you feel up in your brain and nobody knows what the brain can do to your sense perception. There are certain waves of air which you call sound, but you call the same waves moving with less frequency vibration, because you feel it as a vibration. With a vibration of ten waves a second you feel the movement of the air; if it is sixteen per second, certain people can already hear a very low sound. So our world is relative to our psyche; therefore it does matter what we say about the world, because we say it about our world. If there is perhaps another world, what we say means precious little—no more than a louse on the North Pole.

It is an old conviction in Eastern philosophy that if you reach the state of complete or perfect consciousness, the object is abolished; the world enters into God and then it is not.<sup>7</sup> That of course includes the idea that our world is a projection. Inasmuch as we hurt ourselves against such projections, we assume that they are real. So we cannot say the world is our projection. It is God's projection; a superior being in man has made the projection. Therefore, in the East matter is called the definiteness of the divine thought. The divine thought can be vague and then the thing is not, but if the divine mind or thought is definite, it is matter. It is quite possible that this is so; we have absolutely no argument to use against such a statement. For instance, you can substantiate the whole of theology from the statement of modern physics, because matter as we have previously understood it doesn't exist at all. It is utterly intangible, utterly immaterial. It becomes, and it vanishes, and the thing that really exists is a sort of energy or radiation. So the Hindu philosopher's statement that matter is the definiteness of the divine thought is highly intelligent. You can say, of course, that this is a human projection taken from the experience that the world apparently disappears when we faint or are asleep. But you know the structure of the whole world suggests that it can disappear. It has no substance in itself. It can also be in a condition which is not; matter can dissolve into radiation, and there is nothing, not even mass; the whole thing has gone.

Mrs. Case: But is not radiation just as real as matter?

Dr. Jung: Of course, but it is no longer matter. Naturally, you must assume that there is something, inasmuch as you think about something. You see, with all these problems you wind up with antinomies or a priori categories. You need categories of judgment in order to be able to think about something at all; as soon as you think, you have already produced an existence, and if you assume that something is, you already think.<sup>8</sup> So the idea that a world returns to non-being by perfect consciousness is a philosophical idea which we have to notice; but we cannot say that this makes or destroys a world. It only makes and destroys our world. Well, all this is most unsatisfactory, I dislike talking of such philosophic questions concerning the reality of objects. Philosophy has very much to do with the subject, and the more you think things, the more you make them enter yourself—the more you obliterate them. You extinguish things by thinking about them; you make them unreal because you make them enter the self and then they no longer exist. For things are our world, not the world.

Well now, we will continue our text:

The man looked up distrustfully. "If thou speakest the truth," said he, "I lose nothing when I lose my life. I am not much more than an animal which hath been taught to dance by blows and scanty fare."

"Not at all," said Zarathustra, "thou hast made danger thy calling, therein there is nothing contemptible. Now thou perishest by thy calling, therefore will I bury thee with mine own hands."

When Zarathustra had said this the dying one did not reply further, but he moved his hand as if he sought the hand of Zarathustra in gratitude.

<sup>8</sup> Immanuel Kant did not hold that thinking created existence, but that the human understanding—not the preexistent world in itself—is the origin of space, time, causality, and other forms of perception and conception, without which the world is unintelligible.

We see here that the dying rope-dancer is very close to Zarathustra, and in how far Zarathustra assimilates him. In which sentence does that become visible?

Miss Hannah: "Thou hast made danger thy calling."

Dr. Jung: Exactly. That shows in how far Zarathustra is the rope-dancer.

Dr. Reichstein: It is an anticipation, of course, but there is a parallel to this burial in old legends and alchemistic philosophy where the spiritual part must be buried in the earth in order to bring out something new.

Dr. Jung: Yes, like the grain of wheat that is buried in the earth in order that it may grow. If we encounter the figure of the rope-dancer again, we can assume that he is here buried for the purpose of a later resurrection. Do you know of any figure similar or analogous to the rope-dancer later on?

Miss Hannah: Is it the ugliest man?

Dr. Jung: It is quite possible that he is resuscitated as the ugliest man.

Miss Hannah: I don't understand: "Thy soul will be dead before thy body." I know it is a prophecy of Nietzsche's fate, but presumably he meant something himself by putting it down.

Dr. Jung: How does it sound here? In what tone does he speak?

Miss Hannah: It sounds like a negation of the Christian principle.

Dr. Jung: I mean with reference to the rope-dancer.

Miss Hannah: It would be to free him from the fear of death.

Dr. Jung: Well, when you are talking to a dying man with that intention, it would be a sort of last blessing, a consolation. The Christian parallel would be: Fear nothing; thy body will die but thy soul will live. And here he says his soul will be dead even before his body, "Fear therefore nothing any more." Just the opposite! But how is that opposite a consolation? I had not intended to enter upon this because it is really the anticipation of the whole tragic problem of Zarathustra which will be unfolded in the course of the drama. It is here in the bud, you can deduce from it the later developments, but it is difficult to demonstrate now.

Mr. Nuthall-Smith: He has already experienced the whole horror of dying when his soul dies; his body does not mean so much. Therefore, he has nothing to fear.

Dr. Jung: Would that be a consolation?

Dr. Schlegel: The rope-dancer said if the devil appeared, he would take him to hell.

Dr. Jung: Well, the rope-dancer was afraid that the devil would drag him down to hell, and then Zarathustra tells him there is no hell—and: “Thy soul will be dead even sooner than thy body.” So there remains nothing for the devil to take away with him. Now do you call that consolation? It would be as if a person were suffering from a very bad toothache and somebody said: “Don’t worry, I will shoot you.” One could understand it like this. But it is an exceedingly queer consolation.

Mrs. Crowley: Is it not connected with the idea that God is dead?

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is absolutely certain. It is an anti-Christian consolation. Of course, everybody would think it consoling to say: “Now don’t be afraid, man, you must get rid of your body naturally, but your soul will live. As the old Egyptians and the Assyrians and the Christians for two thousand years, and all primitive people have believed.” But here the whole thing is turned upside down and he talks as if that were a consolation. It is peculiar, yet I hold that there is a secret kind of consolation in it—but a consolation which is only to be understood out of the particular condition in which Nietzsche found himself in that moment. Otherwise, for any other kind of psychology, that would be no consolation whatever.

Mr. Allemann: Nietzsche understands that the body, the earth, is all and that the soul is nothing, the soul is meager; so there is nothing in keeping the soul and losing the body. When the body is lost the soul must be lost also.

Dr. Jung: Yes, he even takes it for a sort of consolation to keep the body and lose the soul. He has that prejudice of the late Christian age that the soul of man is nothing, not worth saving. It is even a great merit not to save anything so low down. It needs a tremendous institution to save such a miserable thing; nothing further can come out of man. The good we possess is all revealed. We are quite incapable of producing anything good out of ourselves. We cannot even make our way: it is all the grace of God. You see, in Catholicism there is at least the possibility of sanctification through work, but in Protestantism there is nothing but grace, and if that doesn’t work we are lost forever. We have a very low esteem in our civilization for what one calls soul; we only have words. When it comes to the practical showdown, there is no esteem at all, no patience. If you say to a man that he has to spend a certain time every day for the development of his soul, he laughs in your face. He has never heard of such a thing. It is ridiculous; one believes and that is enough. That one should do something about it is absolutely unheard of.

Dr. Reichstein: I think the rope-dancer has committed a kind of Promethean sin, and therefore his soul will be punished for eternity. So then it would be a consolation if his soul were not a reality.

Dr. Jung: And one could also say that it would be a consolation for the man Nietzsche who is a sort of Prometheus; and inasmuch as he is a Prometheus, he is a rope-dancer. Thus far it is a sort of consolation to tell him his worries will be soon over. For your soul is worry, if you have no soul there is no worry. This consolation coincides with Zarathustra's general teaching of the "blond beast."<sup>9</sup> Be heroic, like a fair animal. Then you have no soul. It is bunk to have a soul. It means foolish psychological complications; therefore be heroic. Identify with that great figure of the unconscious and get rid of all that psychology, all those distinctions which just mean worry. To get drunk with the figures of the unconscious is Dionysian; if you have read farther, you remember that the feast of the ass is a Dionysian orgy. That is what he advocates as a means against the insinuations of the ugliest man, in order to overcompensate the ugliest man who is a sort of miserable Christian. In the cult of Dionysos it is even the main purpose to be drunk and unconscious, to end the psychological worry, to forget in the embrace of nature all the things that bother you as being too small.

In Schiller's "Hymn to Joy," you find this idea of the compensation of the small misery of man through the greatness of the completely unconscious state of the Dionysian enthusiasm. In that intoxication, the god enters the mystes. He becomes a god himself. He becomes the great current of nature, the stream itself, and there are no individual worries any longer. That is a way to deal with worries when they become too great. It is the hysterical way, to use a very cool word in that connection, and it is the way of the alcoholic, who seeks unconsciousness in intoxication. He runs away to the great universe from his personal troubles, as the hysterical individual tries to save himself from his complex. The other way, the psychasthenic way or the introverted way, is to lock oneself away with one's complex, to avoid other people, to avoid intoxication in order to stare into the face of the complex and to do nothing else. That would be the Apollonian way. Of course that is not understood in the term Apollonian, but by definition it would be that way in the sense of discrimination, discriminating yourself as marked by a complex in contradistinction to all other beings. Just no embrace to the universe, not one kiss to all beings, focussing all your attention upon staring into the face of the complex, being a monster in a monastery, settling down to the fact that one is excluded. That is another way, another means of redemption or way of grace if you like to say so.<sup>10</sup>

Now here he advocates the Dionysian way. Forget yourself, be dead to yourself; your soul will die before your body happily enough, for then you won't see what happens. You will not worry any longer. You will perhaps enter a dream, or a state of death in the sense of complete extinction, even while the body is living on. Already in the course of Zarathustra you see that beginning to operate. Nietzsche tries—or perhaps he was made to try—to rise to a more and more Dionysian condition. More and more the orgiastic hymn comes in. The deeper the worry, the greater the tragedy becomes, the more he loses himself in the enthusiasm of the divine mania. And that is prepared here. To a man like Nietzsche, gripped by an extraordinary suffering, it is a real consolation when somebody says: "All that terrible trouble which burns you now with the tortures of hell, will come to an end; you will go to sleep and not know what is happening to your body." If you have ever experienced such a state of oblivion in your life, where only your body lives, then you know all the bliss of the Dionysian revelation. And Nietzsche had that revelation. There are beautiful poems later on where it becomes quite obvious. He really got out of himself for a moment on the wings of an extraordinary enthusiasm, absolutely disentangled from the worry of discriminating consciousness. He actually suffered from an overintensity of consciousness, which is always the case if one is anachronistic, if one lives in a time when one is not meant to live, because one finds no understanding contemporaries.

Angelus Silesius was such a man; he lived in a time when he simply could not find his equal. Yes, if he had been able to travel to India, he would have found his equal. They would have said his truth was an old truth which they had known long ago. But nobody could understand in the West. And what happened to him? Well, he was a fellow who did not get into Dionysian enthusiasms because, as his fate shows, he locked himself away with his complex. He locked himself up literally in a monastery where he died. He lost all his beautiful poetry completely, and produced fifty-six awful pamphlets against Protestantism. He had been a Protestant and he died most miserably in a hell of a neurosis in a monastery. You see, that was the other way round: his body died before his soul, and his soul became a terrible, poisonous demon—the soul of that man who had produced “Der Cherubinische Wandersmann,” that sweet mystic verse. And then fifty-six pamphlets against Protestantism!<sup>11</sup> That is something horrible, really satanic. But it is what naturally happens to the introvert, or at least to the one who prefers that mechanism. It is of course only faintly a question of type. I am convinced that even an introvert can use an extraverted mechanism if he uses the way of the inferior function.

Nietzsche had an extraverted mind, so he would use the extraverted mechanism, the Dionysian way. But you see both in Nietzsche’s case. He was first a professor at the University of Basel, but he was not quite understood, so he locked himself away with his complex and lived quite isolated. Then the unconscious came up with all its extraversion, and this time he locked the complex away from himself and dissolved in a tremendous extraversion within his isolation,<sup>12</sup> exactly like old Angelus Silesius—who should have discovered the cellar of the monastery and about a thousand bottles of old wine. His neurosis would have been cured, but he would have died from cirrhosis of the liver.

<sup>11</sup> Angelus Silesius (1624-1677), pen name of Johann Scheffler. The Cherub Wayfarer begins: “I know that without me / God can no moment live; / were I to die, then He / no longer could survive.” Rilke’s poem “What will do you, God, if I die?” is strikingly similar in idea. See also CW 11, par. 190.

<sup>12</sup> That is, Nietzsche, an extreme introvert, was, in Jung’s theory of compensation, extraverted in his unconscious. It was this, then, that was tapped in his fantasies of Dionysian celebrations of the body.

LECTURE I

10 October 1934

Dr. Jung:

Ladies and Gentlemen: We stopped before the vacation at the death of the rope-dancer, so we will start in now with section 7.

Meanwhile the evening came on, and the market-place veiled itself in gloom. Then the people dispersed, for even curiosity and terror become fatigued. Zarathustra, however, still sat beside the dead man on the ground, absorbed in thought: so he forgot the time. But at last it became night, and a cold wind blew upon the lonely one. Then arose Zarathustra and said to his heart:

Verily, a fine catch of fish hath Zarathustra made to-day! It is not a man he hath caught, but a corpse.

Sombre is human life, and as yet without meaning: a buffoon may be fateful to it.

I want to teach men the sense of their existence, which is the Superman, the lightning out of the dark cloud—man.

But still am I far from them, and my sense speaketh not unto their sense. To men I am still something between a fool and a corpse.

Gloomy is the night, gloomy are the ways of Zarathustra. Come, thou cold and stiff companion! I carry thee to the place where I shall bury thee with mine own hands.

What do you think is remarkable in this passage?

Mrs. Crowley: I think this chapter is the repetition of that scene of the lightning and the Superman. It brings up that point again. But I feel that it is like a preface to the next one, that it cannot be separated, and that chapter 8 again goes back to chapter 2. We can get it only by analogy with the second one, where he is coming down from the mountain.

Mrs. Baynes: To me it is that he accepts the corpse as his companion.

Dr. Jung: Exactly. You see, we could almost expect that Zarathustra, having watched the catastrophe of the rope-dancer, would be rather disinterested, because it would seem to have really happened outside of himself. He might philosophize about it but there would be no close or intimate connection between the rope-dancer and himself, unless it was the very near connection which we established in the former Seminar—namely, that the rope-dancer is the human form of Zarathustra, Nietzsche himself as the human being. It is just that which explains why he cannot leave the corpse; he has to remain with it, to make the corpse his companion. Now, this is a pretty gruesome spectacle, I should say: that Nietzsche the man should be in any sense the corpse that accompanies Zarathustra, the corpse that is carried by him. This is in fact the gloomy aspect of Zarathustra, a cloud hanging over the whole book—Nietzsche being dragged along by that figure of Zarathustra—and it comes to the daylight here for the first time. “Verily, a fine catch of fish hath Zarathustra made today! It is not a man he hath caught, but a corpse.” We must pay attention to this sentence. It is important, because later on comes the realization that he needs other people just because he has not caught a man. He realizes that he ought to have other people instead of that corpse. You see, if the corpse is himself, then he is dead really, and he has to replace himself by the other people he catches—or one could almost say, by other corpses. They must be, then, instead of himself; he hands over to others his human life which he should have lived. Therefore, he says that human existence is uncanny and without a meaning.

The jester, as you know, is the negative aspect of Zarathustra, which means that an unconscious figure, like Zarathustra (we dealt with the different aspects of these figures in the last Seminar) could prevail against the human being to such an extent that the latter would be destroyed. That explains why he calls the Superman a lightning out of that dark cloud, man (lightning is, of course, utterly destructive), and also why he puts himself between a fool and a corpse. For people in general were quite unable to see who Zarathustra was, and so they took him either for a jester or the corpse; either it was Nietzsche himself, the corpse, or it was a sort of malevolent fool—in other words, insanity. People would not see the archetype which Zarathustra represents, the archetype of the wise old man. Inasmuch as this archetype was obvious to them at all, it appeared only as a jester or a corpse, a being which would either make a man insane or kill him. But Zarathustra is not only the archetype; he contains the self at the same time and is therefore an exceedingly superior figure. Now, what about this identity of an archetype with the self? Can that be?

Miss Hannah: No, because the archetype is the general idea, and the self the particular thing in the Here and Now.

Dr. Jung: Yes. The archetype is a collective thing; it is by its definition a content of the collective unconscious. It is an omnipresent eternal figure which one encounters everywhere, while the self is not to be encountered everywhere. The self is, by definition, the most individual thing, the essence of individuality. It is the uniqueness. And that one can only encounter where?

Answer: In an individuated human being.

Dr. Jung: Well, only in yourself. You cannot even encounter it in anybody else, only in yourself. The self is the immediate awareness of your uniqueness, and it is a uniqueness which is in a way most personal, most intimate. It is your uniqueness. Now, I grant you it is exceedingly difficult to understand such a thing intellectually, because it is most contradictory. Of course, we always have to keep in mind that the self is in the first place the personal Atman—to use the Indian formulation of that concept. But their definition is that the personal Atman, the self, is in everybody; it is the smallest thing, the thumbing in the heart of everybody, yet it is the greatest thing in the world, the super-personal Atman, the general collective Atman.<sup>1</sup> And we can accept that definition. It can be grasped intellectually even by an occidental mind. Yet it is not grasped properly at all, because the super-personal Atman is not the thumbing in everybody. It is the thumbing in myself. There is only the self, and that is my self, for by definition the personal Atman is uniqueness.

Now, I cannot guarantee whether the East understands it in this way, but at all events we can be satisfied with the fact that there are mandalas and formulas in the East, ready-made, so we can assume that people have understood this peculiar secret of the self. For instance, take the worship of a mandala, not like these chakras on the wall which represent evolution, but a mandala of completion, a Lamaistic chakra, where in the center there is either the thunderbolt, the vajra, the abstract symbol of concentrated divine power, or Shiva and Shakti in embrace.<sup>2</sup> When the Tantric initiate enters the center of the mandala through the four gates of the functions,<sup>3</sup> it is understood that he approaches the god, which in the philosophy of the Upanishads would be the super-personal Absolute Atman. In other words, the initiate brings the personal Atman back to its divine source, the super-personal Atman. In the end, when he has entered through the four gates and has reached the center, then the climax of the contemplation would be the complete identity of the initiate with the god—if he is a man, with the Shiva, and if a woman, with the Shakti, the female aspect of the god. The two aspects merge finally into one, in the nonexistent yet existing Brahman, the potential world being. Now, in this case an individual self has become the universal self, yet when you approach the universal self through the personal, you carry the individual consciousness into the universal consciousness. Then the universal consciousness is identical with the individual consciousness; there the self in all its particularity, in all its peculiar personal being, is at the same time the universal being. This is utterly paradoxical, just as paradoxical as that old German mystical poet, Angelus Silesius, for instance, when he wonders mildly that he and God are just the same, that there is no difference between himself and God.<sup>4</sup>

You see, we must keep in mind that in our unconscious psychology there are these thoughts, which are evolved as the Tantric system, say, in India, or in Lamaistic philosophy, or as mystical thought in the West, and so we have to talk of them. This is not mysticism, this is psychology. It is simply the scientific consideration of such facts, which are constantly reproduced by our unconscious in this form or another. And here we find such a form in Zarathustra, because Zarathustra is on the one side very clearly the archetype of the wise old man, and on the other side that concept of uniqueness. Therefore, the absolutely indissoluble interwovenness of Nietzsche himself and Zarathustra of which we have spoken. This peculiar identity and nonidentity is in exactly the same relation as the personal and super-personal self, or the personal Atman and the super-personal Atman. Even when Nietzsche is Zarathustra, he is his own uniqueness, his own personal self as it were. Now, this thing should not be an archetype at the same time; the archetype should be differentiated or discriminated from the self.

Mr. Baumann: Could one not say that the archetype stands only for Shiva-bindu—appears in the eternal embrace of its feminine side, the Shakti” (CW 9 i, par. 631, and fig. 1). Vajra is the symbol of divine power.

the unconscious, and the self for the conscious and unconscious together?

Dr. Jung: Exactly. The self is always the sum total of conscious and unconscious processes. It comprehends consciousness; consciousness is included in the self like a small circle in a bigger circle. The self cannot be contained in an archetype because an archetype is merely a content, a figure, of the collective unconscious, and cannot possibly contain the thing in which it is contained. The archetype is contained in the unconscious, and the unconscious and the conscious together make the self. "The self" is a concept of totality which contains all the archetypes and individual consciousness at the same time. The symbol of totality is always a circle, and one can say that in the center is the conscious, and around it is the unconscious containing the archetypes, among them the archetype of the old man. And that cannot contain the self, because the whole circle is the self, the totality of the conscious and unconscious. So it can only be a transitory condition in which the idea of the self or the idea of totality appears as a content in an archetype. Now, how would you characterize such a transitory condition? When is it possible for that condition to appear in one archetype, the archetype of the old man? There is one definite situation in which that can be.

Mr. Baumann: I think it can be when the archetype includes something eternal, not referring to the past alone, but including the whole development. The wise man ordinarily implies the old man who has had only past experiences, but he might take a form without time limit, though I have no idea what it would be.

Dr. Jung: Well, you can say the old wise man is surely the figure of the great teacher, the initiator, the psychopompos. And then he can contain the idea of the self for a while as a sort of vision or intuition. He knows about it, he teaches it, because he is the psychopompos who leads the initiate on the way to his completion. As a matter of fact, it is the rule in analysis that when the patient begins to realize the archetype of the old wise man, the self also appears in the figure. That is the reason why men have the tendency to identify at once with the wise old man. Because the self appears then, they are already in the wise old man, so to speak, and then they are sucked up and they become mana, important. They have an inflation and walk about with heavy heads, "les initiés imaginaires," as Zimmer once said very wittily.<sup>5</sup> When a man is swelled up with the idea of possessing the big thing, being a hell of a fellow, getting very wise, it means that identification. And in the inflation which follows, the human being goes to hell. For one cannot possibly live as the wise old man day and night; one would be something between a corpse and a fool. People would think so and right they would be. As I said, people thought Nietzsche was a fool in reality and were always afraid there would be insanity behind it. And he suffered from terrible migraines, he only lived for his health, he was a living corpse; that is the external appearance of a fellow who has been swallowed by the wise old man. But the wise old man ought to have wings, he should be a swan, not a human being. He should not walk about. He should make use of his aeroplane that he carries within himself. You know, in the East they suppose that the perfect wise men are able to fly. That is the criterion—as long as one cannot fly, one has not attained to the summit of wisdom. So let the old wise man be an air-being, a subtle body with wings, and don't identify with it.

This is one of the events which very often happens to the analyst; it is one of the forms of analyst-neurosis. Analysts have very peculiar neuroses. They are infected by all the transferences they get and their heads are twisted. They are poisoned, and as a rule they become sensitive and susceptible, difficult to deal with. That is always the infection of the cursed profession: they are cursed by their perfect old wise man. They should know better but they don't. Therefore, it is important for the analyst to confess that he does not know better, or he will know worse. Then he gives a chance to the patient. But you see, there is always the prestige of the doctor. The public wants to be convinced that the doctor is a sort of sorcerer or magician. The primitive medicine man, of course, lives on that prestige. He is identical with the wise old man, so very often he is sick or insane at the same time. Therefore, primitive people are always afraid of being made into medicine men. It is not an enviable condition.

Mrs. Crowley: I thought the corpse suggested his shadow, that this was where he was first meeting his shadow.

Dr. Jung: Do you remember our great soreites syllogismos?<sup>6</sup> The conclusion there is that everything is everything. So the corpse is also the rope-dancer, and the rope-dancer is the shadow sure enough. But Nietzsche himself as a human being is in the same connection with Zarathustra as the rope-dancer with the jester. You see, the rope-dancer is the negative attitude of Nietzsche himself and Zarathustra; the rope-dancer is the one who jumps over the hesitating Nietzsche. Then in the next chapter, the jester comes, and in the ninth chapter Zarathustra himself says that he is going to jump over all those that hesitate or are reluctant. "Over the loitering and tardy will I leap."

Mrs. Crowley: But now he is giving up teaching. He has a new attitude entirely after he buries the corpse.

Dr. Jung: Ah yes, the new attitude that will come is that he needs human beings instead of himself. Another quality of the inflation by the wise old man is that one gets a mania to teach, to be a missionary, to tell people all about it and take care that plenty get into the kingdom of heaven. It always creates a sort of missionary attitude, and of course the conviction that there is no other way but this way.

Mr. Allemann: Speaking of consciousness, is it possible, when the self is made conscious, to get over that identification, at least temporarily?

Dr. Jung: Well, as a rule you go through a time when you are identical with the wise old man. Nobody can realize an archetype without having been identified with it first. If you even touch the animus or anima, the most vulgar archetypes of all, you are they, and you cannot realize them without having been thoroughly caught by them. No woman will realize what the animus is without having been identical with him, and no man will realize what the anima is without having been filled by the anima. In speaking of such things, I say: "as if": it is as if these archetypes were each of them stronger than the ego. They easily catch hold of you and you are possessed as if they were lions or bears, say—primitive forces which are quite definitely stronger than you. You see, our prejudice is that we are sitting on top of the mountain with our conscious and our will, and nothing can get at us; and then the unconscious catches us from below. People call the thing that is below "the subconscious" instead of "the unconscious"; it sounds so much better. The subconscious is the cellar, something below your feet, and you are St. George standing upon the dragon. That is the medieval ambition, to kill the dragon and stand on top of it. But if you descend into that world, you encounter a figure which is definitely stronger than your ego complex. Therefore, quite naively, Rider Haggard speaks of: "She-that-must-be-obeyed."<sup>7</sup> Nothing doing otherwise, you have to obey. It is quite self-evident that she is the stronger part. And the complex of the wise old man is a fearful thing. Sometimes the dragon is overcome, so we can assume that it is not always so strong.

But there are plenty of whale-dragons that attack and overcome the hero, proving that the dragon is much the stronger—until the hero makes the attack from within. Now we will go on to Chapter 8.

When Zarathustra had said this to his heart, he put the corpse upon his shoulders and set out on his way. Yet had he not gone a hundred steps, when there stole a man up to him and whispered in his ear—and lo! he that spake was the buffoon from the tower. “Leave this town, O Zarathustra,” said he, “there are too many here who hate thee. The good and just hate thee, and call thee their enemy and despiser; the believers in the orthodox belief hate thee, and call thee a danger to the multitude. It was thy good fortune to be laughed at: and verily thou spakest like a buffoon. It was thy good fortune to associate with the dead dog; by so humiliating thyself thou hast saved thy life to-day. Depart, however, from this town—or to-morrow I shall jump over thee, a living man over a dead one.” And when he had said this, the buffoon vanished; Zarathustra, however, went on through the dark streets.

At the gate of the town the grave-diggers met him; they shone their torch on his face, and recognising Zarathustra, they sorely derided him. “Zarathustra is carrying away the dead dog: a fine thing that Zarathustra hath turned a grave-digger! For our hands are too cleanly for that roast. Will Zarathustra steal the bite from the devil? Well then, good luck to the repast! If only the devil is not a better thief than Zarathustra!—he will steal them both, he will eat them both!” And they laughed among themselves, and put their heads together.

Zarathustra made no answer thereto, but went on his way. When he had gone on for two hours, past forests and swamps, he had heard too much of the hungry howling of the wolves, and he himself became a-hungry. So he halted at a lonely house in which a light was burning.

“Hunger attacketh me,” said Zarathustra, “like a robber. Among forests and swamps my hunger attacketh me, and late in the night.

“Strange humours hath my hunger. Often it cometh to me only after a repast, and all day it hath failed to come: where hath it been?”

And thereupon Zarathustra knocked at the door of the house.

He carried the corpse to the woods. Do you remember any historical parallel to this carrying of the corpse? It is typical symbolism.

Mrs. Crowley: The carrying of the cross.

Dr. Jung: Yes, it is a symbol of the so-called transitus, the old term which designates the carrying of the cross in the Christian mystery for example, or the carrying of the tree in the Attis mystery, or the carrying of the dead bull which was himself by Mithras. Mithras was the white bull of the beginning of the world, the world bull, Abudabad, in Persian mythology; so he sacrificed his own bull, himself, and then he carried his own corpse.<sup>8</sup> That carrying of the bull is really the parallel to Zarathustra carrying the corpse of the rope-dancer, the equivalent on a different level. And what is the subtle difference of those two symbols? What did it mean originally that Mithras sacrificed the bull?

Mrs. Crowley: He sacrificed his animal nature.

Dr. Jung: Yes, it would be the impetuosity, the uncontrolled affectivity of the primitive man. Therefore, Mithraism is the religion of the Roman soldiers. The remains of the Mithraic temples were found chiefly near the garrisons along the German Lines for instance; and quite recently a well-preserved Mithraeum has been discovered in the Syrian desert, where the French are making explorations in cooperation with Yale University. They have now asked the connoisseur of Mithraism, Cumont, to help in the excavations. It was the religion of the imperial house of Rome and of the soldiers because it was a religion of discipline. And this discipline was expressed in the bullfight by the toreador who, with a most marvelous self-control, showing no sign of nervousness or fear, kills the bull in the critical moment. Mithras was a deified toreador, so the god was represented in the position of the antique toreador. He did not face the bull with a sword, but jumped upon his back like a cowboy and killed him with a short sword which he pushed in near the shoulder blade. Therefore, the bull had a sort of belt round the chest to help the bullfighter leap on his back and to cling to in case of need. Usually, the toreador is depicted with a most peculiar face of hysterical sentimentality, like a Guido Reni.<sup>9</sup> There is a very wonderful head of Mithras in the British Museum in London, where you can study this strange hysterical expression, like that of a person who ought to do something which he doesn't like, so that his mind is split. He is not at one with what he is doing. Therefore, the god is always turning his head away when he pushes his knife in. It is exceedingly psychological, as if the overcoming of his emotions were not entirely shared by the whole individual, as if a part of the individual were for it and a part against it. We don't like to control our emotions because we enjoy them. It is a sort of partial suicide when we control them. We regret ourselves, we are sorry for ourselves; and the god expresses that in his peculiar face.

Now, after the bull's death it is carried somewhere, but this part of the Mithraic mystery is unfortunately absolutely dark. Cumont says, however, that this is the transitus part of the mystery, in which things are carried from one place to another, and he draws a parallel with the carrying of the cross of Christ.<sup>10</sup> But in the Christian religion it is no longer a question of killing the bull. Christ as a lamb is sacrificed, and one calls that symbolical but it is really allegorical. It really means that Christ as a man is sacrificed, or one can also say that God himself has become man in order to sacrifice himself for the redemption of mankind. So the cross carried by Christ would be the symbol of man, and truly it is, for standing with the arms outstretched, the position of the figure on the cross is the gesture of complete acceptance. It means, there is nothing to be done about it, do what you please, one is defenceless. It is the complete surrender of man. The Christian symbol of Christ carrying the cross means that he carries his own body, his own corpse. We have here a sort of Christian symbolism, therefore. Zarathustra carries his own humanity, his human body, Nietzsche, as the rope-dancer who has been killed, a kind of paraphrase of the Christian sacrifice. As I have said before, Nietzsche was in a secret way more Christian than anyone would expect.

Mr. Baumann: It has been said that in Christianity there are no more heroes, only martyrs: they all have to die.

Dr. Jung: Well, the martyrs are just the witnesses. The Greek word martyros means witness. They overcome fear and so on, but it has nothing to do with the transitus, which is a symbolical mystery transformation.

Mr. Baumann: The hero does his work and afterwards is in heaven, but in Christianity man has to suffer in order to accomplish.

Dr. Jung: Yes, but the principle of the church was imitatio Christi.<sup>11</sup>

<sup>10</sup> In making sacrifices the votary held a bundle of sacred twigs in hand. Mithra was born from a rock in the shade of a sacred tree. His greatest deed was to capture a wild bull and drag it backwards over many obstacles. This is his "journey" or transitus.

<sup>11</sup> The date of The Imitation of Christ is uncertain and is only doubtfully ascribed to Thomas à Kempis (1380-1471), an Augustinian monk. It is a medieval expression of

They carried on just by witnessing, not by being heroes. The hero is always original. Christ did not carry on anything; as a symbolic figure, he was original and creative. When a martyr was killed in the arena, he was killed for Christ or for his creed, but not for himself. He was simply a witness for the Lord. That has nothing to do with what happens to the hero.

Mr. Baumann: That is what I meant: there are no more heroes in Christianity.

Dr. Jung: Ah yes, that is true. Of course, one does call martyrs heroes of the church, but they were heroes for the church and not for themselves. But Christ is the hero for himself; he did not sacrifice himself for the glory of any church. It was the natural expression of his own life, of his individuality. Now, here we have the symbolism of the transitus again. What is the difference between this transitus and the transitus of Christ for instance, or Mithras?

Miss Wolff: The bull which is killed by Mithras is a god, apparently a chthonic god. After he is sacrificed by Mithras, the world is created out of his various organs. The corn, the vine, and all the animals spring from them, and his soul becomes a celestial shepherd. And Christ is a god. He is the incarnation of god in human form, and he dies as a god. But with Nietzsche, Zarathustra is a sort of god, but he is not sacrificed, and he merely carries a corpse, the corpse of a very inferior man. So here the god remains alive, there is no sacrifice. Only the corpse of Nietzsche's shadow, his own collective human side, is sacrificed, necessarily inferior because all values are concentrated on the superhuman aspect.

Dr. Jung: Exactly. The difference is that Christ carries the cross to his own execution. The cross is the instrument by which he will be killed. He will be killed by man and the god is sacrificed, while Zarathustra is carrying the body in order to bury it, merely. The transitus in the cult of Attis is a better analogy, where the fir tree is carried into a cave, into the earth, the cave being a burial place or a mystery place—they are indistinguishably the same. Therefore, the first Christian cult took place in the catacombs. It was by no means to escape persecution, for everybody knew the access to the catacombs—they were public burial grounds. They simply worshipped in the burial ground. And the Christian medieval churches are still burial grounds. One walks on tombs; the whole place is filled with corpses just as it was in the beginning. So carrying the burden into the grotto, the so-called spelaeum, means carrying it into the place of tombs. Human dwellings were also burial places originally, particularly in the Near East. In Mesopotamia, for instance, houses have been excavated where the corpses of the ancestors were buried under the floors. That was done to keep the ancestral spirits in the house, or in the family, as the Eskimos often preserve the corpses in their huts in order to keep the ancestral spirits with them. It is most unfortunate when the host of ancestral spirits leave the ground, because then the living no longer have the support of the spirit world, and that is very dangerous under primitive conditions.

what many—but certainly not Jung or Nietzsche—have thought to be the best life for mankind.

This aspect of the transitus, carrying something to the burial place, played a role probably in the Mithraic cult as well, but the relationship of the cult of Attis to Christianity is very close, perhaps even closer than Mithraism. For instance. Hippolytus, an early father of the church, says that the grotto in which Christ is said to have been born was, according to tradition, the sanctuary of Attis.<sup>12</sup> And quite recently a very interesting proof has been brought to light: recent excavations in the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem have shown that below the Christian church, which dates from early in the fourth century, is Roman masonry, the remains of a temple of Attis built by the Emperor Hadrian in about 136; and this was erected in order to desecrate the place of the Christian cult.<sup>13</sup> This proves that before the cult of Attis the Christians had already worshipped in that place. There must have been a very early local tradition that Christ was really born in this spelaeum, and that it was actually a spelaeum of Attis is shown by the fact that Hadrian again erected the temple of Attis with the purpose of desecrating the place of Christ's birth. You see, these traditions obviously have a great similarity, and there are other remains which prove the relationship. Just where the Vatican is standing today, for example, there was a temple of Attis, and the head priest of that cult was called papas in Greek, and the priest who is still ruling there in the old place is the papa or pope; papa is the Latin form.

Here, then, we have a very peculiar transitus. Zarathustra was be in the place of the god of the antique mysteries, in the place of Christ the man-god, or Mithras the hero god, or Attis the son god, the son of Astarte. He is carrying the human body, the corpse—or the humanity, one can say—which really carries him. You see, there is a peculiar twisting of the facts. The archetype has its life in this world of consciousness through the fact that it appears in a living body, so the living body carries the archetype of the wise old man. But here it is represented as if the archetype were carrying the man, which is of course true inasmuch as an archetype is greater in size than the ego complex and therefore able to swallow it. And when the ego complex disappears in the archetype, man is the victim. He is injured, that is; his life is taken from him by the archetype of the wise old man. Now, if you take that as the symbol of a mystery cult, like those in antiquity, it would express the fact that man was sacrificed to an archetypal idea, or an archetypal spirit—which is true—and it would be at the same time a sort of admonition to the believers of that cult, as the killing of the bull, for instance, is an admonition to the believers of Mithraism. It meant: that is you; you ought to kill your own bull as Mithras the god overcomes himself in his animal aspect. Or as Christ is imitated in the Christian mystery. He goes to his own sacrifice carrying his humanity, dragging his humanity along to that divine sacrifice. And that is of course very interesting, and quite different from the Mithras or Attis idea. So here again we can say this is a sort of admonition: Let the Superman carry the ordinary man as if man were a corpse. You see, there is absolutely nothing of the Christian idea that the god is proceeding to his own self-sacrifice. Zarathustra is not going to sacrifice himself at all; he is going to live on. He is only going to bury the man, thinking that he is thus overcoming the thing which has been so reluctant, heavy, unwilling, too clumsy, too conservative. Therefore, Zarathustra's identification with the jester who jumps over the hesitating rope-dancer.

Now, that amounts to a teaching of inflation, one could say. It would mean that you should identify with the archetype even if you sacrifice your humble humanity; you should sacrifice your humanity to the life of the archetype. That is exactly what happened in Nietzsche's life, and the question is whether that should go as a general symbol. If it would work as a collective symbol, such a passage would become dogmatic. It would become the contents of a mystery; you would see the holy figure of Zarathustra carrying man to his rest, going to bury man, and that would fill us with a particular emotion. It would put something on fire in us as the Christian mystery did formerly. I am sure that the believers of Mithraism followed the peripeteia<sup>14</sup> of the divine mystery with great emotion, probably with tears and lamentations, or with shouts of joy.

It was a sort of passion play, and it would not have worked. It would not have gripped people if it had not gripped their emotions, touched their actual psychological condition. If people were in a state which could be expressed by such a symbol, they would most certainly be deeply and emotionally fascinated by it, and it would work like a transitus symbol in a mystery cult. And you know there has been that pretension. There have been people who considered Zarathustra as a prophetic revelation, a teaching of profound wisdom. It has had a sort of religious value. I remember when I was a student, there were quite a number of young people in Basel, even certain professors of the younger generation, who studied Zarathustra and made a cult of it. Now, apart from this transitus symbol, what would arrest your attention the most in this chapter? Did you notice anything impressive?

Miss Hannah: His hunger.

Dr. Jung: That is decidedly a point, for later on, quite at the end of Zarathustra, this hunger and thirst business comes up again, but we will postpone it for the time being. There is something before that.

Mrs. Stutz: The devil.

Dr. Jung: That Zarathustra is going to steal the devil's meal? Well, yes, but that is already contained in the jester. One must contemplate the sequence of events here, as in a dream, as if it were a causal sequence. That is the principle of science: science looks at the events of the world which follow in a sequence as a causal sequence. One must try to establish a causality. Science thus produces sense. So for an explanation here, one must assume a causal sequence.<sup>15</sup> Here, then, by the gesture of carrying the corpse on his back, he causes the jester to appear, and that is really causality. It is not a mere incident or chance; the jester is called up by Zarathustra's gesture. He only went about a hundred paces before the jester came along. He cannot go very far with his victim without making the jester appear. Now what is the jester in relation to Zarathustra?

Mrs. Crowley: The shadow.

Dr. Jung: Yes, we could say the very actively negative aspect of Zarathustra. That jester is an evil demon. As Zarathustra is supposed to be the superior wise man, so the jester is correspondingly destructive and evil, and he comes up now. You see, when you take a certain stand, when you make up your mind to something which is one-sided and therefore strike against an obstacle, then the opposite is conjured up from the unconscious, and the opposite is here symbolized by a fool—and a destructive fool at that. In Nietzsche's case it means insanity. If anybody behaves like Zarathustra—if a man allows himself to be swallowed by an archetype—then he will be swallowed by the unconscious. In other words, he will be insane. It will be a psychosis, a case of schizophrenia perhaps. So no sooner does Zarathustra start to carry that corpse than he conjures up insanity in the form of the jester who kills the mind of a man long before his body. It is the jester who jumps over the rope-dancer and injures him, so that Zarathustra then says to him: "Be quiet, don't worry, your mind will be dead long before your body." This was Nietzsche's case in reality, as you know. He was insane for about eleven years; he had literally predicted his own fate. And this jester is the personification of the insanity. The archetype of the wise old man is understood to be the sum total of human wisdom, and the shadow is necessarily the personification of all human foolishness. Therefore, wisdom and foolishness are so exceedingly close together. One is often not quite certain whether a man is wise or whether he is a great fool; and one must recognize that in foolishness there is a great deal of wisdom. The fool has sometimes been the typical wise man. Till Eulenspiegel, for example, is the fool and the great wise man at the same time. And the primitive medicine man whom they consider so wise is really often insane. Or an insane man is often thought to be wise because he is not understood.

Mr. Baumann: The king's jester would be a case.

Dr. Jung: Yes, and he was the only one who had intelligence. Because he was considered a fool he was allowed to say things which nobody else would dare to say to the king. The medicine man is usually uncanny and feared, but in the Pueblos they have a special clan that is entrusted with the function of the carnival. They are sort of professional clowns. It is an important office, and they are called delight-makers.<sup>16</sup> The medicine man and the delight-maker come together in the figure of the medieval jester, the merryman who was very often the secret councillor of the king and gave him the best advice.<sup>17</sup> The coming up of the jester, then, is very clearly the next fact in the sequence after Zarathustra carries away the human being as a corpse.

Prof. Reichstein: Is not the jester here in quite a helpful role?

Dr. Jung: Well, he has that peculiar ambiguity of the medieval jester. He gives advice to Zarathustra. He advises him to leave the town, and he even says it was good fortune for him that the people thought he was talking like a jester, for if they had really understood, things would not have gone so well. And it was good fortune for him that he went away with the dead dog. He had better make use of the opportunity to disappear; otherwise he—the jester—would jump over Zarathustra exactly as he had jumped over the man. If Zarathustra remained in the town, that is, he would make such a fool of himself that he would be insane himself.

Now, is that really good advice? You see, I would say that if Zarathustra remained in the town, he would remain in collectivity, in human society. He might be found and killed, but also he might be able to convince people of his wisdom, and if he leaves the town he won't be able to do so. At all events, Zarathustra remaining in the town would be forced to be conscious of his ordinary human existence, because those other people would reach him by his humanity, by the body, the corpse. And then he would soon be aware that he was not a man, that he was merely a fantasy or an archetypal image and not a reality. It would soon come about that when he looked at his hand, he would say: "By Jove, this is not my hand at all, like spirits when they are made conscious of the fact that they possess a foreign body." You know, there are cases of people who are possessed by spirits; and to de-possess such a person one must conjure that ghost through the aid of a medium, and then, like the Masters in The Tibetan Book of the Dead, one must tell the ghost that he is dead, disembodied. He won't believe it, he will insist that he has still a body. So one must say: "Now look here, you say you are a man and have a man's body, but look at your hand." (It is a medium's hand because he speaks through the mouth of a woman medium.) Then he says: "This is a woman's hand, how awkward!—how did I get into this strange body?" And it is further proved by telling him to go through a wall, for of course no man was ever seen doing that; so when he goes right through it, he has to admit at last that you are right.<sup>18</sup> There is a doctor in California who cures his neurotic or psychotic patients in that way. His wife is a medium, and he simply gets all the spirits which are supposed to exist in the patients into his wife. ## LECTURE II

Dr. Jung:

Before we begin today I have a proposition to make. I wish that a committee of members of the seminar would occupy themselves with research about the archetype of the wise old man. We used to make such researches in former seminars: you remember perhaps the very excellent "Moon" paper that Dr. Harding and her committee worked out.<sup>1</sup> The moon is of course the archetype of the inner mother, the faint light of the dark earth. We encountered that figure of the earth mother in the Visions also.<sup>2</sup> Since that is a predominant, prevailing archetype of the woman's unconscious, the ruling aspect, it is characteristic for the particular development of fantasies; therefore we made a special investigation into the phenomenology of the archetype of the mother aspect of the moon. Now we are occupied with a man's psychology, so I want a report made about the phenomenology of the archetype of the wise old man. He is the sun but a sun within, an illuminating factor, the sun of understanding, the light of the Gnosis for instance; in the Gnostic texts you always find that light symbolism associated with the wise old man who is the initiator, the bringer of light, the real Lucifer with all the implications of that name.<sup>3</sup>

Concerning the method, you have a number of sources for your researches. First of all you have the comparative history of religions, and the figures of the founders of religions; then you have the mythology of all races, and folklore and fairytales where there is the figure of the sorcerer, for example, in many forms, great and small; then literature, belles-lettres, and particularly poetic art. And besides the great official <sup>1</sup> Dr. Esther Harding (1888-1971), who was born in Britain but practiced Jungian analysis in the U.S., presented her "Moon" paper, "The Symbolism of the Crescent and Its Psychological Meanings" in an earlier seminar. religions, there are minor ones, primitive religions, tribal customs, and the noncanonical traditions—the heretic traditions—in which a lot of psychology is to be found. Psychology has often been exiled from official religions because it is awkward, so one finds there material of an extremely philosophic nature. In our Christian world, for instance, you have the historical traditions of the Gnostics which is heretic philosophy, both early and medieval Gnosticism, the new Platonists, and the later medieval philosophy in the form of alchemy, the Rosicrucians, etc. In literature you encounter the figures of the anima and animus, of course, but you will have great trouble to find suitable examples of the more remote figures that are beyond. The animus and anima are in our immediate experience while these great figures are not—they are always far more projected and therefore less easily recognizable—but they do exist in literature. The earth mother is an exceedingly rare symbolism just because it is highly symbolical, but the wise old man is rather more frequent—there are definite examples because the wise old man has become an institutional figure while the earth mother is no institutional figure, of course. She has always been terribly awkward; she does not fit into a man's institutional world because she is always upsetting institutions. I think this investigation is highly worthwhile in order to make ourselves realize the general aspect of the archetype, so that we may not labor too much under the impression that Nietzsche is such a particular case, that it is only possible for such a figure as Zarathustra to live in the mind of Nietzsche. This research will show beyond question that it is really a représentation collective.

Now we return to our text. You remember we touched upon the problem of the hunger. Zarathustra suddenly becomes aware of that symptom and says: "Hunger attacketh me like a robber." This theme of being overcome with hunger as if it were a robber is anticipated in the passage where the grave-diggers meet him and make jests about him: "A fine thing that Zarathustra hath turned a grave-digger! For our hands are too cleanly for that roast. Will Zarathustra steal the bite from the devil? Well then, good luck to the repast! If only the devil is not a better thief than Zarathustra!—he will steal them both, he will eat them both!" One reads such a passage and hardly notices it; it sounds a bit queer, and one doesn't stop to marvel about it and ask oneself what the devil it means, whether it is a mere figure of speech or has any deeper meaning. I emphasize this passage because it is really characteristic of the style of Zarathustra in general. You see, it is a sort of joke—one could almost say that the jesting way the grave-diggers talk to Zarathustra should have a comical effect—yet there is something, not exactly uncanny, but painful, about it. There is a certain brilliant yet peculiar, painful aspect. Now this painful aspect is pathological, and a pathological joke has a marked difference from a normal joke in that it doesn't help one to laugh from the depth of one's heart because at the same time one feels a stabbing pain somewhere. This is due to the fact that in that joke there is a breaking line, a sort of split on account of the pathological interference; something which is not a jest at all, something gruesome, horrible, is mixed up with it. And that is the case throughout the whole of Zarathustra: there are many attempts to be funny but always with a peculiar split in them, always with that painful admixture of poison as if something awful were behind.

We will try to understand what that is. Obviously, in the allusion made by the grave-diggers it first touches Zarathustra; then in the form of hunger it really comes to him. He says, rightly, that it overtakes him; it has been behind his consciousness and then it catches him—suddenly he is made to realize that he feels very hungry. Also, it is anticipated when still unconscious in the hungry howling of the wolves. Animals always denote unconscious instinctiveness, and it is still projected into the wolves in the woods as if it were their hunger. As, for instance, when you have a pain, a toothache perhaps, you sometimes dream that somebody else is in the same bed and that he or she has the pain. In the dream it is delegated: you are split in half and the other half has the toothache. You are sort of projecting away the pain which threatens to disturb your sleep. The supposition, then, is that Zarathustra's hunger, which appears in the end, was there all the time; he was hungry all day long even when he didn't know it. Now, under what condition does one not notice that one is hungry?

Mrs. Baumann: When one doesn't know that one has a body.

Dr. Jung: Yes. It often happens with intuitive types. That doesn't happen to me. I am very intuitive but I know when I am hungry—I never was short of such a realization. But there are people who do not know it, who think hunger is a psychological problem, and Zarathustra represents such a person here. Where is the evidence for it?

Miss Hannah: Because he is burying it.

Dr. Jung: Exactly, the body is the corpse; it is Mr. Nietzsche himself, and he is going to bury Nietzsche. Even a ghost, if he wants to make any effect on this earth, always needs a body, a medium; otherwise he cannot ring bells or lift tables or anything that ghosts are supposed to do. And so Zarathustra needs the man Nietzsche. If he is going to bury the corpse Nietzsche, then he has no body or he is unconscious of it;

then he is stepping beyond Nietzsche as the jester threatens to step beyond him: we read that passage where the jester threatens to jump over Zarathustra as he had jumped over the rope-dancer. You see, the jester is a terrible danger. If he should jump over Zarathustra, what would be the result?

Mrs. Baumann: You said last week it would be insanity.

Dr. Jung: Yes. You see, Zarathustra is a ghost. He cannot die in the body; he can only fall off the rope, fall off his synthetic mind—and then it would be a psychosis, not the death of the body but the death of the mind. Now, under what conditions is Zarathustra particularly threatened by the jester?

Miss Hannah: By staying in town, remaining with humanity.

Dr. Jung: Yes. If Zarathustra remains with Mr. Friedrich Nietzsche, then Friedrich Nietzsche can say something to him, can realize when he is hungry; he can feed his body, and then the danger is not great. As Mr. Nietzsche, he is only saddled with the problem of the wise old man, which presumably does not fit into his psychology. Sure enough, he wouldn't follow his suggestion. He would not yield easily to that old wise man of the 9th century B.C. That was a rather unexpected feature of his life. Therefore, if Zarathustra could remain in the town he would remain with Nietzsche—and Nietzsche would remain. But since Nietzsche is threatened with death, it means he is overcome by Zarathustra, he is as good as a corpse. He is dead as the rope-dancer; he cannot play his game any longer. And then Zarathustra simply carries a corpse and has no relation to life; he is without physical feet, a pied à terre, and therefore he loses reality. As a man, he loses touch with earth, he is always threatened by insanity. There is no reason why he should not dissolve into infinity, for such a man as a rule does dissolve into infinity. You see, the body inasmuch as it is alive is hungry. Nietzsche is hungry for physical substance: he needs that in order to sustain life. So the body announces its need to be fed, in order that he may form a sort of opposite to Zarathustra, a balancing weight to the mad enthusiastic impulse which Zarathustra gives. But Zarathustra doesn't realize it. Or only a faint realization of the fact that the body has its claims comes through in an indirect way, in that allusion of the grave-diggers.

Now we will try to understand further what the grave-diggers suggest, what their joke really means. They say first that the corpse he is carrying would be too unclean for their hands. That is an immense depreciation of the body. This carrion is only good for hell; it is what the devil would eat; and as the devil is the principle of utter destruction, this morsel is only good for utter destruction. And Zarathustra will perhaps steal this morsel from the devil—he will play the role of the devil in eating that carrion. This idea is logically continued. They say: “Well then, good luck to the repast,” which means that the devil stealing the morsel of carrion will devour it—implying of course utter destruction of the body. If Zarathustra steals the corpse from the devil, he steals it for the sake of an anthropophagous or sarcophagous meal; therefore, they congratulate him on that repast. You see here a very peculiar old anthropophagical idea is coming in, and of course there are historical reasons why it comes in just here. I hope that is clear! I will repeat it: The idea is that the devil will fetch that carrion, it is his morsel; the devil means utter destruction, so utter destruction will devour the morsel. But Zarathustra is apparently going to steal it from the devil, as if he were another devil also meant to devour and thereby destroy the carrion. And because they assume it is so they say: “Blessings on the repast.” They congratulate him that he has stolen it, but they think it is pretty dangerous to deceive the devil and to take a morsel out of his teeth; the danger then might be that the devil would out-thieve Zarathustra and steal both, eat both. For it is perfectly obvious that if Zarathustra succeeds, he will eat the body. You see, that is what we said before: he has overcome the body. But it is a sort of anthropophagous act: he becomes a carrion eater, like a sarcophagus. (The name of a coffin means the eater of flesh.) He becomes the sarcophagus of Mr. Nietzsche. Now that is the awful joke; it sounds like a sort of battling with empty brilliant words, yet at the bottom of it is the terrible allusion to an anthropophagous tendency of Zarathustra, the tendency of the wise old man to be a vulture.

Miss Hannah: Was there a chance that Zarathustra would get back the body by eating it?—having killed it, I mean?

Dr. Jung: No, he would play the role of the devil and completely destroy the body. That is the utterly destructive quality of the spirit if the body doesn't resist it properly. Where have we an excellent example of this truth?

Mrs. Baynes: The saints who retired into the desert.

Dr. Jung: Yes, in the history of the saints one sees what the spirit can do. Cities of many thousands of inhabitants in the East were depopulated completely; all the inhabitants went into the desert because they were eaten by the spirit. And think of the martyrs who voluntarily went into the arena. Even the holy Christian church, which is the incarnation of divine love, burnt more than a hundred thousand of her own children alive. Think of the heretics who were burned in Spain, and the witches who were burned, and the terrible things religious wars brought upon mankind. And all the "isms" in our day are man-eaters, not only wolves but lions and sharks. In our actual politics, human life counts for very little indeed; one of the means of persuasion is bullets and hanging. We approach social conditions that are similar to those of the Middle Ages. We have tyrants and secret police, execution without trials, and all that is done by a certain spirit, a certain "ism," or a certain conviction in the name of truth. It is a nice picture. You see, that is the spirit when it breaks away. Zarathustra is a very wise and beautiful spirit in a way, and then he is the devil himself; therefore, I say Lucifer with every implication of that word.

You know, the German philosopher Klages is a great enemy of the spirit: he accuses the spirit of strangling life, of being murderous and depleting life of blood, and to a certain extent that is perfectly true.<sup>4</sup> If the spirit prevails against the body, there is destruction; it has an almost infernal power. Nietzsche often played with that idea; for instance, in the Unzeitgemässe Betrachtungen, one of his earliest works, he says that one spark fallen from the eternal fire into the soul of a man searching after truth suffices to devour his entire life.<sup>5</sup> You see, in that sentence he expresses very clearly the descent of the Holy Ghost: that is a fiery spark of the eternal fires, and this most holy ghost is able to devour the whole of a human life. We think it is beautiful, but we cannot deny the fact that all this beauty and grandeur can also produce most horrible destruction. Of course, you can put yourself on the standpoint that it had to be; obviously it would not have happened if it had not been necessary. But that is perfectly meaningless: it does not do away with the suffering. If it happens to you, you will soon discover the other side of it. To be devoured by the spirit is just as bad as to be devoured by a wild animal: it is an act of destruction. That aspect of the spirit is absolutely strange to the Christian standpoint, where if you speak of spirit you are admitted to the company of the righteous ones. Nobody doubts that the spirit is a marvelously good thing. Yet it is by no means true; the spirit has a gruesome aspect and that comes through here indirectly in this joke.

Now, when Zarathustra says: "Hunger attacketh me like a robber," the choice of that word shows how he feels the appetite of the body; it apparently takes something away from him. Anything that does not go into the spirit, any life of the body, seems to be a minus for the spirit.

If the spirit has any actual claim, it will invariably claim all the rights of the body—quite irrespective of the fact that it has no feet without the body. He says: “Among forests and swamps my hunger attacketh me, and late in the night.” It is just there, in the woods and swamps, when he is lonely and should have a companion in the night, that he becomes aware of the fact that his body suffers pain or no longer exists. For there he would need a body relation. Otherwise, he is like a will o’ the wisp. “Strange humours hath my hunger. Often it cometh to me only after a repast, and all day it hath failed to come: where hath it been?” That this need of the body is not perceived regularly shows what the case is. It apparently only appears as a symptom—when one doesn’t expect it; or after having eaten, it is realized—showing of course that it is also a psychical need. That kind of hunger is like a hysterical symptom.

Mrs. Crowley: I would like to understand why it would have been better if he had stayed in the town.

Dr. Jung: Well, better! I say if he had stayed in the town, he would have remained with the body; he would have had a chance to resurrect the body. But these symbolic facts are not so definite; they can be changed any time. The body is not definitely dead, only relatively; only the rope-dancer is dead.

Mrs. Crowley: But in the town he is playing the role of the Superman in speaking down to the people, so I don’t see how it can help him.

Dr. Jung: It would not help him in the least. He would have made himself a complete fool; nobody would have understood. They would say, Oh, that is just Mr. Nietzsche! He would defeat his own purpose; as long as one remains with human beings one defeats the purpose of the spirit. You see, it is logical that he gave it up and went away, because he did not want to make a fool of himself. He had to become a dweller in solitude. He could not possibly have remained in town without having the position of an ordinary citizen. Everybody would have taken a snapshot of him, would know where he lived, how he shaved, where he bought his clothes, who his acquaintances were—and that would have taken away all the glamour of the spirit. For nobody among mortals believes that the man whom he sees every day is a genius or a spirit. Can you believe that the man living next door is Jesus? Live a while with him and you will be convinced that he is altogether too human. So it is destructive to remain, but a certain amount of destruction is very healthy for a human being; man is then able to live normally and persist, and the spirit can be held at bay. But that is of course ignominious from the Christian point of view, very heathenish. Now we will go on with the text:

And thereupon Zarathustra knocked at the door of the house. An old man appeared, who carried a light, and asked: "Who cometh unto me and my bad sleep?"

"A living man and a dead one," said Zarathustra. "Give me something to eat and drink, I forgot it during the day. He that feedeth the hungry refresheth his own soul, saith wisdom."

The old man withdrew, but came back immediately and offered Zarathustra bread and wine. "A bad country for the hungry," said he; "that is why I live here. Animal and man come unto me, the anchorite. But bid thy companion eat and drink also, he is wearier than thou." Zarathustra answered: "My companion is dead; I shall hardly be able to persuade him to eat." "That doth not concern me," said the old man sullenly; "he that knocketh at my door must take what I offer him. Eat, and fare ye well!"

Thereafter Zarathustra again went on for two hours, trusting to the path and the light of the stars: for he was an experienced night-walker, and liked to look into the face of all that slept. When the morning dawned, however, Zarathustra found himself in a thick forest, and no path was any longer visible. He then put the dead man in a hollow tree at his head—for he wanted to protect him from the wolves—and laid himself down on the ground and moss. And immediately he fell asleep, tired in body, but with a tranquil soul.

What is the remarkable thing in this new passage?

Mrs. Crowley: The anchorite?—meeting again the same old man?

Dr. Jung: Have you evidence that it is the same man?

Mrs. Crowley: He is transformed, but it seems to me the same figure. For one thing, when he appears in section 2, he asks why Zarathustra must drag his body as he is now doing, as if it were a prophecy. Then Zarathustra says he is going to preach this message of the Superman to the people, and the old man rather laughs at him and says they really wouldn't want his wisdom at all; it would be better for him to carry part of their load. And in this last part he again gives him something to eat and drink.

Dr. Jung: Yes. And you remember what we said about that former old man?

Mrs. Crowley: Zarathustra said that the old man did not know that God was dead, and the interpretation was that he was the old idea of Christianity. He was mumbling in the forest, making hymns and so on, but at the same time he seemed to contain something which Zarathustra lacked, and that was the soul part. Zarathustra is on the spirit side. And now he seems to come back to nature, not the spirit side but the soul side.

Dr. Jung: Exactly. It is indeed the same old man to whom he comes in this moment. Now, this moment also is characterized by the hunger; he is in need of something. He realizes that all is not well and so he approaches, as it were suddenly, former convictions; it is rather doubtful here apparently, like a sort of regression, and that is the reason why he meets the former old man. You remember Zarathustra experienced the sad fact, when he preached in the marketplace, that people did not understand him at all. He had no success and so he left, and then there was a great fatality. Now he is hungry and has nothing to eat. He has had the experience of this world which he doesn't know how to cope with, and so he naturally approaches a former point of view, as if something in him said: "Well, don't you think that was perhaps more reasonable than what you are trying now?" So he has to beg the old man to give him food, and he is giving him bread and wine. To what does that point?

Mrs. Crowley: Communion.

Dr. Jung: Yes. In going back to the old man, he naturally goes back to the central mystery of late Christianity, the only thing that has retained a certain living symbolism. This makes it clear that the old man is the old Christian spirit. He is the wise old man inasmuch as he has taken form or been incarnated in the spirit of the Christian church. So what he really seeks for food is the communion. And why just the communion?

Mrs. Crowley: Would it not be that he is now coming to himself, so it would be more the inner reality, the inner experience? Before, everything was projected and you might say it was more as if he were giving communion, as if he were the priest.

Dr. Jung: Well, there is a more definite reason.

Mrs. Brunner: Doesn't he feel lonely?

Dr. Jung: Yes, he has lost the body. You know, from the primitive's point of view the spirit that is always about with no body is forever seeking one, and as soon as they touch a body they go into it and imagine that it is their own. But they only cause possessions. Spirits crave food in order to be active in this world. Therefore, in Homer, Ulysses kills the sheep and pours out the blood for the ghosts; and only those to whom he wants to talk does he allow to drink of it—the others he wards off with his sword. And as soon as the ghosts have drunk blood, they can speak with an audible voice. They become active. They make themselves understood. They are tangible, visible when they add material substance to their spiritual existence.<sup>6</sup> Now, all spirits want bodies; they are crazy without bodies. And that is what Zarathustra wants: he wants material substance in order to communicate with people. Having no body he cannot convey his meaning to them; he is practically invisible. And this substance is at the same time communion. The real meaning of the communion is the flesh or the body, the blood. You see it is not in vain that Luther defended the estin ("is") against our Swiss reformer Zwingli, who in a somewhat lame way said the communion was a sort of symbol.<sup>7</sup> But Luther defended the primitive point of view, that it was the real body and the blood, because it is utterly important that the primitive instinct of man, the anthropophagous instinct, should be satisfied. For the real communion with the qualities of human beings, particularly the psychical qualities, only takes place when you can eat them.

So when the red Indian wants to acquire courage, he eats the heart of the enemy; or to acquire cunning, he eats his brain. That is the way in which they understand assimilation, by projection. He naturally assumes that his enemy's magic is better than his—as one is convinced, for instance, that the doctors abroad are always better than those at home. And as the English papers say, the universities abroad are remarkable, while their own are nothing, only institutions to preserve old prejudices. Or as primitives say, the tribe on the other side of the mountain have good magicians, big medicine, and much better weapons, because they have mana. That is all projection and they try to get it back by eating their enemies. They also eat their uncles and aunts and grandfathers in order to retain the family mana. On a higher level, they are quite content if the tribe contains mana, and then they delegate the eating of the dead to the next village. For instance, in Bugishu, on the western slope of Mt. Elgon, where they have only very recently come into contact with the white man, they were only relative anthropophagists: they did not eat the enemies caught in war. They were quite nice, gentle people, but they had the somewhat peculiar custom of eating the dead. So when there is a sad loss in the family, an uncle perhaps, they send a message to the next village: "We are bereft of our dear uncle," or, "It has pleased God to take our uncle and tonight we put him into the Bush, so will you pay attention to it?" Then the people in the next village prepare all sorts of presents—food, drink, beer—and they carry them into the Bush and exchange loads; the mourners take over the presents, and the people from the other village take the body and chop it up and boil it for two or three hours. And in the morning it is eaten and the bones are cleared up by the hyenas. That is the way they get rid of their dead. As a matter of fact, they say that is no longer done. My head-man, who was from the south side, said they never would dream of doing such a thing; but we never found the dead, and I was by no means sure that the uncles and aunts were not eaten.

Miss Hannah: Why did they not eat it themselves?

Dr. Jung: Perhaps because it is not so nice; they try to get away from it and to let the others do it. When somebody died in the other village they themselves had the same duty, however. I don't think they liked it so much. I had the impression that it was a sort of politeness—because I am your cousin, I will eat your uncle. People say that they are very keen on eating human flesh, but I doubt it. Of course, terrible things happen. There was a case in West Africa where in one night they cleared out the whole cemetery of a hospital and ate them all—something simply incredible. Nobody ever has explained why they did it, because usually they prefer fresh food—a fat prisoner of war fed up for the purpose, for instance, as they do in the South Sea Islands. They say human chops are one point better than pig. But that they should eat such awful filth means that there must be something behind it; we don't know, the whole thing is exceedingly deep and mysterious. They know it is filth. They like fresh meat, particularly in the tropics, and they say of hyenas that they are horrible because they eat carrion. So it had quite certainly a magic purpose. This a true case. It is reported, I think, in that book by Talbot, In the Shadow of the Bush. At all events it is quoted by Sir Wallis Budge in Osiris and the Egyptian Religions.<sup>8</sup>

The symbol of communion here, then, means Zarathustra's attempt to reconcile himself with the body; or one can say it is the need of the body that Zarathustra should become reconciled to it. Therefore, the return to the old ways, which silently take into account the insistence of the needs of the body. An old religion, which one even might call somewhat degenerate, is more human in that respect than a later one; a new religion is always apt to disregard the body. Protestantism is much more dangerous than Catholicism, which is the older and takes the body into account. That is a matter of reproach from the Protestant side, but it is also a title of honor; an earthy Catholicism is much better because, without seeking it really, it reconciles the spirit and the body. It doesn't exaggerate the spirit, the body is taken care of. There is an extraordinary tolerance in Catholicism concerning the body; and if you study the origin of the rites of the church, you will see that the church has taken over many ceremonies from the pagan cults, the mass for instance, and the robes of the priests. And that funny square black cap they wear, folded into four corners with one black pompom on top, is the original cap of the Flamines, the priests of Jupiter in Rome. Then the bells in the Mass, and the host with the cross marked on top are Mithraic, and our Christmas day is the birthday of Mithras. And naturally much of the antique point of view was also taken over; the standpoint of the church in certain legal matters, or in reference to sex morality, is very like the antique point of view, a bit stricter but not a bit moral in the way we would feel morality. So the relation between the life of the spirit and the life of the body is very critical. Too much of the body and the spirit dies; too much of the spirit and the body dies. There is a sort of changing equilibrium between the two factors, and a bit too much of one means the destruction of the other. You see, if Zarathustra returns to the old ways, he gets into a sort of modus vivendi that guarantees at least a minimum of existence to the body; and he is no longer alone because through communion he has relation to humanity, his body is fed. He can add substance to himself. But it is at the expense of his own spiritual standpoint.

Now, the anchorite regards the corpse, not as a corpse, but as a companion rather; and he says to Zarathustra that he should get him to eat and to drink. Zarathustra then explains that that fellow is dead, so one cannot persuade him to eat, wherewith the old man is grumblingly satisfied. He doesn't insist upon it, it doesn't concern him. Naturally it would not, because he personifies a sort of traditional attitude which has no activity in itself, all the activity being in Zarathustra. And it depends entirely upon him whether he is willing to accept the body in his system or not. After this, he continues his way, and something is said about Zarathustra's being a good walker in the night and one who loves to look into the face of sleeping things. What does that mean?

Mrs. Crowley: Walking in the night is a reference to the unconscious.

Dr. Jung: Yes, Zarathustra is first the unconscious side; inasmuch as the spirit is not born, it is the archetype living in the unconscious. Then it is born into consciousness and takes a modern shape. So old Zarathustra reborn in Nietzsche takes on the shape of "Thus Spake Zarathustra." This Zarathustra has nothing whatever to do with the old Zarathustra—the only thing they have in common is the name—but in a way this Zarathustra carries the message of today. When the archetype appears, it always carries first a message of remotest antiquity apparently, very strange; and then inasmuch as the conscious listens to the message and assimilates it, it will give a modern form to it. It will give it rebirth in other words. And the message, as you know, always appears in the moment when it is absolutely needed by the time. Whenever an old system of représentations collectives has become overdue, when its life is ebbing away so that it doesn't carry life any longer—then that archetype is constellated, then it brings its message out of the dark. But until then it has been a walker in the night, or "a caller in the desert," as the prophet says. Nobody hears him, he talks to empty space. So as long as the archetype is unconscious, his only preoccupation would be to walk about in the night, in the unconscious, and to study sleeping things; therefore, to be in the darkness is a thing to which he is used. Finally, he finds himself in the deep forest and no way is visible. Where would that be? What does the wood mean?

Mrs. Sigg: It might be the realm of the earth mother, because he buries the dead in the tree, and the tree is the mother. It would be to give him rebirth.

Dr. Jung: Yes, it is the depths of the unconscious. The wood in this respect is simply another symbol like the sea; it is the darkness. One is projected, one can conceal oneself in the wood as if buried in water. Also, a wood has the same mysterious impenetrability as water, and it is full of living beings that suddenly appear and disappear, especially primordial forests which are exceedingly uncanny: no paths and anything is possible in it, particularly that one loses one's bearings. That is the most horrible thing of all; it instantly calls up the collective unconscious and causes one to revert to the animal. Now, Zarathustra is moving into the unconscious in order to bury the corpse there. What would be the consequence, or the purpose, of Zarathustra in burying it in the unconscious?

Remark: To forget it.

Dr. Jung: Yes, one hides it there. Then he can move easily because he has not to remember that corpse all the time. He is no longer burdened with that preoccupation. The last trace of heaviness has gone and he becomes light, a dancer. Zarathustra often calls himself that; he insists upon his light step, the step of a dancer, as if he had no weight whatever; he tries to get rid of the weight of the body because he cannot live the life of the spirit with the body.

Mrs. Baumann: Is that not contradicted by the next sentence? He wanted to protect it from the wolves.

Dr. Jung: But the wolves are the hunger. Those are the robbers and the robber is in himself in order that he, Zarathustra, can no longer eat the body. You see, Zarathustra is almost afraid of his own craving for a body. To the primitive mentality, ghosts are immensely hungry things that walk about the whole night crying: "Where is my body? I am seeking my body." They suppose that the wandering spirits are terribly keen on bodies because they have lost their own, and when somebody is sick in the kraal, perhaps lying unconscious and unable to defend himself, the spirit sees it and in it goes to his body. That is the way they describe it. Have I told you about the little ghost houses they build to keep the spirits away from the kraal? Well, you know, all the native trails leading from the jungle to the kraal are very serpentine, many curves with a short radius. I will draw you a picture of one. You see, it winds down from the bamboo forest above, where the ghosts are supposed to live, towards the kraal below where the human beings are. Then at a particularly sharp angle or at a likely spot where there is a clump of trees perhaps, the people in the kraal who are supposed to be haunted, make another path with a flatter curve, a sort of trap trail. This is paved and outlined with stones on each side, like the way to the burial place—or in one case I heard of, to the chief's house where the stones indicated the number of people he had killed. (One still sees such stone avenues in Cornwall leading to holes in the ground which were dwelling places in the neolithic age.) This little decoy road branches off the main path and leads to an open space like a real kraal, and in that clearing they build the ghost house, a hut about as high as your waist. Inside is a bed of mats, and sometimes a clay figure on the bed. And they put in food, corn or sweet potatoes, and outside is a jar in the ground filled with water. The clay figure is a sort of bait, of course. Then in the night the spirit comes swinging and swerving down the path into the decoy trail, and he says: "Nice hut here, much good, I stay here in the hut. I get into that body; now I am at home, I have much mealy-mealy, I have much seed water." Then suddenly the sun comes up, and he jumps out of the body and runs back to the bamboo forest.

They tell that story in such a vivid way that one sees at once that it is absolute truth to them. They protect the body by those traps, and you can be almost certain, when walking along a primitive trail, that you will come across one. They don't call it a trap. They call it a spirit house, and of course negroes would not go that way; they would say it was very bad. We had such a case near our camp: a young woman fell ill and the Gandu, a sorcerer who is a particular authority, smelt a ghost. He went round the kraal in ever-widening circles, sniffing like a dog exactly, till he touched a certain spot, and then he said: "Here they come, this is the trail where the ghosts come in the night." And then they built a trap there. This girl had been left an orphan very early; the parents died when they were quite young people so they were terribly sad and angry that they had lost their bodies so early, and were minded to do all sorts of evil to that kraal because their little girl was harbored there, and they wanted to have her with them.

Even in Homer you find that same psychology: the shadow people in Hades are very sad. They are always wandering aimlessly about as disembodied shadows; it is a dim and shadowy world, and as soon as there is blood anywhere, they go like vultures and drink it in order to get substance, to have a body again.<sup>9</sup> Practically all primitive people are convinced that that is a truth—if they have developed a spiritualistic system at all. So one can understand this wolfish hunger of Zarathustra—that it is represented by wolves. You know, wolves howl very peculiarly, and hyenas are particularly like ghosts because they eat the bones of the dead and so are supposed to have their bellies full of ancestral souls. One must handle them with the utmost care; if one kills a hyena it means trouble. They really are spooky, I never have heard anything so demoniacal as a pack of hyenas; they lend themselves to that superstition. They do their level best to represent disembodied spirits. When they are hungry, that whining and laughter is just awful. Naturally they are taken for ghosts by the primitives. If it is heard in a place where hyenas are not supposed to be, or if there is anything in the least unusual about it, then it is probably a ghost. Hyenas are not feared in themselves, but if it is a ghost, that is something else. Ghosts are supposed to imitate, not only hyenas, but any other animals; and it is recognized by its extraordinary behavior. The Red Indians call certain animals "doctor animals" when they behave in a way which is not according to rule.

So Zarathustra's idea, in burying the dead in the wood, is to forget him altogether, to give him a decent burial, which means to lock him in somewhere so that he cannot get out. We piously put a stone upon the graves of our ancestors, but that was originally to keep the dead in the hole. There have been such customs as nailing the body to the ground by driving a pole or a nail through the belly in order that the body should not rise again; or a lot of stones were heaped upon the grave in order to prevent the dead from escaping. In Switzerland, I think it was in Canton Aargau, in the 19th century the custom still prevailed that when somebody died one opened the windows and said to the soul of the dead, Fahre hin und fladere, "Farewell and flutter away," thus inviting it not to return. On a certain South Sea island they have the most elaborate ceremonies to inveigle the soul of the dead to leave the body, so that they may be sure it will never return: a boat lands and then the medicine-man takes the corpse by the hand and leads the soul very politely to the boat and puts it on board and it sails away. So the meaning of the hollow tree was surely a burial place. Of course in reality bodies were put into hollow trees for protection against wolves or foxes, partially because of a certain belief in bodily resurrection, and partially because of the fear that the dead would be badly offended by not having had a decent burial—that is the most frequent reason.

There were Christian societies in Rome in the first century, sort of insurance companies, which guaranteed a decent burial; they were called thiasotai, and some of them were to guarantee to members one meal daily also.<sup>10</sup> There was a tremendous traffic congestion in old Rome. The streets were exceedingly narrow and there were no buses or cars except slow horse-carts which were all needed for the transport of food. Rome had a population of about two million people at that time. A great many people went to town every day for business and there was no time to go home at midday for a meal. There were no trains to the suburbs; it was all plain walking, and they had to eat their meal in the town, as we do. So they formed societies. They took a room or a basement and had a man there to cook meals, and it was the custom to name the society after a patron saint, the Society of Theseus, or Heracles, for example. The cook, who prepared the meal, had already eaten when the society arrived; and while they ate, he read the gospels to them—which were not then considered to be inspired truth, only very good books. Or he told them stories, or read the epistles that came from abroad to that particular society. You see, that is the origin of the idea of the mass; the altar is the cooking range, the hearth, where the magic or spiritual food is prepared, and the priest is the cook who gives it to the people. There is the same custom in monasteries; one of the monks reads the sacred texts or other good books while the others eat. They had such insurance companies for decent burial, because otherwise the soul would begin to work havoc and cause no end of trouble. Even today, Italians are exceedingly careful to bury their people well. They go to great lengths to get monuments; the cemetery of Genoa, for instance, is full of monuments of awfully bad taste but touching in their naiveté. To primitive people, as to the unconscious, the dead mean a tremendous lot. So, as we are moving here on the fringe of the collective unconscious with the figure of Zarathustra, it is by no means strange that he should observe a primitive custom and bury the corpse in such a way that he would have no reason to return. For it would not suit Zarathustra if that spirit of heaviness should come back and burden him with the banality of an ordinary human life.

LECTURE III

Dr. Jung:

We spoke last time of the old man who lived in the woods and gave bread and wine to Zarathustra, and we explained him as being the old man we had already met in the second chapter. But I failed to mention another point which is also a sort of evidence for this interpretation. You remember the text is: "And thereupon Zarathustra knocked at the door of the house. An old man appeared, who carried a light, and asked: 'Who cometh unto me and my bad sleep?'" Now the English text says he carried a light, but the German text says: Er trug das Licht, "He carried the light," and that of course makes a great difference; it is not just any light, it is the light, which surely means a definite specific light. It is nothing indifferent, so that one could characterize it by using the indefinite article a: he is really the carrier of the light. Now, Zarathustra has a light too, but it is not the light, which would of course refer to the definite, revealed light. So obviously that old man represents the spirit of the past which was the light. And, you see, that fits in beautifully with the attributes of the old man here, his giving the bread and wine, meaning the spiritual super-substantial food.

Then we mentioned the symbolism of the communion, but I think I did not speak of the interesting fact of the new revised texts of the Greek and Latin versions of the New Testament. You know there is an old Latin version of the New Testament with the Vulgata which is the official text in the Catholic church. And there is now a new text, Novum Testamentum Graeci et Latine, in which both versions have been revised according to the best available sources. Now the time-hallowed form of the Lord's prayer in Matthew contains the famous passage: "Give us this day our daily bread." But in this very carefully revised text one finds: Panem nostrum supersubstantialem da nobis hodie, which means: "And give us the super-substantial bread today." The Greek text says: ton arton ton epiousion, meaning "the super-substantial one." In German it would be, in the pure style of Master Eckhart: das überwesentliche Brot.

Ousia is the being, the being of the world that is, das Sein der Welt; and epiôusion means that which is beyond the world. The concept of a metaphysical world would exactly correspond, but the most plastic and fitting German translation is: das überwesentliche Brot. It would be very beautiful if we had in the Lord's prayer: gebe uns Heute das überwesentliche Brot. That is the true meaning, you see.<sup>1</sup> But naturally to the coarse mind, to have one's food every day is most convincing. Unfortunately it was not exactly what Christ meant. Many things happened to the text of the New Testament; we shall presently come to another little trick that was played in the wording.

Then at the end of the chapter Zarathustra buries the corpse in a hollow tree, and we spoke of that as a protection against the wolves. Do you remember what we said about it?

Miss Hannah: He put it there in order to forget it entirely.

Dr. Jung: Yes, because wolves are the personification of hunger—one is hungry as a wolf. So when he protects the corpse from the wolves, he is protecting it from being eaten by the appetite in himself which he tries to forget. You remember he says of his hunger before, "And all day it hath failed to come: where hath it been?" This means that he did not realize his hunger for his body; he forgot his body altogether. Therefore, the body died; he overcame it. But the hunger ought to convince him that he should eat his body; then he would return to humanity and become an ordinary human being. If you want to be an extraordinary human being, don't eat: people who eat become vulgar. Therefore, many people make a point of not eating before others.

This was a particular idea of the disciples of John the Baptizer, the Mandaeans or the Sippahs. Three or four thousand of that sect are still in existence, I believe, near Kut-el-amara and Basra in Mesopotamia. They are considered to be "people of the Book" by the Arabs and therefore inspired. They are called that because they received revelation from a sacred book, (the Jews, the Christians and the Mohammedans are all "people of the Book") and the Koran says that they must be spared; they are not considered heathenish and therefore are not massacred. They are supposed to be sort of inferior Christians, but as a matter of fact they are the remnants of a pre-Christian Gnostic sect, followers of John the Baptist from whom Christ received his initiation, according to the evidence of the New Testament. The Sippahs still possess their holy writings, but they no longer understand them because all knowledge of their language was lost. It was southern Babylonian Aramaic, and recently Lidzbarski, a German scholar, has succeeded in translating certain texts, which turned out to be the remains of those Mandaean books.<sup>2</sup> (Manda means "gnosis.") They are quite independent of the sacred books of the Christians and Jews, but they resemble them very much in some ways; they are records of teachings and sermons by John, really sort of revelations, and he is considered almost a semi-divine figure, a real shepherd of men. He plays about the same role as Christ in the New Testament. The traditions concerning those books are post-Christian because there are two chapters in which Jesus is mentioned, but he is there always called "Jesus ben Miriam," the son of Miriam, and he is called "the deceiver" because he betrayed the mysteries, which is also the tradition in the Talmud, the Jewish book of mysteries. It was a mystery teaching quite obviously, and Christ is said to have thought he would be doing good to humanity in giving the uneducated masses the light he had received through initiation in that teaching of John. But John was against it; he said the people would not be able to understand it and would use it for evil purposes. Then Christ pointed to the miracles he was working, and all the good which came from them. It was a long discussion and without any conclusion. They never came to terms; it was left open whether John was right or Christ was right. It seems as if both were right because in the end God said to each party: "Well, I see you have spoken the truth." I think it is most dramatic to see that this conflict between the mystery religion and the popularized religion never comes to an end, so one cannot say what the ultimate truth about it may be. We shall be forever in doubt whether Christianity was good for the world, or whether it has been a bad thing that the mysteries were betrayed.

Well now, these Sippahs believe that it is indecent to feed before each other, so they turn their backs when they eat, or find a place where nobody sees them. To them it is just as indecent as the opposite functions of the body. Eating before others is understood by many people as sort of taboo; there is mana in it which can easily turn into its own opposite. And here Zarathustra protects his body against the wolves because he tries to make sure that his sanctity or his superiority shall not become injured through the vulgarity of eating, which would put him down to the level of common humanity. To fill himself with physical matter would make him heavy and he could not dance any longer. He could not fly, he would be fettered to the earth. Therefore, in ascetic forms of religion people refrain from eating in order to attain spirituality; in a certain season of the year, or on a certain day of the week, they make themselves light by not filling the stomach. They assume that in eating they consume all the dirt of the earth and are fettered to the earth by the heaviness of the belly. So eating is made into a sort of symbolism, as the eating of the Host for instance. The little saint Thérèse of Konnersreuth is said to have lived upon the Host alone.<sup>3</sup> People who were in a position to know reported that as a fact; they were absolutely convinced of it. I cannot understand it, but I would not deny it; it is possible that such things might happen. Other things happen which are equally marvelous. We cannot say anything is impossible except a logical contradiction, but there is no logical contradiction there. You know, it is important that the perfect saint should be able to rise, to perform the miracle of levitation; many of the great saints have been seen rising into the air before the altar, as Elijah was carried in the fiery chariot to heaven, or as Christ in his transfiguration ascended into heaven.

Mr. Baumann: It was the sign of divinity in Egypt that the kings wore feathers for clothes.

Dr. Jung: Yes, the transformation into the bird, just as our souls have been supposed to transform into birds after death, into angels with golden wings. There are many people still on earth who feel the little wings beginning to grow on their backs and they let you know it in time! And in the Gilgamesh epic, you read of those sad places, a sort of Hades, where the souls of the dead dwelt, and they wore the plumage of birds and ate their own dirt; they were sort of carrion eaters or feces eaters, evil birds.<sup>4</sup> Now all this refers to the lightness of the subtle body, that body of breath which would become heavy if filled with substantial food. Therefore, food must be of a super-substantial nature, that the body may also lift itself. In India the perfect wise man is always understood to be able to fly—that is the criterion of the wise man. We shall see later on, when Zarathustra goes down into the underworld, that he also can fly; again such an enantiodromia. He has then attained to the state of hamsa, the swan, which is the term for the state of the winged in India; therefore, each wise man has that for a title of honor.<sup>5</sup> The swan also figures in the legend of the Holy Grail, and the Holy Grail itself is held in a state of suspension. It is held by angels suspended between heaven and earth. Suspension is also an aspect of crucifixion, the unconscious aspect of transfiguration. It is the state of transformation, but it is the fate of the body while transfiguration is the fate of the subtle body. So the subtle body appears here in a sort of crucifixion, the martyrdom of the body; and here it is a state of suspension which precedes birth or creation. You find that symbol very beautifully in the Edda, in the first verse of the chapter called Runenkunde, which tells how Odin invented the sacred letters, or runes, while he was suspended on the tree.

I know that I hung on the windswept tree
 Nine nights through,
 Wounded by a spear, dedicated to Odin
 I myself to myself.<sup>6</sup>

That tormented state of suspension is the incubation of the subtle body. Christ is supposed to have been seen after his crucifixion by his disciples and by many other people; his subtle body appeared after the state of suspension. Either one dies in that suspension, producing the subtle body through death, or one produces superior knowledge, like the runes.

You know, letters, the art of writing, was an amazing discovery to the primitive mind. If primitives have never seen writing they marvel at it. Whenever a negro brought me a letter or a written message, they all crowded round while I opened it, and looked at it from below and above, and they listened because they said the paper was speaking to the white lord; they assumed that I must either see something in it or that something talked to me. They cannot get away from the idea that it is only possible to receive a message by mouth; the discovery of the letters, those hooks and circles, black signs that talked, is sheer magic to the black man. They can understand when one makes a picture of something—yes, one sees it—but that those hooks could convey any sound or thought is beyond their horizon. Only a god could invent such things in the state of divine torment.<sup>7</sup>

Mrs. Crowley: Is that not really the meaning behind the idea in the East of not eating? For the saints and the fakirs anyway, isn't it in order to attain that state where they can receive a message? It would not be the idea that it was vulgar, but that only after fasting are they able to receive.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is the positive understanding of it. But so many people don't eat because it is vulgar, or they fast or eat special food because they have resistances against ordinary food; then behind that is the idea that by fasting they will receive something.

That is like the magic use of the sacred symbols. Of course there is the right use and the wrong use. You see, mandalas were first discovered by some old wise guy who lived in a cave or in the woods because he was bored with the crowd of fools that humanity consists of, and had discovered much more interesting things than the ordinary small talk of the villages. He sat apart and studied the miracles in his mind, and he had funny dreams also, and he came to the idea that things must be somehow in a circle like the horizon round himself. So he made a circle, that was one thing; then he made a point in it, and thus he got nearer to the truth, and he went on filling the circle with pictures of the world. Then he made four points for north, south, east, and west, and thought to himself, "Now everything is nicely arranged." But then he was disturbed by curious, ordinary people who have spiritual appetites, and young people came along saying: "What about this?" and "What about that? He thinks in circles." And he said: "Don't get excited about that, just let things go as they naturally go." They thought this was exceedingly wise and so he was called the wise man. Then certain people thought: Now could one perhaps acquire that wisdom?—we want to be as wise as he. So they asked him about his wisdom. He said, "Well, you see the world is like this," and he began to explain with circles and squares and all sorts of triangles, and they thought: "Now that is grand! We must only make such squares and triangles and that will turn the trick, that will carry." Therefore, they made mandalas and they stared at them, they contemplated them, they put themselves into them: Yes, it is true, the old man has filled them with truth. And it is of course most convincing, because one believes that in stepping into those mandalas, one steps into the truth. Yet, they didn't know that they had stepped out of the truth. That is the terrible thing: when one thinks a thing is obviously the truth, most convincing, and steps into it, then one steps out of it. You see, they omitted one thing, the great rhinoceros of the alchemistic process: namely, that they are the truth, not the circle. The old man made the circle out of himself: he is the truth. And they think it is the circle. But they have stepped out of their truth. The old man has never stepped into the circle: he made it, he is the circle. It is a bit like the secret in Nietzsche's lamentation over the lost god, in his poem called: "The Lamentation of Ariadne." You see, Ariadne is dissolved in pain and sadness when she discovers that Theseus, her lover and rescuer, has disappeared in the night, leaving her on the island of Naxos alone. Then the god Dionysos appears, and he takes her by the ear and says:

Ariadne, Du hast kleine Ohren,
Du hast meine Ohren,
Steck ein kluges Wort hinein,
Ich bin dein Labyrinth.

Meaning: "Thou hast small ears, / but thou hast my ears; / put a cunning word in, / I am thy labyrinth." Now that is Zarathustra.<sup>8</sup>

Well, the protection of the corpse in the hollow tree is, as we said, a primitive burial; corpses often have been buried in or upon trees in order to protect them against the onslaught of wild animals. Of course such things are done only in tribes where there is a certain belief in the body, the belief that it should be protected and its actual appearance preserved, a sort of embryonic Egyptian belief in the importance of the physical substance of the body. The Egyptians were so anxious about it that they put numberless statues of the king into his grave and into the temples—everywhere—in order to remember the countenance of the dead. I think there is even a prayer to that effect, that it should not be permitted that their looks should be forgotten. They gave the sarcophagus the traits of the dead in order to make certain that the memory of the countenance was not lost. Then this burial in the hollow tree has another meaning. The sarcophagus, shaped according to the form of the mummy and with the face of the dead, means that it is meant for rebirth; that form would have absolutely no importance if it were not a preparation for rebirth in the body. Therefore, we must assume that other forms in which the body was preserved also contain the symbolism of rebirth. We have parallels in Germanic mythology. As Nietzsche is writing out of his particular avenue to the unconscious, he would naturally use Germanic archetypal material, and in Germanic mythology the tree plays a great role. Do you know an example?

Mrs. Jaeger: Yggdrasil.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is the world-tree. The first human beings were supposed to be born from the ash and alder, and the last human beings before the world-hell breaks loose enter the tree again and become a tree, the world ash. The tree first gives birth to man, and then it is the sarcophagus, as the earth is the mother that gives birth in the dawn of humanity—and in the evening is the sarcophagus: she eats the dead.<sup>9</sup>

Mr. Baumann: I think there is a similar myth in the Persian religion.

Dr. Jung: Yes, in the Persian holy book, the Bundahish, the first parents, Meschia and Meschiane, were also represented as trees. That is Indo-Aryan. This idea was in the air generally, but it is most suggestive in Germanic mythology, in this reentering the tree which is the symbol of the mother. And the mater sarcophaga is very beautiful Etruscan symbolism, which I mentioned in The Psychology of the Unconscious.<sup>10</sup> That statue of the Déesse de Mort is in Florence, where it is called the Dea Matuta, an Etruscan word. It is made of terra cotta and is hollow—one can lift it apart—and the ashes of the dead were put inside, into her belly: so the dead were buried again in the mother. That is a human figure instead of a tree. The burial in the tree, then, has also the positive meaning of preservation of the body for a later rebirth. Therefore, we can conclude from this symbolism that a day might come when the body suddenly would resurrect from the tree. That tree is in the wood, and out of a wood the body would rise. One could say that this body was in the place of the old man, the bearer of the light, sleeping in the woods waiting for the day of his resurrection. Here we can anticipate a later part of Zarathustra.

Dr. Jung: That is very interesting. One reads similar things in Talbot's Shadow of the Bush.

Miss Wolff: We spoke the week before last about the transitus which is so very different in Zarathustra than in the Mithraic or Christian myths. Here the corpse is elevated by Zarathustra into the tree, and Zarathustra lies down on the grass; but there is a kind of faint analogy with Christ on the cross.

Dr. Jung: It might be a state of suspension.

Miss Wolff: Yes, and the cross is a tree, a symbol of death and rebirth.

Dr. Jung: And there is the old tradition that the cross is made of the wood of the tree of paradise, the tree of life and knowledge, so he is represented as hanging on the tree of life, which is naturally the same thing. The cross is the mother of the dead, the Dea Matuta.

Mr. Baumann: I want to ask another question about Nietzsche. About twenty years ago this idea of rebirth played a great role. It made his book famous; everybody talked about that idea of die ewige Wiederkunft. Why did it make such an impression at that time?

Dr. Jung: Oh, that ewige Wiederkunft was in the nineties. It was published by Horneffer from the Nietzsche archives when he was already insane. Horneffer collected his manuscripts and put them into a brochure containing Nietzsche's idea about the return of things. You know, Nietzsche had a sort of revelation about the external return of things; he was struck by the idea that the world must be finite and therefore the number of possibilities was necessarily finite and so must repeat themselves. After a certain lapse of time, of course an immeasurably long time, the same combination must return, and then one would say again, "Yes I want the eternal things, once more, noch einmal." This is the main idea in the idea of the eternal return, which is a peculiar way of talking of rebirth.<sup>11</sup> It belongs of course to the great Ja sagen, the yea-saying to life, admitting life, positivity, in reference to life, which plays such a great role in the second part of Zarathustra. It belongs to the Dionysian stage of his initiation; it is the feeling of rebirth which always accompanies the revelation of Dionysos.

Mr. Baumann: Why was it taken up so tremendously?

Dr. Jung: Because it was the problem of the time. You know, that was the time where everything got stiff with Victorianism, and so everybody hoped for the great outburst of fire, of movement, enthusiasm, and so on. Then happily enough the war came, the great feast of death, then people could decorate themselves with flowers, you know. As it is with the termites when their great joie de vivre comes: when all the young termites are hatched they throw open the doors of the termite hill and out they come and are eaten in no time by birds and animals. Everything is wasted; it is a vast hecatomb, a sacrificial offering to the gods. It is a mighty symbol. And those rodents in Norway, the lemmings, do the same thing. When they are too courageous on account of being too many, they eat up whole towns, and then they wander away to the west in great enthusiasm and all go into the sea and die. Well—sad! [Dr. Jung then read Chapter 9, The Preachers of Death.]

There are preachers of death: and the earth is full of those to whom desistance from life must be preached.

Full is the earth of the superfluous; marred is life by the many-too-many. May they be decoyed out of this life by the “life eternal”!

“The yellow ones”: so are called the preachers of death, or “the black ones.” But I will show them unto you in other colours besides.

There are the terrible ones who carry about in themselves the beast of prey, and have no choice except lusts or self-laceration. And even their lusts are self-laceration.

They have not yet become men, those terrible ones: may they preach desistance from life, and pass away themselves!

There are the spiritually consumptive ones: hardly are they born when they begin to die, and long for doctrines of lassitude and renunciation.

They would fain be dead, and we should approve of their wish! Let us beware of awakening those dead ones, and of damaging those living coffins!

They meet an invalid, or an old man, or a corpse—and immediately they say: “Life is refuted!”

But they only are refuted, and their eye, which seeth only one aspect of existence.

Shrouded in thick melancholy, and eager for the little casualties that bring death: thus do they wait, and clench their teeth.

Or else, they grasp at sweetmeats, and mock at their childishness thereby: they cling to their straw in life, and mock at their still clinging to it.

Their wisdom speaketh thus: "A fool, he who remaineth alive; but so far we are fools! And that is the foolishlest thing in life!"

"Life is only suffering": so say others, and lie not. Then see to it that ye cease! See to it that the life ceaseth which is only suffering!

And let this be the teaching of your virtue: "Thou shalt slay thyself! Thou shalt steal away from thyself!"—

"Lust is sin,"—so say some who preach death—"let us go apart and beget no children!"

"Giving birth is troublesome,"—say others—"why still give birth? One beareth only the unfortunate!" And they are also preachers of death.

"Pity is necessary,"—so saith a third party. "Take what I have! Take what I am! So much less doth life bind me!"

Were they consistently pitiful, then would they make their neighbours sick of life. To be wicked—that would be their true goodness.

But they want to be rid of life; what care they if they bind others still faster with their chains and gifts!—

And ye also, to whom life is rough labour and disquiet, are ye not very tired of life? Are ye not very ripe for the sermon of death?

All ye to whom labour is dear, and the rapid, new, and strange—ye put up with yourselves badly; your diligence is flight, and the will to self-forgetfulness.

If ye believed more in life, then would ye devote yourselves less to the momentary. But for waiting, ye have not enough of capacity in you—nor even for idling!

Everywhere resoundeth the voice of those who preach death; and the earth is full of those to whom death hath to be preached.

Or "life eternal"; it is all the same to me—if only they pass away quickly!—

Thus spake Zarathustra.

tive aspect of the hunger and the fasting. It is not only in order to avoid something or for a magical purpose that one sacrifices, buries, fasts, and so on; it is also a sort of symptom or a necessary accompaniment of a creative condition. The creator will necessarily identify with what he is going to bring forth. He will identify with the condition of the contents of the unconscious, which are in statu nascendi, in the state of being born. They are suspended, they are in the labor pains of birth, and the creative consciousness is identified with that condition. Therefore, the creator will put himself into the state of suspension, of torment, in order to embody or incarnate the unconscious contents. This is an important idea and we must be clear about it in order to understand what will follow. The condition which Zarathustra has gone through, the burial, is the sacrificial suspended condition which is at the same time the incubation of the birth to come. The tree was at his head as he slept, and that is a symbolic position indicating that, as the corpse was contained in the tree, so the tree with its contents was contained in—or above—the head of Zarathustra. You can imagine that he is standing like a man in an upright position and the tree with its invisible contents, the corpse, is on top of him, representing the contents that are to be reborn. A corpse is buried with the idea of resurrection. That is, of course, primitive mentality. One fertilizes the mother by putting a corpse into her and she will transform it and give it rebirth in time. It is as if one put a seed into the ground, like the age-old symbolism in all church hymns; it vanishes into the ground, and rises as a new plant: green wheat will appear instead of the buried grain. So the burial is at the same time a preparatory sacrificial rite which induces the mother, or the unconscious, to give birth. It is as if one fed the carnivorous mother earth with human flesh so that she may create, give body to the suspended potentialities of the unconscious contents.

Our unconscious contents are potentialities that may be but are not yet, because they have no definiteness. Only when they become definite can they appear. Nothing is definite in the unconscious; as long as a thing is unconscious nothing can be said about it. Definiteness only appears where matter appears. According to Tantric philosophy, matter is the definiteness of the divine thought, the thought of the creator. That is merely a psychological projection however, because as long as one's thought has not attained a body it is not definite. To give body to one's thoughts means that one can speak them, paint them, show them, make them appear clearly before the eyes of everybody. When one speaks, one translates one's thoughts into vibrations or waves of sound, which means movement of air; one moves particles of air in the way of sound waves. The idea is thus conveyed, and it appears in the word spoken. To make a picture, one takes different minerals called colors, and water or oil, and makes a shape which expresses the idea; or one can say that the idea assimilates or attracts matter and thus appears. So when a thing becomes clear in my head I assume it is the same process; the idea that has been vague and indefinite before suddenly begins to attract perceivable particles, understandable things, with visual associations, or auditory associations, associations of touch, of smell. The idea usually becomes visible as a visual image, perhaps a picture; or some people have sound associations, so to them it is auditory. With others it is a motion: they can express the idea by certain movements, dancing for instance. Others have several different associations together. Therefore, primitive ideas in their origin are almost tangible things.

There are plenty of examples. In chemistry, you have Kékulé's vision of dancing couples, which led to the discovery of the famous Benzol ring.<sup>12</sup> One can oneself realize, whenever one discovers some idea, that it is just a sort of visualization, another reflection, say of the body. Even certain diseases of the body can portray the character of the idea; perhaps they represent the idea of something which simply cannot be swallowed. A thing which one cannot accept is represented by a spasm of the throat for instance, and that can go so far that one cannot eat. I once treated such a case; the man was reduced to a skeleton. He could only swallow two cups of milk a day, and for each cup he needed two hours, because whenever he took a drop which was a bit too big it simply refused—he could only take the smallest sips. He got quite tired out and was afraid he would die. Nobody knew what to do about it, so that poor fellow landed finally with a sorcerer. You see, I am only called in as the last resource when a man is practically dead. I am so utterly unscientific that I can only cure such a case. When that man eventually got into my hands I inquired into his dreams. I knew, of course, that he could not swallow something, and naturally he had the greatest resistances in getting at it; but his dreams led me to it. His fiancée was represented as a sort of whore in his dreams, so I told him to go home and ask a friend what he thought about the girl. And the first man he asked said, "Why of course, everybody knows it; she is just a fast girl." She had had sexual relations with two other men while she was engaged to him. That was what he did not want to know; he was convinced that she was the purest of virgins from the best of families. Well, after he had been away a week I got a letter from him and it sounded very bitter, saying: "I can eat now! You were quite right. I had to give up that relationship. I think I am cured. Yours sincerely." One saw his emotion: he did not like that idea, but it is what you have to pay for a cure. So such suspended ideas can express themselves easily in the body, in certain skin troubles, for instance, or superficial nervous troubles, anesthesia perhaps; also very frequently troubles of the stomach and intestines, fits of diarrhoea or constipation. People who don't want to give something away produce an extraordinary constipation. There are very funny things like that, quite comical, so obvious that one doesn't believe it. For we are quite disinclined to believe the obvious things; we always think the truth must be very complicated, very subtle. If one says something quite simple, everybody thinks it is not true. Bismarck's great art was to say the plain truth, which nobody would believe, so he got them all into his pocket.

Well now, this suspended condition has the effect upon the unconscious contents that they can assimilate matter as it were; they eat the sacrificed body and can then incarnate or impersonate. So one sees that a creative person will easily neglect or forget about his body, and devote his entire body to the service of the suspended contents. He will repress everything, practically, as Freud would say. All his troubles and preoccupations vanish as if they did not exist: only that idea remains. Like the French artist Palissy who invented the glaze on the surface of pottery.<sup>13</sup> For years he had tried and failed and he had spent every cent on it. Finally he thought of a way to produce that enamel: it only needed a certain degree of heat. But then his wood gave out. So he burned his furniture, every stick in his house, and when he had pushed the last leg of the last chair into the stove, the enamel was there. That is an example of the way the creative brain works—the last leg of the last chair must be pushed into the oven before the desired result is reached. But of course one has sacrificed a lot; one has sacrificed perhaps the happiness of one's life. If one studies the lives of very successful people—I mean their real lives, not the so-called biographies which are usually lies—one sees that they pay very dearly through loss of human happiness.<sup>14</sup> Or the reverse: people who are not particularly successful have often very nice lives. They can be very happy. Everything that is beyond the ordinary is paid for. You make no mistake if you never envy any kind of success, for every success is dearly paid for. If you think it is not, you simply don't know; somebody has paid.

So the suspended ideas which should come forth, which should reach the daylight, can only appear when one takes away from the other side—the side of the body—so that the idea can produce a body to appear in for itself. The idea is like an autonomous being that wants a body so much that it even incarnates in the body; one begins to play, to perform the idea, and then people say one is completely mad. The idea has taken possession of one till it is as if one were out of one's mind. Such a state, then, is necessarily followed by a certain product. If people can be forced to neglect the body—bury it, in other words—they are most likely to produce a body in their mind, thoughts that have the value of really concrete objects; one can concretize thoughts. There is a magic means in all the old religious initiations. Fasting is a necessary part of any initiation procedure, and flagellation, and all sorts of torments, in which the primitive fantasy is very fertile. They inflict terrible suffering upon young men when they are undergoing their initiation, in order to drive the body into a sort of despair, to corner it, so that the ideas which are taught at the same time shall take on body, existence, and because they are associated with the torment, never be forgotten.

If you get a good thrashing from your school master at the same time that you have learned something, it will remain. That was part of the old system. I was brought up in the country and the teacher had a marvelous way of teaching the alphabet. There were eight boys sitting on a bench, and the teacher had a whip consisting of three willow wands nicely woven together like a plait. He used to mark an A on the blackboard, and say, "Now this is A!"—and then down came the whip over the eight backs. All through the Middle Ages the elementary school teaching consisted in thrashing things in. With primitives it is still worse; they inflict a cut at the same time. The primitive education has to be cruel in order to prevent their forgetting, because they so easily forget. By this procedure the idea becomes associated with the body. It incarnates, it comes down into reality like the runes which were hatched out by Odin when he was hanging on the tree. He fell down with them like a ripe apple. They were the apple that grew on the human being. . . . Creative powers can just as easily turn out to be destructive" (CW 17, par. 244).

the tree and he was the apple. He was the word, the thought, as Christ is called the Logos; he was identical with the word. So this whole ninth chapter shows again the transformation of a human being into a thought, the transformation of Nietzsche into Zarathustra and the burial of Nietzsche the man. It would be the old Adam and the resurrection with Christ according to the Christian formulation, but here he becomes a ghost-being. Primitives teach the young men, when they are taken into the men's house in the Bush, that they are killed there; they go through the procedure of being killed and are told that they have died on this night. Then they are reborn and are taught that they are no longer ordinary human beings but sort of ghost-beings, and they get new ghost names, secret ritual names. And they have peculiarly altered relations to the family when they come back: a mother is not allowed to look at her son, nor the son at the mother. It is like Christ's attitude to his own mother and to the mothers of his disciples: "Let the dead bury their dead," etc. One is no longer the son of man but the son of God. In all mysteries, the idea is that one is reborn as a sort of ghost.

So Zarathustra here has gained a ghost body by the burial of the human being; he wakes up in a new world and he marvels at it. He is like the sailor who has discovered a new land. And the great light that appears is the idea that one could replace one's body by companions, by friends and helpers, that one is no longer isolated, but one could have others as companions. You see, if people are nothing but body, then there is only the connection through the body; but if they are reborn as ghosts, they become aware that there is a sort of air connection. In primitive secret societies, the ghost-man is represented. Later on there is a church, a sort of community, which is based upon the presence of a certain ghost. What we call a religious movement comes from the psychology of the early primitive secret societies. Zarathustra realizes here not only the need but also the possibility of replacing the loss of the body by spiritual community. This is of course an exceedingly characteristic Christian idea; they burn the old Adam, the corpse, and then they have a new family, a new ghost relationship, a relationship in the spirit. And then Zarathustra says he needs, not dead companions, not corpses clinging to him, but living ones who follow themselves, which is what he wants them to do. Now what is the importance of this formulation?

Mrs. Fierz: Christians must follow Christ and here they must follow themselves.

Dr. Jung: Yes. And Mrs. Kirsch says that each shall take his own cross, not the cross of another. The fact is, one always must make that difference between the faint traces still in existence of an early Christianity with very different ideas, and the historical Christianity which is the real psychological fact we are confronted with. People often ask me why I paint such an unfavorable picture of Christianity; they say it is not a true picture. But look at it! And when I paint a true picture of our actual economic condition, they ask why I make it so awful. Their idea of a true economic condition is of course prosperity. Sure enough, that is what I also understand by it, a very favorable condition, a full pocketbook and a nice bank balance, but that is not the poor stuff we are producing nowadays. This formulation is exceedingly important, because it elucidates with one stroke the whole meaning of Zarathustra: it says that each one shall follow himself, and in so doing they follow him. Compare this saying with the age-old formulation of the Catholic church, Imitatio Christi—you know that famous little book by Thomas à Kempis—following Christ, not oneself.<sup>15</sup> And in the Protestant church it is exactly the same. One gives oneself away wholesale. That is called the sacrifice of yourself, giving up your ego standpoint, giving up your life and taking on Christ's life. That is, you climb upon his back and you give up your task, your own interests or problems, and simply travel with him, which is of course relatively easy. At all events, it is far more respectable and that always pays: it is nice, everybody is doing it—at least, they say so.

But if you should really imitate the life of Christ, you would land in an impossibility. Try it and you will see. There are people who really do try, even to the extent of getting the stigmata Christi. And in the lives of the saints, one sees that they really did their best to imitate Christ. But if we did that, where would we be? We would have to work all day to imitate Christ, we would have no time to do anything else; we wouldn't propagate, mankind would come to a happy end after one generation, all saved. Such a thing is completely unthinkable, yet they taught that stuff: Don't live your own life, don't take up your own cross, take Christ's cross, do as he did, not as you would do. Now, in opposition to that Zarathustra says, "I don't want human companions who do what I do. I am following myself and I hope that my friends and companions will do the same. Then they will be doing what I want them to do." You would say this was an entirely new idea, but it is not: this was really Christ's teaching but it was not understood. There were a few people who understood it, but they were considered exceedingly heretic and if they could have burned them in those days they would have done so. Later on, when they were in power, they burned and flayed them alive. You know, old Hippocrates said that you cannot be redeemed for a sin you have not committed.<sup>16</sup>

The New Testament should be read subjectively. When Christ spoke of what you should do to your brother in the Sermon on the Mount, he really meant that you should do it to yourself. And when he said the kingdom of heaven was within yourselves he really meant that. He did not say the kingdom of heaven was between yourselves, as the theologians today want us to believe.<sup>17</sup> I talked with a well-known theologian who insisted that the kingdom of heaven was something in between ourselves, a sort of medium in which we were swimming. I pointed out that the Greek text says entheos, which means inside of one, and the whole of Greek literature corroborates that translation. But in this particular case he said it should be translated as “between.” That is the way things are falsified; that is what they did to the New Testament in general: they clipped things off or twisted them a little too much, and so the whole thing took on a different aspect. But entheos means “within” and that is what Christ said: the kingdom of heaven is within, and there is no use seeking it outside.

So each shall take his own cross, his own individual problem, his individual difficulty and suffering. If I could take the suffering of somebody else, it would be relatively easy. People sometimes suffer from perfect nonsense—how to secure a certain position, or become acquainted with certain people, or write a certain book for instance—and if I carry that it makes no difference to me. Just like that and it vanishes. Quite easy, no trouble. Yet it fills their whole lives and they never reach it. Sure enough, there are things which I cannot reach; I am just as poor a fool as they. But if I take their problem, there is no problem left. There is only a real problem when the problem comes to yourself—that you carry your own life. Christ really meant that each one should take his own cross, live his life to the bitter end. That is initiation. That is the way, not to perfection—we can’t be so ambitious—but to completion at least. And that is what Zarathustra meant: it is the kernel of his teaching. No matter about all sorts of pathological complications, this is the important message to our time. And mind you, the important message is never new; it has always been the truth wherever you touched it, and therefore you can say it is the oldest truth. It is as a matter of fact much older than man, because every snail, every bug, every plant is living that truth; each is living its own life. And if they don't, well, they just are not good plants, or bugs, or tigers, or fishes: they go to hell, they have spoiled God's own creation.

<sup>16</sup> The Antinomists held that since there is no redemption without sin, one need not abstain. The Enkratites, on the other hand, were extreme ascetics. See CW 6, par. 25.

<sup>17</sup> The “social Gospel” interpreters read “within you” as within or among the group, not the single individual.

LECTURE IV

Dr. Jung:

Here is a question by Mrs. Baumann: "In the fourth chapter, Zarathustra preaches the value of the body. Now that he buries his body for the sake of being a free spirit, does that mean that he didn't realize what he said before, or is it simply a swing back? It seems to me it is one of those complicated places. Nietzsche didn't realize what he wrote himself, and so Zarathustra was unable to emphasize the body more."

It is not so complicated in reality. Sure enough, it is part of the message of Zarathustra to preach the importance of the body, otherwise his message would have no basis; the idea of individuation, as he preaches it in that chapter, implies the body. You cannot individuate if you are a spirit; moreover, you don't even know how spirit feels because you are in the body. So if you speak of individuation at all, it necessarily means the individuation of beings who are in the flesh, in the living body. It is of course meant to become a reality, or it would remain only a good idea in the mind—one would be individuated because one had such an idea in one's head. People ordinarily think that a right thought must be throughout, not realizing that it is only a very small noise in the attic, and the rest of the house is as it always was, nothing having happened at all. The head, the brain is only a small part of the body. It is just an illusion when you think the right thought in your head means a reality; it is a reality as far as a thought reality reaches; the thought itself is real, but it has not become a reality in space. It has not been expressed by the whole of you. So Zarathustra has the right idea no doubt: he includes the body in the process of individuation, and he emphasizes it because without the body there would be only a disincarnated spirit. But inasmuch as Zarathustra himself is a thought-being—he is really just an archetypal spirit who has the right idea—it is not the man Nietzsche. Nietzsche is not the Superman, but he identifies with Zarathustra naively because he is so swallowed up by that archetype from the collective unconscious. He in-tuited it because it is a figure of such mighty attraction; his whole life was sucked in by it and the body could go by the board. That special body, the man Nietzsche, simply disappeared behind it. Therefore, there is nobody left to receive Zarathustra's message. Zarathustra speaks his own message, using the means of the body of Nietzsche, and the ordinary human being Nietzsche does not exist. He could not stand up against Zarathustra; he was completely dissolved.

He ought to take a stand against Zarathustra and then something else of course would happen; he would be able to realize the message. He would not speak as if Zarathustra or the Superman were talking. He would say: "A spirit has spoken to me." The real prophet does not identify with Jahveh. He only stands for his word. He receives the word and says Jahveh speaks, not he himself. Nietzsche does not think for a moment that Zarathustra is a spirit in its own dignity and right. He always interpenetrates. He is that spirit somehow. The perfectly good message Zarathustra delivers does not reach the man Nietzsche because he is in no relation to that teaching; he is not a part of the audience. Nowhere in Zarathustra can you find a place where Nietzsche really appears; he is nowhere among the audience. He is the preacher, but he does not listen at the same time. The man Nietzsche should appear among the friends or disciples of Zarathustra. We should encounter a passage where he says, "I met Zarathustra, I saw him," or "He spoke to me." Then we would be sure that he made a difference between himself and Zarathustra, and then only could he realize Zarathustra's teaching. He would look at his own body, and would ask himself how he could translate Zarathustra's teaching into his own life. The whole thing would have taken an entirely different course; we would behold an entirely different spectacle, and not the tragic fate brought about through that identification. No matter what the teaching of a spirit may be—a spirit may teach all sorts of things—the question is always whether it reaches the preacher himself or not, whether there is anybody who can make it real. That is, of course, the problem. You see, Zarathustra has not been made real; you must search far for anybody who has made Zarathustra's teaching real. It is tremendously difficult to make it real because it reaches you in your most personal life, and sure enough, you cannot reach high tones any longer when you are concerned with that problem.

Mr. Baumann: There are certain examples. Dante, for instance, experienced everything with Virgilius.<sup>1</sup> There were two in that case.

Dr. Jung: That is a good example. He makes a difference between himself and the dynamis; he is not identical with the psychopompos. Virgilius is to him of course this same archetype, but it is a different kind of teaching. It is the message of the Middle Ages. But the future idea is already appearing when Dante reaches Paradise, for at the very summit of Paradise is the mystical rose in which individuation is indicated. That is the end of the Christian mandala, the highest realization of the time, and the mystical rose is the future. And it is Nietzsche, or Zarathustra, who continues, who takes up the eternal thread and carries it further, bringing the idea of the mystical rose down into the being of man. Of course, there were other expressions of it in the meantime: medieval alchemistic philosophy, and Master Eckhart, and Faust, and many other stepping stones led to that transformation of the human mind or the human psychology.

Now, here is a question by Miss Hannah: "When Zarathustra, in the last paragraph of section 9, says 'I will o'erleap them that loiter and delay,' is he not identifying with the jester and giving away again the whole positive meaning of the chapter?"

He is most certainly identifying with the jester there; as Zarathustra, he is also the jester. You remember we made that out in our famous equation. He is the jester and he is destructive inasmuch as he is going to jump over the man Nietzsche, for that loitering one is the body he has buried. The ordinary man who is in the body is inert: he loiters, he hesitates, he cannot follow those high intuitions. Therefore, Zarathustra will jump over the man Nietzsche, as the jester jumped over the rope-dancer. Miss Hannah continues: "It seems to me that the chapter contains, as well as the extremely positive perception 'follow yourself,' a very good description of why no human being could live up to being a friend of Nietzsche's, including himself."

Inasmuch as Nietzsche is identical with Zarathustra, of course nobody could possibly be a personal friend to him; nobody can deal with such an identification because it means an inflation. One cannot form a personal relation with a person who has an inflation; anybody with an inflation is neurotic, and it is absolutely impossible to form a relation with a neurotic, because one never knows with whom one is dealing. A neurotic is always a yea and a nay. One thinks one is perfectly safe in assuming this, and then one discovers something else, so naturally all relations are upset in the long run. One can of course deceive oneself for a certain length of time; one can live under an illusion, having a relation only to the positive side of the neurotic, but after a while one will be confronted with the negative side and then one will see the mistake. And so Nietzsche, inflated by that archetype Zarathustra, was inhuman; a person who is assimilated by such an archetype is necessarily not human. He is a Superman, and how can one have a friendship with a Superman? Absolutely impossible. One can only worship him as a superior being. But I wouldn't drink a glass of beer with a Superman. One cannot eat at the same table; one can only hold communion where he is the lord. Is your question answered, Miss Hannah?

Miss Hannah: Yes, quite. But what I really meant was: was it not his impatience that really destroyed his relationships and his own life?—the impatience of intuition?

Dr. Jung: Well, that impatience expresses itself very strongly in the figure of Zarathustra. He is urgent, pressed by time; he wants to deliver his message, he cannot wait. I mentioned that later chapter where he is seen descending to hell through the volcano and where a voice says: "Es ist Zeit, höchste Zeit." That shows how impatient he is to tell his message, as if he felt his impending doom, the degeneration of the brain which began soon after. In Ecce Homo you already see traces of it, the first symptom occurred only four or five years later.<sup>2</sup> So it was really immediately before the gate was closed that Zarathustra was able to deliver his message.

Dr. Howells: You don't put that to his own nature? You put it rather to the doom that was awaiting him?

Dr. Jung: I would say it was also an intuition of the doom. We are almost forced to such an assumption on account of the clear indication of the catastrophe in the death of the rope-dancer; there Nietzsche predicts his own fate.

Miss Hannah: Would it not have been possible, if he had curbed that impatience, to have avoided the doom?—if he had been more considerate to the human animal?

Dr. Jung: Then the case would have been quite different; we cannot say what would have happened if the old Romans had had rifles and gunpowder.

Mrs. Baynes: I think you said at the beginning of the Seminar last spring that it was a question whether the events were going to transpire in the pure collective unconscious or the collective conscious. If he has parted with his body as a human being, could we say the rest of the book transpires in the pure collective unconscious?

Dr. Jung: One could formulate it like that. But it is happening really in the collective consciousness. Inasmuch as Zarathustra is written and spoken, it is already part of consciousness. You see, as long as it is the collective unconscious, it is as if contained in the person or individual; but inasmuch as it becomes spoken, manifest, it is in the collective consciousness. So whatever happens now is happening in a collective consciousness because it is the life of a personified idea. It is no longer in the collective unconscious; if it were there we would not know of it.

Mrs. Baynes: I thought that he was just speaking as if through a loud-speaker from the collective unconscious.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is true, but through the speaking, it becomes collective consciousness. That transformation of the collective unconscious into the collective consciousness is what one calls revelation, and any revelation that really comes from the collective unconscious is like a megaphone because it is a message spoken to many; it reaches a crowd because it expresses a collective thought. So inasmuch as Zarathustra has expressed the collective thought, he has become part of the collective consciousness.

Mr. Baumann: Does that mean that it wouldn't necessarily go into his individual consciousness?

Dr. Jung: It can be quite aside from the individuality. It is often as if Nietzsche did not exist, or did not know what he was saying. Therefore, many revelations take place through completely unconscious individuals; they speak through a trance. It is even the primitive assumption that a revelation always takes place through an unconscious body, in a sort of trance. Suddenly a spirit seizes the person and he becomes unconscious or gets into a state of ekstasis and utters the revelation. He speaks the divine word, and afterwards can remember nothing of it. It is even a criterion of the revelation from the collective unconscious, that the individual is put out completely while it is happening; the typical medicine-man often behaves like that.

Well now, we spoke last time of the nature of the message, the continuation of the Christian idea. It is an absolute law of the development of religious thought that it evolves as it were out of itself. On a certain level of consciousness religious thought is expressed by many gods, say, or by demons, or by images; and they have their individual biographies. They are generated in such and such a way; they are born of such and such parents; they do such and such things; and are for such and such a purpose. And it is all assumed as a sort of concrete event which has taken place or is taking place—that the gods live on Olympus, for instance, or in certain trees, or any such idea. Now, this concrete manifestation of the gods contains the next step—the next religious form that is—in a symbolic way. In what the gods do or in what happens to them, is given at the same time the symbol of the subsequent stage; so one could say that the subsequent stage of religious thought is always the interpretation on the subjective stage. It is like a dream where there is a sort of concrete action, a concrete performance of concrete people, yet the whole thing represents a thought. If you analyse it, integrate the imagery of the dream, and understand that Mr. & Mrs. So-and-So who appear in the dream are only aspects of your own psychology, then it becomes clear that you have been enacted as a play in the dream in order that a thought could be performed which is not your thought, but one that has come to you which ought to be realized. So the end of the dream interpretation is that all the performances are understood as concretizations of a thought which existed before and which caused the dream; through that play on the stage of the dream consciousness, this particular thought was conveyed to your waking consciousness. One sees the same thing in the continuous revelation of religious thought, which is a sort of dream of the collective unconscious as a whole, different scenes being on the stage at different times. For instance, for the time between 2000 B.C. and 100 B.C., the dream—what we might call the divine thought—is staged in such a way. In the mythology and religions of that age, you find the manifest dream which they took for the real thing. Then another age comes when all the old gods decay, when they are no longer true, and there we have a new setting; the stage is now formed and a new play takes place. And this play contains the interpretation of the former one, apparently an entirely different play is enacted, yet it is an interpretation of the former one.

Egypt, for example, was the foremost cultural power in the Near East. It lasted longer than Babylon, which was destroyed by the Persians while Egypt was still guarding the old traditions. Egypt is chiefly responsible for the drama of the collective unconscious between 4000 and 100 B.C. The main religious thought which was handed down through the ages was the divinity of the Pharaoh, the king; and the god-man, the savior, the Osiris, the image of the soul. Osiris was an original god of Egypt, just as old as Ra, yet he was always different from Ra, the sun god. He was a sort of god-man, the dying and resurrecting hero god. He was first understood to be a god and then he became the soul, the Osiris, of the Pharaoh. As the king was in a way Ra, he was also Osiris, the dying and resurrecting hero. So Osiris became the mediator between the gods and men. Therefore, the surface of the walls of the temples are covered on the outside with representations of the worldly feats of the king, and inside with pictures of the god-king having intercourse with the gods. Outside, he is the great figure of the land, the political hero, with little warrior figures round him, little soldiers to slay his enemies; and inside the temple, he is the god-man who converses with the gods. He receives the blessing or the sign of ankh from the hands of the gods, or he offers the ankh to the gods. They receive life from him through the royal offering.

Now, this figure of Osiris is very clearly an anticipation of Jesus or of the Christus idea, so clearly that even the Catholic church—which is rather hesitant in such matters—permits the theory that Isis and the Horus child are an anticipation of Mary and the Christ Child, as Osiris is an anticipation of the Lord Jesus. The Christian idea was chiefly influenced by the mystical ideas of Egypt; there were similar ideas in Babylonian culture, but I think the main origin of Christianity is to be found in Egypt. So the figure of Christ, to us an entirely symbolical figure, is the interpretation of that old Osiris myth of Egypt. But he was not a symbolic figure to the early Middle Ages or to antiquity. He was a real fact, as the mother Mary was of course a virgin. All those things happened in reality, and in the Catholic church you are still forced to believe in the absolute fact of the virgin birth. Of course, we cannot help seeing that it must be symbolic. Even if the man Jesus existed at all, the story of his life is not historical. It is clearly mythology, like the mythology of Attis, or Adonis, or Mithras; that was all syncretistically put together into the figure of the Christus. We are not quite imbued with the conviction that the crucifixion, the virgin birth, and the story of the temptation is symbolism, and therefore we know something which former ages have not known.

Our problem now is: what does it mean? what is our interpretation? Zarathustra is, to a certain extent, an interpretation of our Christian idea. And individuation is now our mythology. Then what is individuation? It is a great mystery, a boundary concept: we don't know what it is.<sup>3</sup> We call it the uniqueness of a certain composition or combination, and beyond that we can say nothing about it. To us it is a reality, yet it is a reality just on the boundary line of human understanding, and in two thousand years they will probably say that the whole idea of individuation was nothing but symbolism. And then they will have some new idea to tell about: there will be another Zarathustra perhaps, or any other attempt. A sort of revelation will take place which will suddenly put an entirely different light upon the hitherto prevailing theory. You see, if Zarathustra had appeared two thousand years ago, if he had been a Buddha in the first century, for instance, when Buddhism began to spread over Tibet and Southern China, he would have been one of the great teachers of the Mahayana with a red or a yellow hat. We are still too close to have any relation to it, any historical perspective, but at a future time—assuming that people continue as they have done hitherto—they may say Zarathustra is the great teacher, the red hat teacher or something of the sort. They will perhaps invent a name.

Miss Wolff: I have just looked over a book by Herder in which he gives the myths of all people.<sup>4</sup> And in speaking of Zoroaster, he says his great idea was that man was perfection of creation. It is remarkable that this idea has been seen by Herder, who knew, of course, very little of the Persian religion. I thought Nietzsche must have read it and perhaps been affected by it somewhat.

Dr. Jung: Yes, Nietzsche considered the choice of the name to be of great historical importance, because he held that Zoroaster the Persian was really the inventor of the moral conflict between good and evil, a fact which is hardly to be denied. As he lived in about the eighth century B.C., he probably had the priority of that idea. So Nietzsche says that Zoroaster must come back in order to make restitution. Therefore: his aspiration to be beyond good and evil. This is of course the idea of liberation from the pairs of opposites which is indispensable for the integration of the individual. Individuation is impossible as long as one is split into pairs of opposites. They must be overcome; how, of course, is the great question, but it must be done from a standpoint which is beyond good and evil. Nietzsche himself felt that symbolically when he wrote an important part of Zarathustra in Sils Maria, "six thousand feet beyond good and evil." He felt raised to the seat of the gods, above all the conflicts of the low plains where the herd dwells. From that height he was able to unite the pairs of opposites, to be free of doubt, to create a standpoint which is the reverse of old Zarathustra's moral conflict. So it is quite certain that Nietzsche knew about Zoroaster and was strongly impressed with the fact that he was really the first one to make man conscious of himself. For nobody becomes conscious of himself without the conflict: we need the conflict. As long as we are not living according to our own choice we cannot know of ourselves. We must be able to choose for ourselves.

Miss Wolff: In other mythologies the gods played an important part, but with Zoroaster man is the important thing. He perfects creation.

Dr. Jung: Quite so. That corresponds with the idea of the integration of the moral conflict, for in the moral conflict man takes on a sort of divine role. It is not left to God alone to fight the devil, or, as the Persian religion expressed it, it is not left to the light alone to fight the darkness. Man enters the battlefield: one could say as the living god, as the manifestation of god in the flesh. All these ideas are exceedingly old, but they formerly expressed themselves in peculiarly concretized forms. Each new level of civilization has given a new interpretation, and there is a sort of progress; things are getting more and more to the subjective stage of interpretation. It is as if we were concerned with a dream that had an exceedingly impressive surface, a very convincing picture with strong emotions, so that we have great difficulty in getting away from the impression of the complete situation. But after a while we are able to discover the thought behind it all and then we can integrate the figures of the dream. For instance, you dream of somebody who seems to be far below your level, a person, say, who is despicable, simply impossible, a person entirely different from your tastes, and you cannot see how you are that person. But if you meditate long enough about the dream, you discover the secret doors leading to yourself, where you can see the spot in which you are identical with him. Then you can integrate the figure; then you arrive at the subjective stage of your interpretation. Formerly the devil was outside. If anyone did something bad it was because a devil had tempted him. Or a spirit had possessed him and forced him. Nobody was responsible: there was no moral responsibility. But now nobody can use that excuse. Now he has to say: I am the devil, I am the sinner.

Mr. Baumann: I think this process by which the figure of god becomes symbolical is like the idea of the god going back into the sky, or the stars, or into any idea of remoteness; it happens in every religion to a certain extent. For instance, the Greek gods lived on the earth, on Olympus, and then in the Roman Empire came the idea of the pantheon of the gods. They were removed to the sky.

Dr. Jung: That is true. You know, there were attempts in antiquity to transform the absolutely concrete gods of Olympus into more mental beings. They became ideas. Jupiter, for instance, was made into a philosophical concept. And at the same time, in their concrete form, those primitive gods degenerated completely. They became ridiculous and were neglected. They just decayed and vanished, and were then superseded by Eastern religions imported from Palestine, Asia Minor, Egypt, etc. This process happened everywhere at that time. The Egyptian priesthood had become highly philosophical, so that a god of the fifth or fourth century B.C., say, was no longer concrete; it was already a philosophical idea. Naturally for the vulgar people it was still a concrete god, as is the case in India today. For instance, Professor von Glasenapp, a German Sanskritist, told me of meeting a Brahman in a temple where the people were worshipping a gorgeous and thoroughly barbarous sculptured image of Vishnu.<sup>5</sup> The two men were walking up and down in the courtyard, talking of the Upanishads, and von Glasenapp asked the priest why he allowed those people to worship such an image if he believed in that philosophy. And he replied: "But can they grasp the Upanishads? Let them worship the image, because in this the whole philosophy of the Upanishads is expressed." That is a very superior point of view, and I am certain that the Egyptian priests had such a philosophy too, but it was so well guarded that it never was betrayed. Surely the subsequent world of ideas, the apparently sudden explosion of that enormous fantastical philosophy called "The Gnosis" is due to the ideas of the Egyptian priesthood. They were no longer held sufficiently within the precincts of the temples; something filtered through the walls. But the main body of their ideas died out simply because they were never betrayed. We know precious little of them.

So I am convinced that early Christianity originated in the secret teaching which somehow filtered through when the temples became obsolete and the religious forms of Egypt began to degenerate. The fact that there was, in the time immediately before and after the appearance of Jesus, an enormous development of thought of a very new and different kind, is too unaccountable otherwise. Plutarch, who was an Egyptian initiate, gives in his book about Isis and Osiris the philosophical interpretation of their mysteries. And Herodotus, many centuries before, was an initiate, but he was not allowed to speak about them.<sup>6</sup> The initiations probably consisted of a sort of philosophical teaching in which the secret meaning of the images, the sacred signs, and names was explained. There are many very obvious symbolic allusions on the Mithraic monuments, for instance, which must have been explained to the initiates. The rites were always secret because the secret meanings were spoken or alluded to. And the early Christians also had their mysteries. Baptism and communion belong to the mysteries: baptism was initiation.

Mr. Baumann: Would one not say that Christ had turned into a philosophical idea?

Dr. Jung: As soon as we say of a thing that it is symbolic, it is already a philosophical idea, whether it is formulated or not. The idea of Christ is only just becoming a philosophical idea, for there are people who still think he is personal, a real man, a real presence, and they grow quite afraid when one says otherwise. The Lord Buddha was a man like Jesus; he was real, but he has become a symbol. He is not even called by his real name; that is a ritual name. Or he is called the Tathagata, meaning "the perfect one, the accomplished one." He is a symbol; he is the idea of perfection. And so Christ is for us the idea of a human individual that has attained to the state of perfection.

Prof. Fierz: He was named Jesus and we call him Christ.

Dr. Jung: Yes, by giving him a ritual name, we have already declared him to be a symbol. Chrisma means ointment, and Christ is the anointed one, the baptized one; he is the symbol of the initiated one. His real name is most ordinary. Jesus is a name like Müller or Smith.

Mrs. Crowley: Would you not say that, in the main, the more philosophical these gods have become—the more they have become abstract ideas—the less vital they are as gods? They seem to be so bloodless and lifeless. That image of Sophia is nothing compared with Isis.

Dr. Jung: Yes, they evaporate into thin smoke, but then the idea itself takes a new form which is exceedingly vital. For instance, the old idea of Osiris being one complete god evaporated and became the Osiris of the king. Then it was the Osiris of the grand vizier, and the high priest, and the treasurer, and so on; and finally it was just everybody. Smith and Jones and everybody had their Osiris. The Osiris of Mr. Smith was a perfectly good Osiris, but with that the whole idea was banalized. Osiris became a sort of immortal genius of everybody and no longer had any particular value. So that symbol vanished and was replaced by a new idea, namely, a new man. And the new idea suddenly became exceedingly vital, because he was a man and a king at the same time; the great point was that, though he was a king, yet he was from the low ones. He was even of disreputable birth; human misery was a cradle for the divine man. That of course was a great message. But now the idea of individuation, as portrayed by the symbol of Christ, the divine man, is thin smoke because it is abstract; while for Mr. Smith to discover that he is an individual is at least two million volts. You know what it meant for all the low ones, the prostitutes and the tax-collectors and the illegitimate children and the illegitimate mothers, to know that from among them the god-man had come; so you can appreciate what it means when Mr. Smith discovers that he is an individual.

Now, Zarathustra rightly wants to find his companions; it is a mistake only if he seeks his companions instead of himself, instead of his own humanity or his body. If Zarathustra were a real man and had accomplished the Superman in himself, it would be quite natural that companions would come to him. He would not go to seek them. Have you ever heard of gold running after people? The gold is hidden in the clefts of the earth and is just waiting; it is always gold in itself and will always be sought for. If there is really a good thing, it is sought for: that is the characteristic of the good thing. The mountain comes to the prophet, the prophet never goes to the mountain. If any prophet is seen going to the mountain, you may know he has made a mistake. He had much better stay at home and leave the mountain to itself. Therefore, all this missionary talk here is of course the hunger. If anybody wants to "missionarize" the world and to tell people what is good for them, it means that he is hungry; he wants to fill his belly with the corpses of other people. His own ideas are hungry, his own soul; and other people are feeding his thoughts and appetites because he is unable to feed them himself.

If you discover what you call a truth, you should test it, try to eat it. If it feeds you it is good, but if you cannot live by it and only assume it ought to feed other people, then it is bad. The real test is that your truth should be good for yourself. Not one dog is coming to sniff at it if it doesn't feed yourself. If you are not satisfied with it, if you cannot enjoy it for twenty, fifty years, or a whole lifetime, it is no good. If you are hungry, if you think your companions must be redeemed, and that they must be grateful to you on top of all, then you make a mistake: you may know the idea is no good. So don't play the missionary. Don't try to eat the goods of others. Let other people belong to themselves and look after their own improvement: let them eat themselves. If they are really satisfied, then nobody should disturb them. If they are not satisfied with what they possess, they will probably seek something better; and if you are the one who has the better thing, they will surely come and get it from you. It is an exaggeration, therefore, that Zarathustra wants to entice many away from the herd. He would quite rightly be called a robber by the shepherd. The sheep want to be with the shepherd, for otherwise the wolves eat them. He says he doesn't want to be the shepherd dog of a herd, so he should leave them with the shepherd; they are much better off with a real shepherd than they would be as companions of that hungry wolf Zarathustra. If he wants to have companions, let him go with the wolves; then he can hunt in a pack. With the sheep it is much too easy.

You see, that is the attitude one ought to take with reference to the problem of individuation: no mission work, no preaching, and no enticing little children from their nurses, or sheep from the shepherd. Let them be with the shepherd, it is much better. People accuse me of a particularly characterless attitude as to religious convictions because I say if anybody wants to be in the fold of the Catholic church, let him remain there. Or let him remain a Protestant if he finds his way in it and his life. That is a contradiction to them, but it is no contradiction. Some people want twenty degrees, and others want twenty-two degrees. Why not? Let them have it. Some people don't like to eat meat, others want to live on it. Well, do so, it doesn't concern me. For to be Catholic simply means that one is Catholic, and to be Protestant means that one is Protestant. Or if you believe in Islam, it simply means that you are the kind of man who believes in Islam. You could not possibly believe in Islam here because it doesn't suit our climate in the least, but down on the Red Sea and thereabouts, you understand why those people can believe in Islam, why it is so much better than Christianity. Christianity is most degenerate there. When I saw the mosques and compared them to the Greek Orthodox church, I understood; I would have gone with Islam by all means, if only in order to clear out that whole lampisterie.<sup>7</sup> The Christian churches in the East are filled with bunk, and the dirty priests are awful; you wish they had a basin in which to wash themselves. And the hypocrisy and the lowdown barbaric worship of images! It makes you feel like Christ when he drove all those money-changers out of the temple. Islam is a decent religion in comparison. We get the wrong side of it because only theologians are interested in religions, and they are of course against religions other than their own, so they paint them black. I was amazed to find Islam so much more spiritual than Eastern Christianity, which is only a degenerate remnant of Christian Gnosticism.

You see, certain countries, certain climates, make you naturally prefer a certain way of dealing with the great secrets. If you live in India, for instance, and are not infected with the Indian spirit, then you are just a sad specimen. A missionary living in the East, who wants to convert Indians or Chinamen, and is not sensitive enough to be affected by the specific spirit of the country, is a very melancholy spectacle. Men like Richard Wilhelm or Hauer were instantly open to it, for it is greater and better than our views in certain respects.<sup>8</sup> Of course, it would be stupid to seek technology in Shanghai or in India, and it is stupid to believe we can bring them any religious ideas. We can bring them a certain amount of sentimentality, but their inner development is much greater than ours. Of course, it does not express itself outwardly, but does our Christianity express itself outwardly? Can you show anything that would prove the particular influence of our Christianity upon politics for instance? Not a trace of it.

Mr. Baumann: But I think India and China expressed something several centuries ago.

Dr. Jung: Well, moderately. But we had better not try to prove by external manifestations the truth of internal development. Things were always a bit tough everywhere, so I would not lay too much stress on it. If you know how the first Christians behaved—who were supposed to be such marvelous people—you become modest. It is surely better not to insist upon moral achievements. Of course, it is in a way the criterion if they do not show. Things that don't show are usually better than those which do; people who show are always a bit questionable. They don't do really, they only show.

Well now, the idea of being active and violating others also shows in Zarathustra's idea of the decalogue, the tables of values. He says: "Behold, the good and just! Whom do they hate most? Him who breaketh up their tables of values, the breaker, the law-breaker:—he, however, is the creator." But he is the destroyer! No good breaking the tables of values, they are weak enough already; you had better hold that little bit of value together. They need no particular wildness because they will break up all by themselves and altogether too early; we know from history that values begin to break up long before there are new ones to take their place. Therefore, we always go through a time of destruction when people are without orientation and without laws. Usually only the greatest misery forces people to create new laws and new values. If Zarathustra were not so impatient, the man Nietzsche could follow him. He could give Zarathustra the right rhythm, prevent him from being too impatient. Then he would not talk of breaking the tables of values. They could be preserved a little longer. They are weak enough: they will break up without our help. It is not necessary to destroy churches. Nobody attacks Islam, but the mosques are empty; nobody attacks Protestantism, but innumerable people never go to church on Sundays. To break up things is merely the impatience of inflation.

Now, just at the end of this section he says something which is remarkable: "To the lone-dwellers will I sing my song, and to the twain-dwellers; and unto him who hath still ears for the unheard, will I make the heart heavy with my happiness." This is not well translated in the English text, but you get it in the German. Einsiedler is one man alone, the one-dweller, literally; and Zweisiedler are the two-dwellers. But that is not a real word, it is something funny in his style; and that always indicates a secret thought behind, which did not come through properly. It is like queer things in dreams; a peculiarity or a disturbance of the image betrays the interference of a secret thought behind. You see, it would be enough if he said: "I am preaching to the lonely ones. They shall be my companions, for the lonely ones can appreciate my teaching. They are not satisfied and are seeking the Superman together with myself; as they are lonely, I am lonely, etc." That would make a perfectly nice end to this chapter. But no, it must be: "Zwei-siedler"; there are couples apparently, two alone together. Of course one can have a romantic idea about it—he and she—but that is surely not what Nietzsche is thinking of. It must be two lonely people together. Now why the one and the two?

Mr. Baumann: Is it like Nietzsche and Zarathustra, the splitting up of one person?

Dr. Jung: No, there is a great problem behind. One alone would be good enough for Zarathustra, the lonely one, the anchorite; two is already society, a relationship. When I am one I am this man; when I am two I am another man. As soon as you are with somebody else you are different, you are the collective man. So he makes here the attempt at preaching to the collective man, the thing which he had just refused to do. He said he never would speak to the herd again. But here two of the herd come in; he cannot get away from it. That is an important problem and there is historical proof of it. You know, the theory is that the Evangelists were originally derived from the so-called Aramaic collection of sayings of Jesus. But in the excavations at Oxyrhynchus those famous fragments of papyrus were found which contain sentences and anecdotes of Jesus, just as if they had been put down from hearsay; and they are all parallels of the sayings in the New Testament. They were written without the knowledge of the Evangelists and are therefore older—just as Paul did not know the Evangelists when he wrote—so they date presumably from the very early years of Christianity. Now, in the New Testament, you remember, the text is: “For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.” But the text in the papyrus is: “Jesus said: ‘Whenever there are two they are not without God, and wherever there is one alone I say I am with him; raise the stone and there thou shalt find me, cleave the wood and there am I.’ ” You see what has happened. His teaching was really: “Where there is one alone I am with him most definitely. Whatever you do I am with you; raise the stone and there you shalt find me; in your activity, in what you do, in whatever your individual occupation is, I am found, I am present in it.” It is the idea of individuation obviously, because no matter how humble the thing you may do, it is yourself expressed in the way in which you do it. Jesus is in it; you find him in it: “Cleave the wood and there am I.” “But when there are two they are not without God.”<sup>9</sup> Yes, the collective man is not without God, but when you are alone, then Christ is within. So the original teaching was that it is an entirely individual affair.

That is proved by another fragment, the famous fragment about the animals. Jesus said: “Ye ask who are those that draw us to the kingdom if the kingdom is in heaven?”—meaning obviously: who can pull us up over the horizon with our heavy bodies, how can we reach the kingdom above? “And Jesus answered: ‘The fowls of the air and all beasts that are in the earth or upon the earth, and the fishes of the sea, these are they which draw you; and the kingdom of heaven is within you; and whoever shall know himself shall find it. Strive therefore to know yourselves and ye shall be aware that ye are in the city of God, and ye are the city,'<sup>10</sup> You see, it is as clear as daylight: this is the idea of individuation. Of course, modern Christianity fights against that point of view. Their idea is that when there are two or three together in Christ's name, He is with them, but when there is one alone, then the devil is with him. They believe one's own society is always bad. We have arrived at a complete depreciation of the human soul: it doesn't pay to look after your soul. Be a sheep in collectivity, for when you are alone the devil is with you. Now, the teaching of Zarathustra is again the teaching of the original revelation.

LECTURE V

7 November 1934

Dr. Jung:

Last week Mrs. Baynes asked a question which apparently I did not understand and now she corrects it: "I asked if one could say that from now on, i.e., after the sleep at the foot of the tree, the events could be said to transpire in the collective unconscious. You understood me to ask if the events were not transpiring in the collective conscious, and you said this was a correct formulation and explained why." You see people read the book; it has become conscious matter. There is nothing unconscious about it. As a matter of fact, you yourself prove my point here. You say, "Now my argument was this: Nietzsche as a man disappears from the picture, we said, with the burial of the body, and that leaves us with Zarathustra, a disembodied spirit. He goes to sleep at the foot of the tree and awakens in the world of the collective unconscious. The sun would then be the midnight sun and the snake and eagle cease to represent instincts, and are symbols of earth and heaven, or nature and spirit, or Yin and Yang. The rest of the book would then be a record of a night journey under the sea. I can now see that this is an incorrect view because Zarathustra is attempting to present new values to humanity and a night sea journey would not deal with values, but experience of the inner world."

That is exactly the case. Thus Spake Zarathustra is not a series of experiences of the inner world; there are very few of those. The book mainly consists of the thoughts and values Nietzsche develops from them, the experiences themselves being left pretty much in the dark. We don't know exactly what he experienced, because he translated it right away into thoughts and values. Now, if it were a night sea journey—if Zarathustra were really a disembodied spirit, in other words—then a quite different book would have resulted. If it had been written at all, it would have contained that experience under the sea. But as a matter of fact, Zarathustra is not a night sea journey. It is written by a man, Nietzsche. Zarathustra is just not a disembodied spirit. If he were, Nietzsche would be confronted with Zarathustra, but he is identical with him; and that of course causes the whole trouble. Nietzsche speaks, yet Zarathustra speaks through the medium of Nietzsche; they are not clearly separated. You probably have read in my books, in "The Relations between the Ego and Unconscious" for instance, that one should make a difference between the conscious ego and the figures of the collective unconscious.<sup>1</sup> If the archetype of the wise old man appears, then naturally the ego is just caught—one is always caught by unconscious contents. Then you find yourself in a peculiar alienated condition; you see things and say things and feel things as you wouldn't before. It is a sort of new experience of yourself. You see yourself in a different light, and people perhaps react to it and make remarks about it, that you look funny or say funny things: "What was the matter with you the other day?" From such experiences you begin to notice, if you are at all introspective, that something has happened to you. You begin to reflect about your condition, to think about what you say; and you confront yourself with the question: "Why did I say such a thing?" "Out of what psychology was it said and done?" And then you come to the conclusion that it was not exactly yourself: you would not speak like that.

Now you can do the same thing with all the contents of the unconscious. I will tell you a very striking example, this time of the animus, which is also an archetypal figure, of course. You can take this case as a general, most suitable example, valid for all cases of archetypes. I once met a lady at a social gathering. She was my hostess, and she talked to me for about one and a half hours uninterruptedly, so that I had absolutely no opportunity to squeeze a word in between. Then suddenly she stopped the flow of her talk and said: "Now tell me, what did you observe? What do you think of me?" "I think you are a bit nervous." "Oh yes, I know that—that is nothing new to me." So I said, "Well, if you insist on knowing, I must say that you don't think." With this of course she went right up into the air like a sky-rocket, because she had been telling me very difficult philosophical problems; my head almost burst and I had difficulty in following her. It was, in a way, intelligent and highly intellectual talk, so that a listener would have said, "God, isn't she a terror!" Naturally, it seemed to her simply grotesque that I should say she did not think. She said, "But you must explain what you mean! We have discussed the most difficult things." Discussed, you know! That is what women call discussion. It was a complete animus projection. "Well," I said, "I can explain it to you: about five minutes ago we 'discussed' such and such a problem, and you made the most marvelous formulations about this very difficult question, but I could read what you told me in any philosophical text book or dictionary just as well." She said: "But that is the way my mind works. I fix it on a certain spot, and it jumps into my mind ready made." I said: "That is all very well, but if you are talking to me, if I am interested at all, I really want to know what you think, and not what the books say." And then she said: "If you want to know that, I must think about it first!" Quite naively! It was perfectly true that it was all ready made; it jumped into her mind in a miraculous way and she simply blurted it out. It flowed out like a river. But that was not her thought. It was thought which was floating in the air, in the libraries and philosophical papers and the halls of universities; but it was not what this particular woman had to say about such a problem. She made no difference whatever between herself and her animus; she naively identified with that river of thought which was flowing out of her. And that is what Nietzsche does. He is simply identical with old man Zarathustra, and the flow which comes out of him is Zarathustra himself.

But mind you, while you admit that you are identical with the archetype, obviously imbued with its contents, you must also remember that you are in existence too; and you interpenetrate, you impregnate that spirit with yourself. You are something, you don't disappear. And when you analyse the flow which comes out of you, you will discover not only what the old archetype says, but what you say. So in all the talk that woman produced, she also was all over the place, but in a way which was absolutely invisible to herself. She herself talked but through the medium of the archetype. And so both were wrong; the archetype was wrong and she was wrong, because one was falsifying the other. Therefore, I say to a man: you must make a difference between yourself and your anima, between yourself and all that is contained, thought, or felt through her influence and emotionality. To a woman I say: you must make a difference between yourself and the flow of thoughts which goes through your head: don't assume that things are so because you think so; or don't assume that other people think like that because that thought is in yourself. Criticize it and see whether it is your own. When a bad animus case produces a marvelous opinion, I say: "Now come! is that yourself? Do you really back up this thought? Are you convinced that things are like that?" "When I come to think of it, no!" "Then why the devil should you talk like that? Whose opinion is it?" Then perhaps she finds out that her father has said it or any other authority; or she has read it in the newspaper. And so Nietzsche preaches any amount about the body, but ask the man Nietzsche what he thinks about the body and he will tell a different story. It is a possession when people preach things which they don't make true in their lives. They simply run away with a disembodied spirit who talks marvelous high stuff, but they are not confronted with it in their lives. It never becomes a problem. They never even think of making it true, but simply accept it as a fact and behave entirely differently. I complain that they talk and think in one way and behave in another, but people are even quite proud that they can think differently from the way they feel. They don't see that this is a split which goes through the whole condition, and that it is a morbid condition, a lack of wholeness, a lack of integrity.

It is perfectly true that if Zarathustra were a disembodied spirit, the eagle and the snake would become, as Mrs. Baynes says, world principles. In man they would be conflicting instincts. But the difficult thing is that Nietzsche is so interwoven with Zarathustra that it is almost impossible to separate the two. They are so entangled, so utterly identical, that they influence each other all the time. You see, the old man would tell him something about the inner world; he would be the psychopompos, the great initiator who would lead Nietzsche to the understanding, or to the vision at least, of pleromatic things, the things which are below our level of consciousness.<sup>2</sup> And then Nietzsche might have made a record of what he had experienced and would perhaps have presented it to the world. But it would then be the story of a traveller on uncharted seas, and not a book of new values or philosophic thought. Or if he wrote a book of philosophical thought, it would not be Zarathustra who was speaking. He would say, "Excuse me, my name is Friedrich Nietzsche, and I hold such and such opinions. I judge things in such and such a way." And he would take the responsibility for what he said. He does not, however. He says that Zarathustra is speaking, and there is the entanglement. This is, of course, most upsetting. If a case comes to me with such an identification, I consider it my duty to say, "Now look here, you must see what you are doing. It is really better for yourself and for your work if you look at it critically." So I might have prevented Nietzsche from writing Zarathustra, but he would certainly have written something else, something entirely different. He might have written a book where in one chapter he wrote his own ideas, and in another he would have recorded his experiences with the unconscious.

Mr. Baumann: Does such an ideal book exist?

Dr. Jung: No, but we have records of such experiences in the unconscious. The "Shepherd of Hermas," for instance, and perhaps the Book of Revelation, to mention old literature.

Prof. Reichstein: Could the stories of being tempted by the devil be compared to such experiences?

Dr. Jung: The experiences of the saints? Well, in those cases there was always the elaboration through the influence of the church, for they would not be recorded if their stuff was not translated into the language of the church. If St. Francis had not been taken over and worked out by the church, he would have been stamped out; plenty of saints disappeared in a fire or a dungeon, simply delivered over to oblivion because they either did not like to translate their experiences into the church language or were not able to. If the church did not agree with them, they were stamped out as heretics. That collection of mystical confessions published by Buber would be examples of experiences of the unconscious.<sup>3</sup> And I quoted a case in The Secret of the Golden Flower. Edward Maitland, the biographer of Anna Kingsford and himself a mystic, describes such an experience. There you find a true confession as you can tell from the fact that it is not in agreement with the dogmatic ideas about the nature of God.<sup>4</sup> Also in that little book which I have reviewed, the visions of Nicholas von der Flüe, the Swiss mystic, there are a number of visions of the unadulterated kind.<sup>5</sup> But such experiences are usually translated into the dogmatic conventional languages of the time.

Dr. Schlegel: Is it not more or less the same thing as Faust?—the experience of the unconscious, and the conscious views?

Dr. Jung: Yes, but there we have also a sort of elaboration. Goethe worked a lifetime on Faust in order to get it into shape, so we are not quite certain about the amount of immediate experience and what he as a poet put into it. That will remain in the dark forever. We have clear indications from Goethe himself, however, that he put many things into it quite intentionally. We could not know how much original experience there was without making the attempt to analyse very carefully what he could have drawn out of his knowledge of mystical literature, and what he only could have experienced. There are quite certainly primordial experiences in Faust, but others are taken from his wide mystical reading.

Dr. Schlegel: But is one sure that there is no elaboration in Nietzsche?

Dr. Jung: Oh, there is any amount; we have indications of relatively few cases where we are certain of being confronted by the immediate experience. That premonition of his own death is a primordial experience; that is a shot from the unconscious and no elaboration. But Zarathustra is nearly all elaborated; it is just not a record of primordial experience.

Mrs. Sigg: Has not Spitteler in his work very often quite immediate experiences?

Dr. Jung: Well, there also is an enormous amount of elaboration. A primordial experience was the instigator of the work—all the trouble he took in order to produce it—beyond that it is very difficult to make out. I analysed his Prometheus and Epimetheus, but I never touched his Olympische Frühling; only by analysing it as we are analysing Zarathustra, could we make out which is the genuine experience and which is elaboration.<sup>6</sup>

Mr. Baumann: What about Joyce?

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is a great question! In Joyce there are indubitably parts which are quite genuine, and besides that there is an unaccountable flow of associations which are drawn from conscious experience. Nobody could say that they were absolutely genuine. You see, thought and judgment are entirely excluded: it is chiefly sensation, parts of intellect, also intuition, but there is a complete absence of rational material. The flow of consciousness is quite certainly the main body of the book, and a certain amount of unconsciousness flows into it. To use a comparison, we speak of the Rhine valley, in which flows the river Rhine. Yet it is a double phenomenon really. The actual Rhine valley where we see the Rhine flowing is a perfectly obvious, visible phenomenon; yet about sixty to ninety meters below is a much older valley from a former ice age in which another river is still flowing, also the Rhine, but that is completely invisible, and it is usually completely separated from the river above. You see, that is our condition: our consciousness is like a river, yet underneath another river is flowing which is much older, dating from times immemorial; and in between there is a separation, the threshold of consciousness. Occasionally, the two waters meet and then they separate again. Now, Joyce is that river of consciousness, and occasionally you get the idea that another river is underneath, which is in no connection with the river on the surface. Therefore, Joyce contains very little symbolism, because there is no attempt at synthesis, and if a symbol is anything, it is synthetic. So he represents the flow; he flows with it, and occasionally some intuitions come from the depths, but they are not worked into the whole thing, nor is there any confrontation with that material, none whatever. Therefore, those peculiar things in his book, the relation to the organs of the body for instance; such things only come in with lunatics, and then it is quite against their intention and it causes the most curious associations. But that can only happen where there is no confrontation with the material, no difference between the author and his material. He is just the event, utterly identical with it. Joyce appears nowhere. James Joyce is the flow himself; and Ulysses appears nowhere, the flow is Ulysses.<sup>7</sup>

Prof. Fierz: In his other book also, the biography, the Portrait of [The Artist as] a Young Man, nobody appears.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is the funny thing: nobody appears, yet the whole thing is always himself. Well, that is of course a different case; it is not like Zarathustra where we have definite figures. Joyce is separated by almost a hundred years from Nietzsche, he is after-the-war while Nietzsche is pre-war. That is the great difference. It would be an interesting problem for a speculative mind to discover why, before the war, though there was little confrontation, there was at least a certain amount; but since the war there is none whatever: things are simply happening. If artists are really prophets of the time, then it is a peculiar prophecy. There is a continuous decrease of confrontation, which means a continuous decrease of reflection, of distance, and a continuous identification with the flow—which means that we are like ants trying to cross a river, who cannot resist the power of the running water. So perhaps they are all going to drown. Or they may land somewhere, I don't know. But for a while everybody will be just floating, drifting, like a log in the river. And I must say the political development looks exactly like that. Nobody understands the situation; everybody suffers from profound disorientation. Things are happening in a completely uncontrolled way. All the countries are arming themselves. Everybody wants to prevent war, but it is all talk, talk, talk, and things take their course.

Now we will go on to section 10:

This had Zarathustra said to his heart when the sun stood at noon-tide. Then he looked inquiringly aloft,—for he heard above him the sharp call of a bird. And behold! An eagle swept through the air in wide circles, and on it hung a serpent, not like a prey, but like a friend: for it kept itself coiled round the eagle's neck.

"They are mine animals," said Zarathustra, and rejoiced in his heart.

Here something happens. Not many things happen in Zarathustra, but occasionally something does happen. We are informed that the sun is now at noontide. Why should Zarathustra mention this fact? Is the sun ever at noontide for Zarathustra inasmuch as Zarathustra is the wise old man?

Miss Wolff: No, it would not be for him—he is an eternal figure—but for Nietzsche it is.

Dr. Jung: Exactly. Here we have an example of how these things work practically. You see, Zarathustra the archetype is typically beyond time. His wisdom is beyond time. First of all, it is old like the world, and secondly, it is always looking beyond the given moment. In the descent of the sun he sees midnight, and at midnight he sees the sun rising, because that is the character of wisdom. As Till Eulenspiegel laughed like mad when he went uphill, and wept when he went downhill. People could not understand it, for wisdom is never understood by ordinary people, but to him it was perfectly clear. In going up he thinks of the descent and that makes him laugh. He rejoices in the idea that soon he will be able to go downhill. But when he goes downhill he foresees that he will soon have to climb again and he weeps therefor. And that is the nature of Zarathustra. So it is the man Nietzsche who discovers that he is at the noon of life. He was born in 1844 so he was just thirty-nine when he started to write Zarathustra, and that is the noontide, the beginning of the afternoon. In his case, it was of course particularly important to see that, because he had only six years left before the atrophy of his brain began in 1889.<sup>8</sup>

Now he discovers his two animals, which were formerly explained as symbols of instincts. Usually the eagle, as an animal living in the air, has the quality of spirit, because spirit is understood to be a winged being, like an angel, a floating volatile being, or like the subtle body of a ghost, a revenant. Birds live on top of the highest mountains where nobody can go, or travel through the air, and that is always characteristic of the spirit; to become spiritual one must rise out of the depths of heaviness, fast, and lose weight. And the snake is the symbol for the heaviness of the earth. It has no legs; it cannot jump or fly, but can only creep on its belly in the dust of the earth. And snakes often live in holes and in rocks, and some are nocturnal animals, uncanny. They lead a hidden existence and are met with where you expect them least. So the snake would be a symbol of the earth, for things chthonic. More psychologically, the eagle is like thought, a messenger of the highest god; thought is also understood to be a winged being and a product of the brain, which is on top of man, on top of the world. It is Mount Meru where the city of light lies, the light of consciousness.<sup>9</sup> While the snake, on the other side, chiefly consists of a vertebral column, and is therefore a personification of the lower motor centers of the body, of the spinal cord and the corresponding centers of the brain. As a personification of the physiological instincts, it is also associated with sexuality, or with the low instinctive cunning of the primitive or animal mind of man.

Zarathustra sees those two animals together, representing pairs of opposites, because spirit is always supposed to be the irreconcilable opponent of the chthonic, eternally fighting against the earth according to the dogmatic idea and the idea of old philosophies in general. For, wherever you go in the world, if you compare the highest philosophical views of a certain period, say two thousand years ago, you find that nearly everywhere people came to the same conclusion: namely, that matter is low and bad, and spirit is good and beautiful and high—and that matter ought to be subjugated by spirit, and not the reverse. And from this standpoint, you discover that we went through a peculiar development in Europe as a result of the idea which we invented, that spirit was mind, and that mind was dependent upon the brain and its functions. We built up a materialistic science, the philosophy of which was the primacy of matter, the predomination of the material principle. That is in contradiction with the vast majority of philosophical and religious views all over the world, but we cannot criticize these views properly because we belong to the same period of time. You see, that accounts for the fact that the development of art or science or philosophy, inasmuch as it was contemporaneous, has been along similar lines all over the earth. Even the Mayan or Aztec civilization developed, as far as we can make out, in a way that was parallel to the development everywhere else in the world. The classical periods in art are about the same in China as in Europe; Gothic art in China was contemporary with our Gothic art; and our Baroque and Rococo appeared at the time of the same development in China. These facts show that there tends to be a general synchronicity of events. So we can only say that in the last two thousand years humanity as a whole has passed through an age when the spiritual principle predominated over the material principle, or the eagle predominated over the serpent. And so we come back to our symbolism. You are probably impressed with the fact that the serpent has coiled itself round the neck of the eagle. What is the usual presentation of this symbolism?

<sup>8</sup> To Carl von Gersdorff, on Dec. 20, 1887, a year before his collapse, Nietzsche wrote, "My life has just now reached high noon: one door is closing, another opening" (N/Letters/Fuss). For Jung, "high noon" symbolizes the beginning of "the second half of life," the time of reflection upon life's meanings.

Mrs. Sigg: That the eagle has the snake in its claws.

Dr. Jung: Yes, showing that the spirit has overcome matter, or that the eagle, personifying the light, has overcome the powers of darkness or the devil. For instance, you remember having seen the so-called lecterns in churches, sort of reading-desks on which the Bible is supported by an eagle. The eagle is the symbol of St. John the Evangelist, whose philosophy is the idea of the Logos, the word, or the light that comes from God and shines into the darkness of man. Antique fantasy ascribed the eagle to John because the eagle was the messenger of Zeus, the god of the sky, the messenger that comes from heaven, the personification of light. Therefore, the symbolism on the lecterns, where the word of God as given to us in the Bible comes down to the earth supported on the wings of the eagle. Now, the eagle is in a way predominating here, he carries the snake but not in its claws; the snake is coiled round his neck. How do you like this picture?

Mrs. Crowley: In the Mandaean Book of John<sup>10</sup> there is a very defi-

<sup>10</sup> The Mandaean (Manda: knowledge) Gnostics were those from Mesopotamia. Adam and Eve were "incited to transgress the orders of the creator by the Savior Himself, who says, 'I manifested myself in the form of an eagle, upon the Tree of Knowledge . . . in nite picture of the eagle coming down as the messenger of God, but making obeisance to Myria; he becomes her messenger, so he is really the messenger of earth there.

Dr. Jung: That is the Gnostic idea, but this is a further development of the Gnostic symbolism. We won't go into that now, nor into the eagle symbolism in alchemy. Nietzsche had no knowledge of Gnosticism nor of medieval philosophy. He was a classical philologist and therefore had a profound contempt for anything later than the year one; his paradise was between 600 and 100 B.C.

Mrs. Jung: Does the snake symbolize the instinctive side of Zarathustra the archetype, too? Does it belong only to Nietzsche the man?

Dr. Jung: Well, that is a question. As far as I know we have no proof that the eagle and the serpent played a particular role with Zarathustra himself, but it is a fact that Zarathustra was a philosopher or teacher whose aim was to establish the predomination of the spirit. In the centuries before Christ we find traces everywhere of the effort to make the spirit predominate over matter. So one could say Zarathustra was already such an eagle, overcoming the earth principle. Now, the question whether the eagle and the serpent symbolize the instincts of Nietzsche is just what I was asking. How do you like this symbolism, where the snake appears to be coiled round the neck of the eagle? This is a very unusual formulation, not at all classical; as far as my knowledge goes, it is usually wriggling in its claws, overcome by the eagle.

Mrs. Baumann: We have seen the picture of Nietzsche as man being overcome completely by the figure of Zarathustra, but this seems to be almost the opposite picture; it is as if the snake were going voluntarily, or as if Nietzsche were going voluntarily with Zarathustra.

Mrs. Mehlich: I think it is a bit paradoxical. The eagle is the master of the situation. He lifts up the serpent. But on the other hand he may be overcome.

Dr. Jung: You think it is rather dangerous for the eagle to have such a necktie? It is. I would not like it.

Mrs. Brunner: It is dangerous for the serpent too: it might fall down.

Dr. Jung: Well, if he clings to the neck of the eagle he won't fall down, but it is not a pleasant situation. I don't think the serpent likes such airplane stuff.

Mrs. Strong: Is it again the symbolism of suspension before rebirth?

Dr. Jung: There is surely the motif of suspension in it.

order to teach them. . . . " Jean Doresse, The Secret Books of the Egyptian Gnostics, tr. Philip Mairet (New York, 1960). See "The Secret Book of John," p. 207.

Miss Wolff: The image is to me disgusting. Nietzsche says the serpent hung on the eagle, “not like a prey but like a friend.” That is horrid sentimentality, for those two animals just don’t go together; they don’t make a union. It is very much against what they would do in reality, so that must be considered too in the image. It is a very paradoxical situation.

Mrs. Sigg: I think, as Nietzsche was the son of a Protestant minister, he surely would remember that no other animal in the Bible was under a curse; the snake got a special curse from the creator: Thou shalt go on thy belly. Nietzsche is always inclined to react against such things and to say the opposite, so this opposition might have been in the thing too.

Dr. Jung: That is a good point. Of course, the most impressive thing in this picture is that the snake is lifted up out of her usual abode into a medium in which it depends entirely upon the good will of the eagle. It is a hellishly uncomfortable situation. After a while the eagle will certainly become very hungry and eat the snake. You know the secretary bird—who looks exactly like an eagle only the legs are a bit too long—is the classical eater of snakes. There are many eaglelike birds, in fact, that are the typical enemies of snakes. So the snake is in a very precarious situation and Mrs. Baumann is quite right when she points out that it is really the image of Nietzsche’s own predicament. He is just lifted out of the ground, and as a material man, as a man of the earth, he is in the power of that enormous bird. The eagle is the archetype, you see; the wise old man is the wise old bird. The Hamsa, the swan, has lifted him up. Then there is a classical parallel which we must not forget, because Nietzsche is a classical philologist. What is it?

Miss Wolff: Ganymede.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that beautiful boy who was fetched by the eagle of Zeus to serve at the table of the gods—a homosexual interlude, one of the little scandals of Olympus. So Nietzsche the man is surely portrayed in this picture, and we always notice the personal influence in symbolism when something is not according to rules, not quite right. In this case it is surely not quite right that the snake is coiled round the neck of the eagle. The snake might have a fantasy and squeeze his neck so that he couldn’t breathe, which would be very bad for both; it is most risky, it could go wrong in many ways. That is substantiated by the subsequent remarks of Zarathustra, namely: “More dangerous have I found it among men than among animals; in dangerous paths goeth Zarathustra.” He finds his peril in the wrong place; he is afraid of the perils amongst men. Of course there are relatively small perils among men; the perils among beasts, particularly one's own beasts, are much greater. But he feels the danger-tension manifested in this peculiar symbolism.

Now, as Mrs. Baumann has also pointed out, the serpent is here represented as a friend of the eagle, and that would be explained from the personal side as a demonstration of the fact that the relation between Nietzsche and Zarathustra is a friendly one. He doesn't feel as if he were the victim of Zarathustra; he feels the claws of the eagle as a loving gesture, so one could say that the serpent, by free will, coils or embraces the neck of the eagle. This would indicate that it is not at all a hostile situation, but a union, a reconciliation obviously. The fact remains, however, that the snake is carried up into the air, away from its usual abode, and this would be the man Nietzsche carried off his feet by the Hamsa, the bird of the archetype, and he doesn't defend himself against it. On the contrary, he gives himself voluntarily to that kind of travel. As we were saying in the beginning, it is the attempt at a journey in the air, not a journey under the sea; whatever flies through the air is visible. It is absolutely in the open, while a night journey under the sea happens in darkness and is invisible. So in a way, if looked at from the personal point of view of Nietzsche himself, this vision of Zarathustra is really what Nietzsche also might see and, confronted with the facts, he would ask himself: "Now why does Zarathustra see that picture? What should it convey to Zarathustra-Nietzsche?"

You see, the instincts always come up from the unconscious and give us a hint, perhaps in a dream. For, suppose I am identical with an archetype; I don't know it and the archetype of course won't tell me, because I am already possessed and inundated by the archetype. If it is the wise old man, he will seek only to express himself, and the human instrument he is actually using, say in the year 1883, doesn't count at all. It might be any other century, any other man, any other instrument. Just as I pay no attention to the hammer I use; I use it and afterwards I throw it away. It is not a personal hammer. That is the way the archetype uses man, simply as an instrument, as a tool of a most transitory kind. We make a fuss about our lives, but nature makes no fuss whatever; if nature likes to wipe out several million people she quietly does so. In a war we wipe out the best of men by the million. Well, that is quite natural, that is war. We can do it because we are used by an archetype: people are all possessed and wiped out by each other. And that is what nature does. So the man Nietzsche counts precious little to the archetype. He just happens to be the tool. But the man is of course in an awful situation. He is possessed, and he cannot defend himself, for he doesn't even know that he is possessed, and that is a wonderful opportunity for the unconscious. Inasmuch as everyone has instincts, the archetype of the old man is not the whole unconscious. It is only one of the many inhabitants, and therefore there are other helpful spirits or powers about, which will appear. So if a man is possessed and does not know it, he will have perhaps a dream which tells him something, or something will be shown to him which elucidates the situation.

To a man like Nietzsche, for instance, a dream will appear which contains this image of the eagle and the snake. If such a case should happen in reality, I would explain it in this way: the light of heaven, the eagle, the divine word has caught you; naturally, how could you resist? So you gave yourself to it. But you must know that it is exceedingly dangerous; we don't know how it will turn out in the future. I should say it was a precarious situation for that serpent—probably less for the eagle, because the serpent is chiefly under the illusion of friendship. You see, if the eagle were under that illusion, he would have been persuaded by the serpent to stay on the ground and to hop about while she crept up and sat on his back. He would have to hop along carrying the snake—or some other grotesque arrangement could be thought of. But it is clearly the serpent that follows. It is Nietzsche who follows the insinuation or the intimation of the archetype and is carried into the air. That is ekstasis; it is the typical miracle of levitation. These things happen in stories of the saints; during the mass, while they are praying before the altar, they are suddenly lifted up: it is a real ekstasis.

Mr. Baumann: Professor Rousselle showed us symbols like that; he had a whole series of small Tibetan mandalas, and one was a serpent with huge wings flying up into the sky. And in the next picture the serpent had disappeared and there were only the wings left flying to the sun.<sup>11</sup> That is a picture of ekstasis.

Dr. Jung: You bring the discussion to the motif of the plumed serpent, Quetzalcoatl, the Mexican symbol of the so-called savior god. The plumed or feathered serpent is a union of the bird and serpent, but a sort of organic union: the serpent is flying and creeping at the same time. We would call it a dragon. The Chinese idea of a dragon is also very much like that. It is an exceedingly chthonic and aquatic animal, and then it takes to the air and becomes fiery. We also have legends of flying dragons, sort of feathered serpents.

Mrs. Crowley: And there is the Hindu idea of the cloud serpent that fertilizes the earth.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is also usually represented with wings. It is, of course, an attempt at the reconciliation of the pairs of opposites, as this vision is also, and as such a symbol would be if it occurred in a dream. But here the serpent is too much on the side of the eagle, flying through the sky. Also I should criticize under all conditions this peculiar fact that the snake is coiled around the eagle's neck; it is again a sort of premonitory picture. I should not like it. It is not aesthetical, and it is not according to the rules. The artist Klinger made a bust of Nietzsche, using this symbol of the eagle and the serpent; the four corners of the bust were shaped like the claws of the eagle, and the eagle holds the snake in its claws.<sup>12</sup> You see he corrected Zarathustra's vision, as the artist does; he insisted that the snake was overcome by the eagle because they are eternal enemies. Whenever we encounter such a disturbance of a traditional age-old symbolism, we must always go back to the individual who uses it, and there we will discover that something has happened which, in a way, is unavoidable. It should happen, but the way in which it happens is not right.

Zarathustra's purpose is of course to cure the problem of the time: that is why the old man appears. As Nietzsche himself says, he took the figure of Zarathustra because the original Zoroaster brought the moral conflict into the world; and as the moral conflict is now at its culmination, he must appear again in order to do something to cure it. The pairs of opposites which were separated through the moral conflict ought to be brought together again. So that image is really Zarathustra's attempt to bring them together. "Beyond good and evil" means beyond eagle and serpent and their moral meanings; by that formula, Zarathustra is trying to mend the trouble of our time.<sup>13</sup> The old moral dissociation has apparently lost its cosmic importance and a new problem has presented itself, the problem of the reconciliation of the pairs of opposites. Yet the body represented by the serpent is lifted up from the earth. How would you explain such a case?

<sup>13</sup> Nietzsche was by no means anti-moral in general but only anti-moral in the Christian, Buddhist, or any other strength-denying senses. He wanted to go beyond Good and Evil to reach the valid (as he thought) opposition, Good and Bad.

Mrs. Crowley: Inflation?

Dr. Jung: No, I would not call that inflation. When you have to solve such an important problem which is really new to the age, you will be tremendously influenced by the way in which this problem has been answered hitherto—that is the most probable thing. You hardly can get away from the solution proposed hitherto. And the solution that was proposed by old Zarathustra was: Let the spirit overcome matter, let Yang overcome Yin, and then the trouble will be settled forever, because the existence of matter will be wiped out. You see, that was the idea of redemption which really began in Persia, appeared to a certain extent in Egypt, and worked through Judea, particularly in Christianity, where hell-fire comes at the end of our days and the whole world is burnt up, everything that has been matter disappearing for eternity. Also it appears in the primitive Germanic religions, where in the end the ferocious wolf will appear and the world will be devoured by fire. The idea that the spirit would win out in the end was the way in which the problem was solved, which accounts for all the conclusions drawn by Christianity concerning the neglect or destruction of the body. To the saints, everything which was concerned with the body was low or vulgar. There were special taboos to prove the inferiority of bodily things; and everything that could be called mind or spirit was marvelous, good, divine.

In the course of the centuries, however, we made very much the same discovery which they made in China, where a printed letter or hieroglyph was holy—until they discovered that all sorts of obscenities, vulgar and evil things, could also be printed. But formerly everything, every scrap of printed or written paper was carefully preserved and protected as sacred; paper carrying the sacred letters should not be touched by the feet. We have the same notion; there are still people who think a thing is true because it is printed. We believe in the saving faculties of the mind, of the spirit. Our belief in science is the same thing: this is the truth, and reason and truth must save us in the end. This is our savior. You see, it is the same old prejudice. We don't know what truth is, and we particularly don't know how it works; we have only learned that sometimes a lie is as good as the truth. There is a play in America—not here unfortunately—where for twenty-four hours nothing is spoken but the truth, and it shows what the truth can do. If you tell the truth for twenty-four hours you create such a hell of a mess in the end that nobody can find his way out of it.<sup>14</sup> We have grown doubtful obviously; we are confronted with the problem: shall we tell the truth or maintain a certain illusion?—and we know cases where the illusion was surely better than the truth. Therefore we run into all sorts of collisions of duties; we should tell the truth. But it is much better to tell a lie in some cases, and then we are all at sea and there is a catastrophe. Perhaps we discover that what people call sin is sometimes exceedingly decent, or what other people call a virtue can be a most horrible vice—really an infernal thing, most cruel. So we are shaken by doubts, and have therefore begun to look at things from a different point of view.

For instance, formerly we thought it was a good thing to punish the criminal, but now we know cases where it is not a good thing. Or perhaps we know a criminal, and if we study him, we realize that in his situation we would have done pretty much the same. And people who are careful to avoid something which is not quite correct, quite marvelously get into an awful mess, while people who are not quite correct get along much better, and they are less offensive to human society than the correct people. Therefore, we cannot help being exceedingly doubtful as to the validity of those two ideas. Moreover, we know that what we have called matter, stuff, which we thought we could ridicule or despise, is just as spiritual as spirit, and spirit is perhaps as corporeal as matter. Even there we become exceedingly doubtful as to which principle we should give the greater value. So the sum total of all these doubts and deliberations has put us up against the question: How can that conflict between Yang and Yin, or between good and bad, spirit and matter, be solved? And it is more than natural, if we make an attempt to solve it, that we are strongly influenced by the values of the past.

It is most probable, therefore, that the eagle would take the serpent for a ride in the air; it is a concession, as Nietzsche's life itself was a concession. There is little difference between Nietzsche's life and the life of a saint; he forsook his ordinary life, and went into the woods. The woods were called Rapallo, the Engadine, Nice, and so on, but he was alone, a hermit. He lived entirely in his books. He devoted himself to spiritual practices, one could say, and he lost the connection with the world of the flesh. He really became a sort of modern saint; the spiritual side caught hold of him more than was good for the solution of his moral problem. For to solve the problem one must give equal value. We cannot say the side of the spirit is twice as good as the other side; we must bring the pairs of opposites together in an altogether different way, where the rights of the body are just as much recognized as the rights of the spirit.

LECTURE VI

Dr. Jung:

We were occupied last time with the symbol of the eagle and the snake, and we said that it was rather unusual and a bit abnormal that the serpent should be coiled round the neck of the eagle. They are usually represented as opponents and the eagle holds the serpent in its claws—it is the general idea of the conflict between Yang and Yin, or between spirit and matter. And as a rule, during the age of the fishes and perhaps earlier, reaching back to 2000 B.C., the result of the battle is that the serpent is overcome by the eagle: the spirit wins out against matter. But one learns from Chinese philosophy that that is not always so; it might be reversed. We are inclined to believe that the spirit is much better than the flesh, and that the flesh or matter deserves to be eaten by the spirit; but one comes across cases where it is rather doubtful whether that is commendable. One even concludes from certain experiences that it is not really desirable.

I have here two interesting cases where that symbolism of the eagle carrying the serpent round its neck was discovered by other people besides Nietzsche. The first contribution I owe to Mr. Baumann who is generous enough to let us see some of his pictures, where the fate of the serpent—or the achievement of the eagle—is demonstrated. It is the story of the relationship of the spiritual and the material principle as a part of the inner development, the drama intérieur. One can call it a sort of initiation process. Or one can also express it in a reversed way, that all the initiation processes we know from history or by experience are the external manifestation of a natural inner process which is always happening in the mind. And our dreams are like windows that allow us to look in, or to listen in, to that psychological process which is continually going on in our unconscious. It is a process of continuous transformation with no end if we don't interfere. It needs our conscious interference to bring it to a goal—by our interference we make a goal. Otherwise, it is like the eternal change of the seasons in nature, a building up and a pulling down, integration and disintegration without end. No crops are brought home by nature; only the consciousness of man knows about crops. He gathers the apples under the trees, for they simply disintegrate if left to themselves. And that is true of our unconscious mental process: it revolves within itself. It builds up and it pulls down; it integrates and disintegrates—and then integrates again. It is like the seasons, or the eternal sunrise and sunset, from which nothing comes unless a human consciousness interferes and realizes the result. Perhaps one suddenly sees something and says, "This is a flower!" Now we have reached something. But left to itself the process would come to nothing. You can see that in cases of schizophrenia. If you follow the dreams of a person who is definitely insane, you see the treasure growing up to the surface, almost to integration, and you realize that if in this moment that fellow could grasp it, or only lift a finger, he would have it and everything would be all right. But in the next moment it sinks down again for nine years, nine months, nine weeks, and nine days, and it is gone. Nobody can reach it. It is exactly the same in a normal person; there are the same revelations without any issue if the conscious doesn't interfere and grasp the treasure brought up on the wave of the unconscious. [Slides are shown.]

Mr. Baumann has looked in through the window and painted some of the pictures presented by the unconscious. Here is the eagle with the snake, and the figure of a boy is hovering over the water seeking the heart in the water. This is of course a particular case; the discovery of feeling in a man is a special problem. The heart in the water cannot be discovered as long as the snake is also in the water. To enable the boy to find the heart, the snake has to be brought up into the sky or the air. If the two are together, then the heart is the heart of the snake, the feeling is identical with the snake. Therefore, Yin must be taken out of its element, the cold, waterlike condition of the unconscious. Afterwards follows a fight between the eagle and the serpent as of course they are not on good terms with each other.

An almost identical symbol exists in Indian mythology. Mrs. Zinno was so kind as to call my attention to the myth of the Garuda and the Naga, and I have here a picture of Vishnu enthroned upon the Garuda, the snake-killing bird. The Garuda is the mind bird, a sort of demoniacal eagle, usually represented with feathers and wings. The Nagas were probably not only serpent-demons; they may also have represented the snake worshippers, a lower stratum of the population, probably of Dravidian origin, autochthonous inhabitants of India who were uprooted or wiped out by the Aryan invaders.<sup>1</sup> The Aryans would be the eagles, the air, heaven people that fell upon the dark colored, rather primitive Dravidic population. Other autochthonous tribes also have such a chthonic form of worship: the Hopi Indians in America for example, who are not nomadic but town-building, or Pueblo Indians, the forefathers really of the Aztecs. The Spanish word pueblo means town; it comes from the Latin word populus meaning people, but has changed its meaning and become the name of a place where there are people. Those tribes are called Pueblo Indians simply because they build the villages in which they live. And the Hopi Pueblo Indians have such a chthonic cult of snakes. They even perform their snake dances in the Christian church, for they are also Christians. They have Christian Spanish names and receive the Catholic baptism. But they always retain their Indian names as well, which are important on account of their mystical meanings. So something similar may have been the case in India; those Naga people were probably snake-worshippers.

But the myth is of course purely psychological. It is the struggle between the air principle—the strength which is in the air, light, and wind—against the chthonic Yin principle represented by the serpent. The Garuda is said to have extinguished all the Nagas except one, which he put round his neck and wore as a neck ornament. You see, in this case it would not be an encumbrance, nor would it be a sign of particular friendliness. It would simply be a sign of his victory over the serpent. Now, it is a curious fact that the ladies of old Rome really used to wear in hot weather a living snake as a neck ornament—of course a harmless snake. The neck was cooled by the body of the snake, and the snake loved to be coiled round the neck of its mistress because her skin was warm. So the idea of the neck ornament was also a sort of fashion, and I can easily imagine that Rome was not the only place in the world where snakes were used for that purpose. You know, children like to carry their pets around with them in just such a fashion.

Now we will continue. In the last part of Chapter 10 he says: "More dangerous have I found it among men than among animals; in dangerous paths goeth Zarathustra. Let mine animals lead me!" This shows that he is not going in the path of the animals, which he thinks would be less dangerous, but means to go amongst men. His enterprise is of course dangerous, because through Nietzsche's identification with

Zarathustra, he is lifted up out of his element into the world of the spirit. If we forget that we also consist of living body, and try to live in an entirely spiritual medium, the body is going to suffer; and inasmuch as the body suffers the mind will be affected too. It is a terrible strain on our minds when we are not right with our bodies. The mind then becomes as overstrained as the body. So though he hopes that his beasts will guide him, it is very questionable whether they will. We often express such wishes when we are at bottom quite doubtful whether they will be granted. He would surely need the helpful animals in his enterprise.

When Zarathustra had said this, he remembered the words of the saint in the forest. Then he sighed and spake thus to his heart:

"Would that I were wiser! Would that I were wise from the very heart, like my serpent!"

You see, he suddenly remembers the old man in the wood who doesn't believe so much in spiritual enterprises, and has therefore withdrawn to the woods, which means to the animal, the Yin principle. Zarathustra doubts his way here. He feels that it is not particularly wise. It would need a great deal of wisdom in order to make it a safe way. He would need the wisdom of the serpent, the chthonic wisdom of the earth, but that he cannot contact when he is out of his body; when he is going with the Garuda bird he is necessarily hostile to the serpent. Therefore, quite logically after Mr. Baumann's picture where the bird is apparently carrying the snake in that friendly fashion, a very bad fight takes place between them, for they are like dog and cat. Of course there are certain examples where a dog and a cat have become friends, but those are domestic miracles; and a wild bird like an eagle and a wild animal like a serpent are never domesticated and no such miracle can happen. They are on different planes altogether and therefore hostile to each other. Now, with this pious wish the introductory chapter ends, and we come to the real text of Zarathustra.

Mrs. Baynes: May I just ask why Nietzsche identified pride with the eagle?

Dr. Jung: It is always a symbol of pride, but here it is a sort of interpretation. He was worried with that symbol of the eagle and the serpent. That came out of the original stuff in him, just as Mr. Baumann chose the symbol of the eagle and the serpent to express his inner experiences, as one would—as always has been done—therefore, the identity of these symbols. When Nietzsche is faced with such a problem he quite naturally will choose that symbolism. The serpent creeps on its belly in the dust, and the eagle flies on high, very marvelous and imperial, like the Prussian eagle for instance; so it is of course a symbol of pride. But that is psychologically absolutely insufficient. If he had gone further, he would have struck upon the problem of the relationship of spirit and matter, and then his Zarathustra would have taken an entirely different turn. He would have given body to Zarathustra. But it is just his peculiar attitude which doesn't allow him to take that experience of bird and snake seriously.

You see, you only begin to think decently about such symbolism when you ask yourself, why the devil a snake and a bird? Why not anything else? But he was so overcome by it that he didn't even wonder about it. We are all like that. There is a Christmas tree on the 25th of December. Of course! We all have Christmas trees. It is what one does at Christmas to give pleasure to the children. You simply float along on the Christmas mood. You wear a Christmas face and you have a Christmas tree because one has a Christmas tree: you are identical with that mood. But if you really ask yourself why the devil just a Christmas tree, you suddenly discover that this has nothing to do with the birth of Christ. There were no pine trees in Palestine, and there is not one single thing about it which has to do with Christianity. Yet we think it is the most Christian symbol. To this extent do people never think, never question themselves as to why they do such things—why that hell of a nonsense, the Easter hare and the colored eggs, and so on. In making a Christmas tree, one is not one but many. The mother who makes the Christmas tree is an eternal mother who for centuries has done that. Formerly, of course, they made something else I suppose, but always with the same feeling of the eternal figure. It is such a wonderful moment because it has always been so; you are in the olden time again. The great lure of the archetypal situation is that you yourself suddenly cease to be. You cease to think and are acted upon as though carried by a great river with no end. You are suddenly eternal. And you are liberated from sitting up and paying attention, doubting, and concentrating upon things. When you are once touched by the archetype, you don't want to disturb it by asking foolish questions—it is too nice. We are all like Parsifal when he sees the Holy Grail. It is too good, too marvelous—why should he spoil the situation by asking questions? The suffering of the old man is all right, as it ought to be. It is so good to be in the miracle; don't spoil it. So you become identical, naturally. And that is the way Nietzsche becomes identical; to encounter the old man, perhaps to be the wise old man, is such a great discovery and so sweet, that he doesn't stop to ask questions. He just slips into it and is gone without noticing it.

When the archetype comes up and touches you, you are gone in a wink. You become eternally valid. You can act and perform and it just goes on by itself. I always quote the story of King Albrecht who was murdered near Zürich at a ford where the river Reuss empties into the Aare. His suite, his nephew and several other knights, had made a conspiracy to kill him. They were riding behind him, deliberating whether they should do it or not, and they could not decide, for it was a crime, parricide. But the moment the king rode into the ford, which is the archetypal place of danger, the nephew pulled out his sword and said, "Why let that carrion ride before us?" And they fell upon him and killed him.<sup>2</sup> It was the archetypal situation, and therefore there was no hesitation. Then you can act, no doubts any longer. Then you are the dragon, and the murder must happen there; killing is indicated. Either you are the victim or you are the killer.

So when the old wise man touched Nietzsche, he did not bother when the animals came up. The Hamsa comes with soft wings and lifts one up and one doesn't notice it and then one is gone. But then naturally the animals are there; one becomes conscious of the presence of instincts which would inform one that the hamsa is a bird, not a man, and the snake rises and cries: "He is my enemy." And they could be helpful. Nietzsche could disidentify from the wise man if he listened to the cry of the eagle. That was a cry of warning. But being the wise old man, he knows all about it of course, and he interprets the eagle as his pride, and the serpent as his wisdom—it is like the Christmas tree. So the bird and the snake are no longer valid. They are interpreted according to what the old wise man might say about them. Through the identification with the archetype one falsifies the archetype and then it is no longer reliable. It is only reliable when one separates oneself, when one resists that temptation to the uttermost. That is the meaning of Jacob's fight at the ford with the angel of God. He fought against God in order not to identify with him; in that way only could he bring out the real meaning of the whole situation. To identify with the archetype is unavoidable under certain conditions, however; and Nietzsche's case was unavoidable. He did not know; it was his fate. In reading Nietzsche, one must always keep in mind that he was also a victim, and inasmuch as he was a victim he falsifies the true function of the archetype. The old wise man never would have talked in this way if Nietzsche were not mixed up with him. There is a lot of unrealized sexuality in Nietzsche. He was taken out of his body and had not lived a proper life.

Mrs. Baumann: In the last line, isn't the word folly one of those twisted, uncertain places where he could have had a hint of his situation?

Dr. Jung: Ah yes, because he really understands that his enterprise is folly—that is the wise old man. But Nietzsche himself does not sit up and say, “Why do I say ‘folly’? Is it because I am going on a fool’s errand with that book?” He plays with that word; it is a Christmas tree. If I had written such a passage I would have asked myself, “Now come, folly! What does that mean? Am I going to do something foolish?” I would have spoiled, of course, the whole joy of the ride, sure enough. But I am a doctor and that makes a difference. I am too little a poet.

Mrs. Sigg: I think behind the picture of the eagle and the snake there is really another picture which has a near relationship with it, the vision the lunatic saw which you have mentioned in your books, the sun disc with a pipe hanging upon it. That is quite a dangerous symbol, and it seems to me that it has something to do with this because Nietzsche said the snake was hanging onto the eagle, and Nietzsche was really identified with the sun in the beginning of Zarathustra.

Dr. Jung: No, I would not make that analogy. The vision of the lunatic is utterly different and has to do with this only in a very remote way. That has to do with the generative meaning of the sun. It is the sun generating the word in man, the birth of the soul from the sun; it is really a sort of antique vision like the analogies in the great magic papyrus, the so-called Mithraic liturgy, which is very clearly of antique origin. It is a concretization of the beginning of the Evangel of St. John, where it is said that the word is the light which shines into the darkness, the Logos.<sup>3</sup> We would go pretty far astray if we considered this a parallel. That was a case of dementia praecox where one cannot expect very modern symbolism; usually such people, particularly the uneducated ones, start from a medieval Christian level of consciousness and simply fall into the collective unconscious which then has a chiefly historical character, as our unconscious has when we first contact it. The unconscious first produces aspects of the historical symbolism which becomes modern or advanced, or anticipates the future through the interference of a definite consciousness.

Mrs. Dürler: I want to ask about the very last word. Why does he not say going upwards instead of "down-going?" Is it a premonition?

Dr. Jung: There may be a sort of premonition in it, but all through the introductory chapters he describes his movement towards the world as his down-going, his Untergang, which of course is also spoken out of the archetype, because the Hamsa is the bird of the great heights. And when the spirit comes into the world, it comes down. The Logos comes down from heaven to earth, and God descends upon the earth in order to be born. Yang is sun or light and is always above; if a reconciliation is attempted, the Yang principle comes down to matter, because matter cannot rise. And then it lifts matter up. In Christian symbolism this would be the transfiguration of Christ. He was in a state of levitation, thus showing how the spirit overcomes matter, how matter can be completely undone. You know, our mind begins with the downfall of antiquity, and it was first a theologically speculative mind, scholastic philosophy. We were all up in the air. We thought up the most abstruse things, absurd things really. We were only concerned with unempirical problems. Then, very slowly we began to discover nature. Albertus Magnus, although a Scholastic, made observations on nature in the early thirteenth century; he was interested in botany.<sup>4</sup> And through alchemy, chemical interests came in. Towards the sixteenth century such interests developed rapidly, and at the same time the Gothic style, where everything was vertical, began to spread out, and there was a sort of regression to antiquity because antiquity was nature. The horizontal movement began and they discovered the way round the world. India and America were discovered, and so on. It went on in this way until in the nineteenth century our whole point of view became realistic. That means that the light which was in heaven and a god on earth then went into the earth, into matter. One could say that Christ was then buried in the earth. Our mind, our whole mental development, wound up with complete materialism. The celestial world entirely disappeared and only a few idealists were left crying for help, for support for their shaking ideals; and with the war the whole thing tumbled down for good. But now we make an extraordinary discovery. What has the mind done in the ground?

Mrs. Baynes: The new physics has turned the ground into spirit.

Dr. Jung: Yes, the new physics has done the trick, exploded matter altogether, and the most recent development is reported in an article by a very modern physicist, in which he shows how modern physics becomes psychology; they climb in at the bottom of the collective unconscious.<sup>5</sup>

Mrs. Baynes: How did they get into the collective unconscious?

Dr. Jung: Through the fact that when you observe the phenomenon of the interior of the atom, you find that your observation disturbs the thing you observe; and if you go on observing, you observe the thing that disturbs, you discover the psyche.<sup>6</sup> They are now dealing with the telepathic phenomenon, namely, the fact that the collective unconscious—what I call the collective unconscious—is a factor which is not properly in time and not properly in space. Before long you will read that article on these questions in a very scientific paper. So the spirit that descended into the earth has exploded matter, and comes up again in the form of psychology. That is what the Garuda has done. The thing has happened which is always foretold in Chinese philosophy: Yin increases till it overcomes Yang. Yang disappears into utter darkness. It is completely gone. But then Yang is seeking the heart of darkness and overcomes the darkness from within, and suddenly out of the power of Yin appears the Yang again. That transition is also in the time calculation of China. In the time when everything consists of whole lines or Yang lines, suddenly towards the end of that period we get a new picture. Here we have full light, it is all Yang.  Then the first line of darkness appears in the next sign:  and so on, until there is complete darkness:  And then it begins again, the Yang comes up:  You see, we have reached that stage where everything is a derivative of matter, the Yin condition. But now physics has done the trick. The Yin condition is exploded and the first Yang line is appearing. There is no return to material matter now, no chance. It is completely gone. For the last thing you really can observe is the mind. You disturb whatever there is by means of your mind, and what you are able to disturb, you can observe: you can perceive your disturbance. As when you look into a black hole where you see nothing, after a while you see yourself.<sup>7</sup> That is the cognitional principle of the Yoga: you create the void and out of the void comes the beginning of all knowledge, all real understanding.

<sup>7</sup> Not, of course, the black hole or gravitational collapse of a star that has subsequently become known. Jung here describes the process by which the Yang hexagram changes into its opposite in the I Ching.

LECTURE VII

Dr. Jung:

I have still another contribution to the symbol of the eagle and the serpent. I happened to come across it in the Gilgamesh epic. It is a different kind of symbolism, yet the meaning is particularly clear. You probably remember the two important figures of the Gilgamesh epic. There is the hero Gilgamesh, two thirds of whose nature are divine and one third human. He is a sort of superhuman being with a tremendous spirit of power. In building his town, called Uruk, he forces everybody to join in slave work, so the women complain to the gods who proceed to do something about it. They create a peculiar counter-figure to Gilgamesh, a man of equal size and strength, also a sort of superhuman creature, named Enkidu. (These names are not quite certain because proper names are particularly difficult to decipher in the cuneiform character on account of not having the comparative material which they could accumulate for other words. Formerly, one read Gilgamesh as Izdubar, and Enkidu was read as Eabani. It was always explained as a sort of conventional rendering; they did not know exactly how to read them so they were named rather arbitrarily in order to give them a name.) That new creation of the gods was half animal, his hair long; he lived and fed with the animals, and he drank from the same water holes as the gazelles. He was caught by the aid of a hierodule, a temple prostitute. He is an inferior man, a sort of ape-man, a shadow but of equal strength. He simply personifies the inferior psyche of man. One could say that inasmuch as Gilgamesh represents the will, consciousness, the spiritual attitude, Enkidu represents the lower parts of the psyche as expressed in the sympathetic nervous system—for instance, by the lower centers of the brain and the spinal cord. It would be the motor quality of the mind, the corporeal or bodily aspect of the psyche. In contradistinction to Gilgamesh, there is a highly physical quality in Enkidu. He is very emotional and tremendously subject to moods and intuitions. He suffers from various conditions, and he has bad dreams or very intuitive dreams. There is even a passage where Gilgamesh puts Enkidu to sleep intentionally and asks the gods to give him a dream to advise them about one of their heroic feats—killing the terrible giant Khumbaba, who watches the mountain of the gods. Then Gilgamesh himself had a premonitory dream which showed him that he would in the end conquer that enemy, that inimical brother, who had been created by the gods in revenge in order to overcome him.<sup>1</sup>

Enkidu being overcome by Gilgamesh would mean, then, the lower mind or psyche overcome by consciousness and will, and thus it is a representation of a problem which in those centuries was, of course, of the highest importance to man. The myth itself is of a very great age. The form in which it is handed down to us in the Gilgamesh epic was established in the seventh century B.C. It was excavated in the so-called library of Assur-bani-pal, a king of that time. But there is ample evidence that it is of very much earlier date, probably about 2500 to 3000 B.C. This is before Hammurabi, the great law-giver of Babylon, who lived about 2000 B.C. That was the age of the second month of the great Platonic year, the month of Aries, the ram, and the dawn of consciousness took place at the beginning of the month before, the month of Taurus, the bull. Taurus is the spring sign, and it was also the springtime of consciousness, for we date consciousness from the time of written records.

You see, there can be no consciousness without continuity. If continuity is lost, consciousness is practically valueless; it is a mere representation of the moment. Without the continuity of memory, there are no means of comparison and therefore no possibility of judgment. That may be seen in people who have so-called progressive amnesia, where the memory fades so that there is no recollection of anything farther back than a few days. Also in senile atrophy of the brain or in general paralysis of the insane, where memory fails progressively, the unconscious condition is such that conscious judgment becomes utterly impossible on account of the lack of comparative material. One can only judge by comparing situations. If former judgments cannot be remembered, if nothing remains of consciousness but a little memory of present conditions, no judgment can be passed, and one feels that people in such a condition are practically unconscious. For instance, I remember the case of an old woman of about eighty. I called her by name and, as if offended, she replied: "But that is not my name. I am Miss Smith." She was many times a grandmother in reality, so I suggested that that was her maiden name, but she insisted that she was not married. "But you have grandchildren." "You are quite wrong. I am Miss Smith." Then I asked her if she had known Mr. So-and-So, which was the name of her husband, and she blushed but said she didn't know him. "But that is your husband." "Oh no, what do you think!"—and she became coquettish. "Don't you know him? Haven't you heard of him?" I asked. "Yes, I saw him the other day." "But how is that?" I said, "I thought he was dead." "No, no, he is not dead, and I am in love with him." "Ah! Will it be an engagement?" "Yes." I found out that she was engaged when she was not quite twenty, so her memory had faded down to nineteen years of age—she returned to that consciousness—and from there on backwards her memory was continuous, but all the later years were gone: she could remember nothing. She was of course unconscious; that a woman of eighty should have the consciousness of nineteen means that she is unconscious of her condition.

In those early days of history, therefore, it was important that the continuity should be established, that people should have a conscious memory. They should know how old they were, for instance. It is still a great difficulty with primitives to establish their age. I asked a girl in Africa of about seventeen how old she was, and she got very much embarrassed and said she was four. I was a hundred years old to them because I had white hair. Nobody could tell me his age because they cannot count years, which of course gives them a sort of unconsciousness, a lack of orientation about themselves. Now, in the past when enough people were able to count their years, to be thus far conscious of their continuity, they began to realize that humanity should have a continuous memory, that they should have written records, in other words. So writing was invented, and that was at the beginning of the first month of consciousness, the age of the bull, about 4200 B.C.; the oldest traces of writing we possess date from about that time. Soon after this, in about the third or fourth century B.C., would be the origin of the Gilgamesh epic. And there the divine mind is the one who has will and intention and energy and can dispose of his own libido, concentrate upon a work, having the ability of carrying a thing through in a reckless way. But he is an offence to the gods and they take their revenge in trying to break that Luciferian or Promethean hybris. So they invented the figure of Enkidu, which means that they caused the conflict to be personified in the man Gilgamesh, the conflict between his mind, soaring on high, and the lower inferior man in himself, Enkidu.

Now, those two heroes working together performed a series of tremendous feats for a while, but more and more Enkidu had uncanny dreams and suffered from his civilized condition—from his subjugation to his superior will, that is—and finally, immediately after their greatest triumph, he had this dream, which is on the seventh tablet. (The story is printed in cuneiform characters upon clay tablets which are actually preserved in the British Museum.) The German text says that Enkidu is reclining, resting after their deeds, and has these dream-visions. Whereupon he gets up and narrates them to Gilgamesh thus:

“Why have the great gods come together in council? Why are they planning my path? Oh friend, it was a peculiar dream which I saw and its end foretold misfortune. An eagle took me with iron claws and flew upward for four hours. Then he said to me: ‘Look down upon the earth, what seest thou? Look down upon the sea, how doth it appear to thee?’ And the earth was like a mountain and the sea looked like a small body of water. Again for four hours he flew higher and then he said to me: ‘Look down upon the earth, what seest thou? Look down upon the sea, how doth it appear to thee?’ And the earth was like a garden and the sea was like a water course in a garden. [An irrigation canal.] And again for four hours he flew higher and then he said to me: ‘Look down upon the earth, look down upon the sea, how do they appear to thee?’ And the earth looked like dough made of flour, and the sea looked like a trough full of water. Then he flew higher for two hours, and then he dropped me and I fell and fell and finally I lay upon the earth crushed. This is the dream, and hot with terror I woke up.” And when Gilgamesh heard the words of Enkidu his looks became dark and he said to Enkidu his friend: “An evil spirit will take thee with his claws, woe unto thee, the great gods have decided upon misfortune. Lie down because thy head is hot.” And Enkidu went to bed and a demon leaned over him, an evil spirit of fever took him by his head and he became delirious, and on the twelfth day he said to his friend: “Utnapishtim, the Lord of the living water has cursed me, oh my friend, like one who in the middle of the battle, curses his enemy. Oh my friend, whoever is slain in battle is dead. I was slain in the battle.”

You see, here we have that symbolism. The lower inferior man is taken by the iron claws of the spiritlike consciousness which is detached from the ordinary corporeal human being, and is carried up into the air very high, but in the end he is dropped and killed. This is exactly the fate of Zarathustra, or Nietzsche, as you know; this is the rope-dancer who behaves as if he could not fall, as if he were a bird upon the rope, winged, but he is pushed down by an evil spirit that comes upon him and he lands upon the earth crushed. Enkidu is of course a human figure, but he could also be represented by a snake, for the serpent symbol is a concretization of the inferior psyche. Inasmuch as it only reaches the lower ganglia of the brain, it is a sort of vertebral mind or psyche. You know, the brain is a relative conception; in former periods of the earth there were animals like the megalosaurians, for example, where the size of the lumbar intumescence of the nervous matter was bigger than the brain. The brain would measure about three inches in diameter while the lumbar region of the spinal cord was four or five times that size, which means that the brain—if you can speak of a brain at all in such animals—was in the lumbar region instead of in the skull. The psychical life was largely an accumulation of motor reflexes. Now, inasmuch as we have still a spinal cord we have a psyche, and it has a certain independence which is usually concretized as the serpent. Then the eagle on the wing is something like a representation of the brain, which is united in the center by that famous commissure consisting of fibers that spread out into the two hemispheres of the brain.

Many of these symbols are due to introspection, and that can go so far that inner anatomical formations, certain anatomical details, can be perceived by sensitive people. For instance, the Visionary of Prévost who has been described by Kerner, perceived by introspection the crossing of the optical nerve, the so-called chiasma which is behind the eyes.<sup>2</sup> Such symbolism is always peculiarly apt and expressive. You see, the most impressive thing about the snake is its elongated form, which is exactly like the spinal cord. And that the seat of consciousness, which is practically identical with the cortex of the hemispheres of the brain, should be represented as a bird, is also a very apt symbol, particularly because of the commissure which functionally unites them. That would be the body of the bird, because you don't feel the two hemispheres, you feel only one consciousness. The characteristic of consciousness is that it is a unit, a particular oneness; you have only one ego, you never think of having a double consciousness. Of course you can find that empirically—it is a pathological fact—but then you are astonished and speak of a person with a dual consciousness as remarkable; it is a duplicity of consciousness. The normal fact is the oneness of the conscious, and that oneness is the body of the bird, it is the commissure. Consciousness really has its seat—supposing always that there is such a thing as a seat of consciousness—in the commissure, the bridge that connects the two halves of the brain, as if the naive human mind had had an intuition of the oneness inside the two hemispheres. You see, you would not feel so much the actual anatomical detail, as we see it from without in the spreading wings or the two halves of a brain. Through introspection, you would get into a different kind of body, namely, into a living functional body that consisted, not of anatomical detail, but of the function of the brain; so you would get a different picture, not exactly of the brain, but of the functioning of the brain. It is of course a fact that the two halves do function together in such a way that you don't perceive that your brain consists of two parts. You are not in the least conscious, for instance, that your speech is chiefly directed by the left side of the brain; you think you speak out of the whole if you speak out of the brain at all. (Well, that is also a question you know; certain people don't speak out of the brain: some speak out of the heart, and some out of the belly.) So Enkidu would be a more developed form of the serpent, and it is interesting that when the gods saw that Enkidu had failed, they then made an animal, a horrible heavenly bull, which they sent against Gilgamesh. That means a step lower. It is also interesting that no serpent appears in the whole Gilgamesh epic until the end, when it finally defeats the hero. Do you remember what happens there?

Miss Wolff: Gilgamesh tries to find the plant of eternal life and finally does so, but then the serpent comes and takes it away from him.

Dr. Jung: Yes, in the end the serpent appears. Now after Enkidu's death, Gilgamesh feels a horrible loss; you see, he would then be in the position of a man who consists of consciousness only. And that is something which we feel in our civilization: we suffer very much from the fact that we consist of mind and have lost the body. So suddenly, when he is left by Enkidu, Gilgamesh begins to realize the fear of death. He says: "Now I also, I myself, shall die like Enkidu; my innermost is perturbed by pain, I grow afraid of death, and therefore hasten to the prairies. [He is riding over the prairies on his horse.] I take my way now to the powerful Utnapishtim, the one that has found eternal life, I hasten to reach him. When I see lions on the prairies in the night, I become fearful; I lift my head and pray to Sin, the moon, and to Nin-Urum, the lady of the castle of life, the luminous one among the gods. To her my prayers are going. Preserve my life unharmed!" You see, he feels instantly the lack of life and grows afraid of death. And that also is very characteristic of our civilization. You will find in studying the psychology of other civilizations that those people are far less afraid of death than we are. They take things in a different way; they don't put so much store on life as we do. To them, life and death are a matter of course; to us, it is awful that there could be such a thing as death. The white man in Europe is afraid of death because he has lost the body—he has lost his friend Enkidu.

Now, when everything else fails, the brain of man invents a way. Gilgamesh knows of Utnapishtim, the Babylonian form of Noah. (That is a myth of immense age, dating from more than a thousand years before the Bible.) Utnapishtim was a mortal who crossed over the waters of death and landed in the blissful western land where he lived the divine life as an immortal. And Gilgamesh really succeeds in reaching the western land where he finds Utnapishtim who gives him the herb of eternal life, a sort of pharmakon athanasias, a medicine of immortality; so he returns believing that he possesses the means by which to be immortal, thus cured of the fear of death. (The pharmakon athanasias means there exactly what the Host means in the Christian church.) But then the snake comes and steals the herb from him while he is sleeping, so death becomes inevitable. It is again the inferior man that takes his revenge; he must finally come down to him. So he is now dwelling in Hades, in the bowels of the earth.

That is a parallel to Zarathustra, so you can see what an enormous problem Nietzsche dealt with. It is a problem which has extended over thousands of years, the problem of the origin and fate of consciousness, which is absolutely synonymous with civilization, or with the psyche, or with human existence in general. For civilization is nothing but a widening out or intensification of consciousness, and the fate of increasing consciousness is threatening everybody. Now Mr. Allemann has just drawn my attention to the fact that the bird-form symbolizing the supremacy of consciousness is visible in other symbols which have very much the same significance; for instance, in the famous Egyptian symbol, the winged disc of the sun which was declared by Amenhotep IV to be the supreme symbol of the deity.<sup>3</sup> And another similar symbol is the ajna chakra, the center of supreme consciousness in the Tantric system of the chakras. There the division into halves is not anatomical, however; the two wings are two petals of the lotus, but the main value is still in the center. Ajna is the counterpart to muladhara where the god is absolutely dormant; he is there hidden by maya, the building material of the world, while in ajna he is white, radiant, which means that he is visible as supreme divine consciousness, detached consciousness which is not dependent upon illusion.

Well now, I think we can go on with our text. You know, in the introductory section of the Prologue there was a good deal of actual performance, showing how Zarathustra first liberates himself from humanity, and then from his own isolation. He returns to humanity and is then up against his real task. For then, of course, comes the question: What are you going to say? You know, he talked to the people before as if he could simply tell them, and he made the discovery that you cannot tell people. Of course, everybody says they want to be told, but if you try, you discover that you are wholly mistaken, for you find no ears, so you must find another way. And then it is as if he found that Christ also could not tell people; only the fishes he miraculously created found their way into the bellies of the people, not his words, so he had to be content with his twelve disciples. He had to make up his mind to find friends, helpers, who would take his meaning. That, of course, restricted the number of ears considerably, and moreover it brought about a peculiar necessity, which is also inevitable. You know, when a man is in the most fortunate condition of being able to say something which will be accepted by everybody, when he can tell something to a great crowd and they lap it up, then he is liberated from a certain most odious task which would come to him if he had only a few listeners. And what is that?

Miss Hannah: That he must understand and act upon it himself.

Dr. Jung: Well, the problem comes to himself, for they will look him over. When he appears before a public of two thousand pairs of ears, wearing a tail coat and cutting a very nice figure in the pulpit no matter what he says, then he can be what he damn well pleases. He only needs to be a voice and people lap it up and think he must be a hell of a fellow; and nobody sizes him up because the distance is too great. But if he only talks to a few people, if they are not complete fools or hypnotized, they will most probably size him up, and then he must not only tell them what he has in mind, he needs must be it—and that is, of course, very difficult. It is much easier to preach. Therefore, so many people preach in order to escape being. Therefore, we all want to be missionaries. You see, when a missionary goes to Africa he is, as we say, a stag. He has white man's clothes, he has chop-boxes, he has a watch, and so he is a great man, very good and wonderful; and he doesn't need to do anything: he is great from the very beginning. You feel like seven kings when you are in Africa, for you are royal. Those black children look at you with big eyes and naturally are tremendously impressed. If you pull out your watch, they stare at you and think you are a sorcerer; if you give them a pill they think you are a great doctor. But they don't think that here. It is the cheapest way on earth to fix up feelings of inferiority: when you live among an inferior crowd, you easily can be great. You see, you naturally start with preaching. If you have a good idea, you want to preach it. But then you discover that there are no ears to receive it, and because it seems as if somebody ought to get it, you feel that you must be the person and you apply the same principle to yourself: you begin to preach to yourself. And that is a very useful thing, which I advise every preacher to do. Go and preach Christ to yourself; that is where you should begin—you are the very first. For, the man who wants to preach is one who wants to run away from his own problem by converting other people. You may know that story of the negro who said he had a marvelous dream, which consisted of three letters, g.p.c. And he thought it meant: "Go preach Christ." He wanted to be a missionary with a tail coat and white necktie. But the other negro said it meant: "Go pick cotton."

So Zarathustra is obviously confronted now with that problem: if he wants to find friends he must be what he preaches, more or less. He must be real, because mere talk won't do it. And that forces the idea of transformation upon him, so the next part is devoted to that idea. The first chapter is called "The Three Metamorphoses." He says:

Three metamorphoses of the spirit do I designate to you: how the spirit becometh a camel, the camel a lion, and the lion at last a child.

Many heavy things are there for the spirit, the strong load-bearing spirit in which reverence dwelleth: for the heavy and the heaviest longeth its strength.

What is heavy? so asketh the load-bearing spirit; then kneeleth it down like a camel, and wanteth to be well laden.

What is the heaviest thing, ye heroes? asketh the load-bearing spirit, that I may take it upon me and rejoice in my strength.

Is it not this: To humiliate oneself in order to mortify one's pride? To exhibit one's folly in order to mock at one's wisdom?

In reading this you must keep in mind that he is talking to himself; it is a sort of admonition. He introduces himself thus to the idea of his task, as in a difficult situation you would say to yourself more or less unconsciously: "Well, you must realize that the strength of the spirit demands the heaviest burdens." Or, more likely, you speak like that to your friends in trouble: "You must make up your mind to deal with this difficult situation; yes, it will be a very heavy task. You will find it exceedingly tiresome." And so on. If you listen to your internal conversations, you will hear such things. Nietzsche brings this to the daylight here; it is a sort of dealing with one's own willingness, or with one's own unconscious wisdom. You see, every one of these sentences contains an important aspect of his own task. There is the idea, for instance, that the task means abasing or humiliating oneself, chastising one's pride. Nietzsche thinks what he is going to say might be something like folly, and probably it is good to mock one's own wisdom:

Or is it this: To desert our cause when it celebrateth its triumph?
To ascend high mountains to tempt the tempter?

Or is it this: To feed on the acorns and grass of knowledge, and for the sake of truth to suffer of soul?

That is the result of the emptiness of a new condition; when you get to a new point of view, you come as it were into a new country with no means of support.

Or is it this: To be sick and dismiss comforters, and make friends of the deaf, who never hear thy requests?

That is a doubt of the friends.

Or is it this: To go into foul water when it is the water of truth, and not disclaim cold frogs and hot toads?

Here comes in that idiosyncrasy from which Nietzsche suffered; he always was obsessed by the idea that he ought to swallow a toad. You remember he once told a lady at a dinner table of his dream that his hand was transparent—the sinews and nerves and muscles were beautifully clean and clear—and then suddenly a toad stood upon his hand and he had to swallow it. That idea often occurred to him: it is the expression of the loathsomeness of life, or of the lower man. Frogs and toads are a first attempt of nature towards making something like man—a most ridiculous, absurd attempt, of course—so they are symbols for human transformation. First there is the transformation from tadpoles, and then it is a tailless animal with arms and legs, and that, of course, impresses itself very much upon the naive mind. You know when a baby is in the bathtub the mother sometimes calls it in a tender way her little frog. The meaning of the frog to Nietzsche was of course the inferior man living in the swamp or mire. And it is quite clear that he feels the connection with that primitive man here, because he is going to face again the conflict with the interior man; it is still the same problem of the rope-dancer.

Or is it this: To love those who despise us, and give one's hand to the phantom when it is going to frighten us?

All these heaviest things the load-bearing spirit taketh upon itself: and like the camel, which, when laden, hasteneth into the wilderness, so hasteneth the spirit into its wilderness.

In this passage it becomes clear that the camel means a certain attitude which he should adopt in order to accept the heavy task. And it will lead him into the desert because, through its acceptance, his spirit will become like a camel that is meant to travel in the desert. It is an exceedingly frugal animal. It has that famous double stomach where it stores water and is therefore independent of water to a great extent; so it is needed for transport there. It is a sterile place where nothing grows, and where people are threatened by thirst and starvation. Translated into psychological language, it means a dangerous expedition which demands much endurance and strength, and where one is quite alone, deserted. That was so in reality. When Nietzsche published Zarathustra, instantly people began to squirm and pull away from him; only a few rather morbid characters cocked their ears. Zarathustra came out when Nietzsche was very much connected with Basel, and of course everybody spoke of it and I know what the reaction was then.

But in the loneliest wilderness happeneth the second metamorphosis: here the spirit becometh a lion; freedom will it capture, and lordship in its own wilderness.

Its last Lord it here seeketh: hostile will it be to him, and to its last God; for victory will it struggle with the great dragon.

What is the great dragon which the spirit is no longer inclined to call Lord and God? "Thou-shalt," is the great dragon called. But the spirit of the lion saith, "I will."

There is a theme in these passages referring to the camel which remains the same throughout. What is this characteristic idea, the thread which leads through all of these sentences beginning: "Or is it this?"

Mrs. Crowley: The opposites?

Dr. Jung: Well, there is always a question of accepting the opposites. We have to love those who despise us, for instance, or to shake hands with the ghosts that cause the fear, meaning the thing you would naturally run away from. Throughout, there is the idea of overcoming a resistance, accepting the thing which is loathsome, difficult, terrifying. But what does that mean—if you translate it into more psychological language, if you take it out of this moralistic style?

Mr. Allemann: The acceptance of one's own shadow.

Dr. Jung: Of course. It is the famous theme of the negative shadow, the opposite, the other side of the story. You see, consciousness is always the upper end of the pillar; the upper end is ajna and the lower end is muladhara, which is dark and in every way contrary to the clearness and radiance of complete detached consciousness. So he realizes here that he should burden his camel with a load which is very difficult to accept. One has to accept one's own negation, the side which is against one. Now, how does he come to such a conclusion? Well, you remember at the end of the introductory chapter, he realizes that he is going on a dangerous way where he will need guidance, and the old man in the wood, who withdrew from life, comes to his mind. But Zarathustra wants to go forward, so he is immediately confronted with the task of the time. And what is that? Is it that consciousness should continue to overcome more and more the shadow or the lower man?

Miss Hannah: No, it is accepting the animal, the lower man.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is the only thing possible. We have come to an end on the side of consciousness and will power and concentration and intention and so on; we cannot go on in the same course, so we must find something else. And we can only find that which is beyond all that characterizes the former condition, and naturally whatever is beyond or behind the present condition is the shadow; that is absolutely unavoidable if you step beyond our actual world in any way. Suppose, for instance, that you are a scientist and go in for further research; then you must go out of the known into the unknown, out of the light into the shadow. If you are religious or philosophical, and can no longer believe in the hitherto valid values of your life, you leave the recognized truth for the absolutely unknown. It would be easy to step out of a known truth if the other truth were already known, but it is just not known. There is nothing; you step into empty space and it is dark and cold. You touch nothing, you see nothing, nothing meets you; it is just as if you were emigrating from your own country to an unknown undiscovered land. That is what he describes here. He burdens his camel with the task of accepting the thing of which one is really afraid, for we are naturally afraid of the things we don't want to accept. But if you are through with the things you have believed in, if your life has become sterile, if your ideals don't feed you any longer, then you must make them something else, and that something else is what you fear—you step right into what you fear. In the Catholic church you have the light, the symbol—everything is provided for you—and if that is no longer satisfactory and you go beyond, into what do you step? Of course, you can step into Protestantism, but if you are born in Protestantism, what do you do then? Well, you can step into Buddhism, say, or theosophy, or something of the sort; and if that leaves you dissatisfied, what remains? Nothing but your shadow, all the things you don't like. And because there is nothing else, the darkness that is in you, round you, is the only thing you can see. Everywhere it is dark.

So Nietzsche mentions things here which might mean the regular food of science, for instance—the regular truth—and beyond is starvation. It may seem quite nice and beautiful here, perhaps things are fairly acceptable; then if you have to step beyond, you come to things that are unacceptable, inevitably: it is a sort of enantiodromia. Therefore, you should be very careful to declare yourself satisfied with existing conditions, because otherwise you burden the camel with the task of bearing you into the desert. If you are not satisfied with the porridge you eat at home, you have to eat sand in the Sahara. Now, if you have made up your mind to do that, you are something of a hero. Zarathustra is a hero. He makes up his mind to go into uncharted country where he is free, but quite alone. Yes, there is no limitation; you can do what you please in the Sahara and quite alone, but nothing will please you very much, not even yourself. When he has accepted that role of the camel, then he can travel into the desert. And there he is liberated from all restrictions; there he realizes that he becomes a devouring animal, a lion. When you step beyond a given order of things, you are naturally in the utmost freedom, but you are isolated; you can say you are god in your own desert, or that you are a victim. If you are courageous, you say you are the lord of your own desert. Nietzsche says he seeks his last lord there; he no longer wants to be a subject, he doesn't want anything beyond or above himself. He really wants to overcome everything by himself, even a god. So he will fight his last god, the great dragon. You see, God would be the last enemy, the last thing above himself; and God is the great dragon.

Then he asks: "What is the great dragon which the spirit is no longer inclined to call Lord and God?" And he explains that this dragon is

"Thou-shalt." That gives us the key, but it is really difficult to understand the symbolism. It is again a passage which one reads through smoothly without realizing what it means. You take it as a sort of speech metaphor which just slips down, and afterwards you don't know why you have some disturbance in your digestive tract. You don't know what you have swallowed. I read Zarathustra for the first time with consciousness in the first year of the war, in November 1914, twenty years ago; then suddenly the spirit seized me and carried me to a desert country in which I read Zarathustra. I did not understand really, but I made marks with my pencil at every place where I slightly stumbled, and I felt that it grated a bit when I went over the dragon. Something was not quite smooth there, but I didn't know what. There are still those marks in my German edition, and invariably I have found that these places are things that grate, that don't go down really. Now what do you know of this?

Miss Hannah: Is it not the need of the projected god, of the possibility of obeying?

Dr. Jung: Very much so. But can you explain it? Intuitions are nice but the human mind doesn't live on intuitions alone. Sometimes one needs more substantial food.

Mrs. Baynes: Could you not say that the Christian religion can be summed up as "thou-shalt" as it has been crystallized in the church, and "thou-shalt" will consume you if you pay attention to it?

Dr. Jung: Well, in a metaphoric way you can say that the principle of "thou-shalt" is characteristic for a certain mental attitude, which can become a dragon that devours you. But you can also say it is an avalanche which will finally cover you, or a flood, or an oppressive weight that will eventually crush you, or a lion that will eat you, or a tyrant. You can use any other kind of symbolism where one is overcome by "thou-shalt." So we must go a bit further; we must keep in mind that the dragon is a specific symbol and that Nietzsche has not invented that metaphor merely in order to express the idea that somebody was overcome. The selection of just that word was not a conscious intention of Nietzsche himself: it was an unconscious choice as it is in dreams. We never can assume that the dream says a thing quite accidentally and that it cannot be explained; that simply shows that one is only on the surface with one's explanation. One really ought to understand why that symbolism is nothing else, why the symbol the unconscious has chosen is the very word which should be pronounced in that place. So we must put the question: why does he say dragon?—why would not anything else do equally well? That predominating "thou-shalt" could be expressed in many different ways; the dragon symbol gives some characteristics which ought not to be overlooked.

Mrs. Baumann: Are there not two “thou-shalts”—the dogma of the church and the inner law of the self? The dragon would be coming up because Nietzsche does not see that it has another significance in the personal individual law of “thou-shalt.”

Dr. Jung: Well, we cannot assume that there are two “thou-shalts” here; it is a psychological truth that anything can say, “thou-shalt,” and we speak chiefly of a traditional “thou-shalt” and the individual “thou-shalt.” But Nietzsche makes no such difference here. Only we have an indication in the dragon of another power which one cannot connect with the “thou-shalt” of the Christian church.

Mr. Baumann: I think the dragon means the entire past, because he is a mixture of animal, fish, amphibian, all kinds of things.

Dr. Jung: Yes, the dragon is a mythological monster.

Mr. Baumann: And out of the past comes this “thou-shalt.” Whether it is Christianity or another belief does not matter—anything—but out of the past comes a command and he opposes this. The lion spirit says: “I will, I don’t care what the dragon says; it is not what I shall do but what I will do.”

Dr. Jung: Yes. Well, the situation is this: he obviously tries to establish a condition in which he is free to say, “I will,” over against that “thou-shalt.” And that “thou-shalt” is put equal to the dragon, and the dragon is equal to God; and naturally he means the God of the Christian church. When the priest says “thou-shalt,” he surely means to speak with the voice of God, for where would he get the competence to say that otherwise? Only God’s law can say “thou-shalt”; it is a superior command, which must always come from an authoritative source. The authority of the church and the authority of the Holy Scriptures are the word of God, and he compares that word of authority to the dragon.

Mrs. Zinno: Is it not the power of the archetype?

Dr. Jung: It is an archetypal figure, a monster sure enough, but why is it expressed by that archetype?

Mrs. Baynes: Could it not be that he is making again one of those cycles that he likes to make? For instance, in the Christian tradition St. George killed the dragon and that time the dragon was Satan. Now he says God has become Satan.

Dr. Jung: Exactly. It is an enantiodromic cycle. The thing which has been good has become bad, the thing which has been true has become untrue. Now when he makes that equation: God “equals” the dragon, the dragon "equals" "thou-shalt," he is affirming that the standpoint which was considered the supreme moral principle and identical with God has now become Satan himself. For a dragon is the leviathan in the sea according to the Book of Job, or the devil in hell. Satan is an old dragon, a destructive power. In other words, it means that the authoritative principle of the church, or the principle of any traditional morality or ethics or conviction, has become a devil to us. So this God has transformed into the old dragon. You see, the dragon is specific symbolism because it is the counterpart of God; the dragon with us is definitely a symbol of evil. Of course, it is not so in China; there the dragon is the symbol of heaven.

Mr. Baumann: I don't understand why you limit this dragon to Christianity. It can be any traditional power.

Dr. Jung: Yes, but we must reckon with Nietzsche. To Nietzsche the idea of God is essentially Christian. He was a parson's son, and wherever you find passages that refer to God or anything spiritual, it always means a kind of Protestant Christianity. That is quite definite. You know, anybody with a mystical understanding of God never would say "thou-shalt." It has nothing to do with the life of the spirit. All mystics have, therefore, entirely different conceptions of God. I can tell you a funny story about a cousin of mine who suddenly had qualms about his life and went to consult the son of old Pastor Blumhardt. You know Blumhardt was a famous man in his day. He once healed a case of spirit possession, a very interesting case. And the son continued the ways of the father and was the spiritual medicine-man for all the theologians of my set and my time. Well, my cousin had a very bad conscience and made a full general confession, told Blumhardt all his sins. Then he looked at him expectantly and thought now the lightning would descend upon him, that the great man would say something. And the great man said: "Do you really think God takes notice of your dirt?" That was all he said. You see, he had a different conception of God; to him God was not at all "thou-shalt," but something entirely different.<sup>4</sup> This "thou-shalt" is always a codified divine word. It is traditional morality which is of the devil.

Once before the war I treated a Lutheran pastor, a pretty hard analysis. He was very typically theological, and I did not know what would become of that fellow. Then the war came and I did not see him. After the war, I met him again and asked him how he was getting along with the church, and he said: "Oh, of course the church is the work of the devil, but if you want to live you must even make use of the devil." Now that was a parson! You see, he very much believed in the living god that is not a "thou-shalt" in that sense: he is not codified. But anybody who is on the standpoint of an artificial code of morality, who thinks that people only keep in form on account of "thou-shalt," will naturally identify the principle of "thou-shalt" with God. Then God is nothing but a taskmaster, or a ruler that helps one to make straight lines, something hard and stiff and unnatural, but nothing living. In the case of that Lutheran pastor the real reason for his neurosis was a great inner rebellion against that principle of the straight line, and the devil got loose in him and literally raised hell with him. He fought me like the devil himself, but finally he came round. He left before he could tell me what had really happened, and also it was not clear to him. It took him a year to digest everything he had heard in analysis, and then he slowly worked round that terrible block and came to the conclusion that neither the decalogue nor any other code of morality could be identified with God. Most theologians know exactly what it is all about. They tell you that God can only be good and such damned nonsense. They deny his omnipotence therefore.

Well, Nietzsche says "thou-shalt" is the name of the great dragon, and over against that he tries to acquire the quality of the lion, the royal animal that says "I will." He creates a new moral standpoint; over against the traditional prison which only creates unfree immoral creatures, he invents a responsible morality, the morality of the ego that says: "I will"—and takes the responsibility. Of course, he does not mean a sort of arbitrary, meaningless wishing or willing: he means a will or a decision which includes responsibility. You know, Nietzsche was not a mean mind or an absolute fool. He was a highly gifted man, and you can see on every page of Zarathustra that his morality is a thousand times sharper than the traditional morality of the pulpit. A thief that is in prison is not less a thief because he cannot steal; let him be the cashier of a great bank and see what happens. If he doesn't steal then you can say he is probably not a thief. So "thou-shalt" is a sort of prison where people hold to a certain rule, but are always thinking: "If I were rid of that rule I would do God knows what!" They never know what they would do if they were free. There is no morality, no moral decision, without freedom. There is only morality when you can choose, and you cannot choose if you are forced.

LECTURE VIII

Dr. Jung:

I have brought you today a picture from the Mythology of All Races where the Garuda is represented with a human body and a bird's head and wings.<sup>1</sup> And also a design taken from the Dresden Mayan Codex, where there is a Garuda and a serpent; it is a time symbol as well. Now we spoke last time of the dragon, and the text goes on:

"Thou-shalt" lieth in its path, sparkling with gold—a scale-covered beast; and on every scale glittereth golden "Thou shalt!"

The values of a thousand years glitter on those scales, and thus speaketh the mightiest of all dragons: "All the values of things—glitter on me.

All values have already been created, and all created values—do I represent. Verily, there shall be no 'I will' any more." Thus speaketh the dragon.

We have already seen that the dragon is a symbol of the deity, a form of the god, and here we see that it is when the god, the living spirit, has become a "thou shalt," a system of values, that it appears as a dragon. In this case, it would not of course be like the Chinese idea of the dragon; it would be a negative form because with us the dragon is a sort of serpent, an unfavorable animal. It is not the bird, the unfolding into the two wings or hemispheres. It represents, rather, the lower parts of the nervous system. As soon as a god becomes a system of values, it is a sort of codified god, an institution, a church building, a printed book, or a series of prescriptions. Thus, all life has vanished from the deity. It is caught in images and rites, in values and in laws. Of course, the more the institution prevails, the less there is life; and above all, the more there is "thou shalt," the less there is freedom.

Without freedom there is no real morality; there is only law abidingness, more or less complete obedience based upon the principle of "thou shalt." And this is not ethical; it is called morality but surely it is not real ethical responsibility.

Now Nietzsche's revolutionary ideas, of course, go right against this dragon that slowly eats up every new decision, every new responsibility, until it is all-powerful. Therefore, the dragon in mythology always represents the thing which must be overcome or killed in order that something may be liberated; it is always guarding a stolen treasure which really should belong to man. Then the hero has to overcome the dragon in order to liberate the treasure. So a very frequent myth is the virgin sacrificed to the dragon or guarded by him, and rescued by the hero, as in the story of Perseus and Andromeda.<sup>2</sup> The treasure, like the virgin, is a symbol for value and life. And the virgin would be an anima symbol, meaning that the anima is caught by a system of values incorporated in the dragon; she has lost her freedom. Or the dragon guards the jewel that has been lost, the jewel being the symbol of the innermost value of man, individuality or the self. That myth is to be found nearly everywhere in the world. The great jewel in Buddhism, the mani, is of course of Brahmanistic origin; it was originally the magic jewel which was hidden in the sea and then brought up to the surface by the gods. Buddha himself is called the mani, as in that famous formula: Om Mani Padme Hūm.<sup>3</sup> This humming sound is exceedingly primitive and we are always much impressed, but never understand what the Hindu really means by it. Recently, however, it came to my mind in connection with the very peculiar sound primitives make to express assent or admiration. If I said to a negro: "How do you do?" or "Look at that nice child," he said, "Mmmm." You can hear that sound also when you stand at a window and see a particularly nice girl passing by. Or when you eat something that is especially good—so you always say to children, "Mmmm, isn't it good?" That most primitive sound, which mankind has probably forever produced in primitive circumstances to express admiration, is surely this mystical sound: "Mmmm, such a jewel! Isn't it beautiful?" So Om is one of the titles of

<sup>3</sup> Sometimes, transliterated Aum, Om is of course the most sacred and potent of words, deserving of intense meditation and regarded as equivalent to the self. Jung tells elsewhere the story of how at the feet of the Bodhisattva there grew an immense lotus. Stepping onto the lotus he scanned the world. Hence the Tibetan prayer: "Behold the jewel in the lotus." CW 6, par. 298.

Buddha, the jewel in the Lotus, who would be a representation of the self, as Christ is most clearly a representation of the self, the greatest value.

Now this value is hidden in the dragon, inasmuch as it is replaced by the principle of "thou shalt." Whenever an external law assumes higher authority, then the self in man is the hidden treasure, then the anima is sacrificed to the dragon, and then the world waits for a hero who will fight the dragon and force it to render up the treasure it has devoured. Here, Nietzsche obviously feels what Paul felt when he spoke about the freedom from the law of the children of God. Paul says that the law is overcome, that we are not children of the servant but of the free man; we are as if freed from slavery. We have overcome the law because higher than the law is love. There are several quite wonderful passages in the Epistle of Paul where he praises the new condition which follows the overcoming of the dragon of the law. His hymn to love, for instance, is a sort of triumph; and that is also expressed in the famous passage where he triumphs over hell and death. You see, that is the fight against the dragon and the subsequent feeling of liberation, together with the feeling of apokatastasis, the restitution of the original state, in which man is the redeemed child of God, enjoying the eternal freedom of the deity. To Paul, this was of course quite literally the liberation from the law, the institution, as Christ was understood as a fulfilment of the law. He overcame the law by fulfilling it and going beyond into a state of freedom.<sup>4</sup>

This is of course a sort of amor fati: what one understands must be, one will do because one wants to. One says "I will" freely, not forced by "thou-shalt" which is mere authority that may be perfectly meaningless. For nobody can invent a law or system of authority which can be followed under all conditions. You can have very wonderful laws, yet remain utterly immoral. No penal code has ever produced moral beings: "thou-shalt" is only a sort of rail which helps you to keep straight when you are wobbling. But you have learned to walk straight only when you can walk without a rail: only then have you learned the true obedience and responsibility. As long as you walk between two high walls where you simply cannot deviate, there is neither freedom nor responsibility nor any other particular virtue; you can be quite drunk and still you walk straight. You simply cannot go in a zigzag when you are walled in. Now, that condition of a safe road with safe walls may prevail during many hundreds of years in an established civilization, but a time will come when those very walls fall down, and then we suddenly need the dependence upon ourselves. Everything becomes questionable, and we need a guidance within because external values won't give it to us. Then the stability of the world is based solely upon our own reliability, the safety in ourselves.

<sup>4</sup> "There is therefore now no condemnation for those who are in Jesus Christ. For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has set you free from the law of sin and death" (Romans 8:1-2). "And (an angel) laid hold of the dragon, the serpent of old, who is the devil and Satan, and bound him for a thousand years" (Revelation 20:1-2). The "Hymn to Love," I Corinthians 13, Jung movingly cites in the conclusion of MDR.

Mr. Baumann: Kant points out very clearly that there must be freedom in the philosophical decision.<sup>5</sup>

Dr. Jung: Of course. One cannot imagine a morality without freedom of decision. As we were saying last week, the imprisoned bank-cashier, who doesn't steal because there is nothing to steal in his cell, is not moral. Let him have his freedom, let him have his millions every day, and if he doesn't steal under such conditions, one can be sure he is not a thief. Well, these are the ideas Nietzsche is dealing with here in symbolic and poetic language. Naturally, when there is such a body of laws, it has the tendency to develop more and more, to increase its weight and size until nobody is left who could possibly say "I will." Everything then is duty, "thou-shalt." Such a condition can last a long time if everything goes smoothly, but if the whole building should be shaken by an earthquake, then there would be nobody there with an orientation from within, nobody who would have the reliability which comes from freedom of choice. Now he goes on:

My brethren, wherefore is there need of the lion in the spirit?
Why sufficeth not the beast of burden, which renounceth and is reverent?

To create new values—that, even the lion cannot yet accomplish:
but to create itself freedom for new creating—that can the might of the lion do.

To create itself freedom, and give a holy Nay even unto duty:
for that, my brethren, there is need of the lion.

That means that one needs the strength of the royal lion to be able to say nay to one's duty, to negate that "thou-shalt." It is a sort of sacrilege not to obey the given laws and to do something according to one's own wits on one's own responsibility, to put one's own law, in other words, above the given law. But any creator is forced to do so; any creation in the last analysis is immoral because it breaks a tradition—it is a criminal act. Whenever I discuss these matters with theologians, I say we never should forget that Christ really was a criminal, and in our days also he would be a criminal. It would not be an offence if we should break the taboo of the sabbath, but in those days the dragon said: "Thou shalt observe the sabbath day, and if you don't you are cursed." Christ broke several laws and therefore he was executed. He belonged to the lowest stratum of the people. The whores in the days of Christ were in no way mythological; they were no better than our prostitutes. If you were to meet Christ anywhere in Zürich, it would be in Niederdorf in a saloon. When he spoke about the adulterous woman, he really meant an adulterous woman. We always forget that Christ was an illegitimate child and Mary was an immoral woman; we paint everything with gold. That is the institution, the glittering scales of the dragon. In reality it was a poor miserable thing, in no way respectable. So all that we have made of it is the golden scales of the dragon; there Nietzsche was quite right.

Mr. Baumann: Nazareth was even a place of very bad reputation.

Dr. Jung: Yes. "What good can come out of Nazareth?"<sup>6</sup> We would say such a man could not be good on account of the awful conditions in which he lived. But that was Christ's origin, and he was not merely unconventional, he was a breaker of laws. So we can understand that Nietzsche needs such emphatic words, and to give a holy "Nay" even to duty in order to create freedom for himself. "Therefore, my brethren, there is need of the lion." It needs the royal courage and the royal character of a lion, apparently, to be able to say nay to one's duty, for it means to be courageous enough to do something which is against order and against the law. Later on, you will find the particular psychology of the antinomic point of view. You see, a bit of the Gnosis comes in here; Nietzsche is not consciously influenced by the Gnosis but unconsciously all the more. The Antinomists were a particular set of Gnostic moralists who were convinced that you could not be redeemed without having sinned. If you commit no sin you cannot be redeemed naturally, because there is nothing you could possibly be redeemed from; therefore, in order to be redeemed you must commit sins.<sup>7</sup> As a <sup>6</sup> "And Nathanael said unto him, Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth? Philip saith unto him, Come and See" (John 1:46).

Catholic must commit sins in order to have something to confess. The priest who takes your confession will admonish you that you ought to confess something; surely you must have committed some sin somewhere. So conscientious people often put down everything they have done on a little sheet of paper, an unkind word to so-and-so for instance, and work up artificial notions about it all. Of course, they do not think of their real sins, because they have no particular feeling for them—they live in them. A man who lives in sin has no feeling about it, no relation to it. He only knows certain offences against laws, which to other people would not be sins at all. Without freedom and responsibility one even loses one's sense of sin, one only knows that one has offended against the law. The more an institution prevails, the more one comes back to the standpoint of the late Egyptians who, in their confession, said: "I have not stolen the goods of the orphans, I have not robbed the widow, I have not cheated the tax collectors of the Pharaoh." But of what they had done they said nothing; that was simply indifferent. Naturally, if one can keep straight just by not giving offence, one lands with the conviction that one can do anything as long as it is not noticed.

People really think like that, only it is of course very crude to say so; sophisticated people would not admit it. Their standpoint merely comes from the fact that they have walked between walls; there are certain police regulations against which one must not offend, and otherwise everything is all right. I remember an instance. When I was travelling to America one time, I sat at a table with some New York business men who never in their lives had even seen a book, not to speak of reading one—quite nice, illiterate people. One man took a fancy to me, so one night after dinner he said: "Say, you are a pretty wise-looking chap. I want to ask you something. I know a fellow who has been married for twenty-two years and has six grown-up children, and the other day he fell in love with a girl. Now should such a fellow divorce or not?" "You mean yourself?" "How did you notice that?" "Well," I said, "if you should marry the girl, then what about your wife? What do you do with her?" "Oh, that is simple. I am regularly married by law and I can divorce by the law. That is O.K., and then I can marry the girl." I said: "That is perfectly true, but consider that this woman has really been your wife for twenty-two years, and you have had children by her. Then by law you simply give her the slip. Do you think trary, were strict ascetics who required of their followers a literal interpretation of Christ's strictures and living example.

that this is very human? Haven't you any kind of relation to your wife besides the law?" He said he never thought of that, and the next day he was not so sure whether he could divorce her. You see it would all be in the regular way, the law could have nothing against him, so he would come out perfectly white. No human consideration whatever. Of course that is utterly immoral: it is just "thou-shalt." When he goes to heaven, he will say "I have not," and then we shall see whether Peter opens the door or not. He might. Therefore, heaven is so terribly boring.

To assume the right to new values—that is the most formidable assumption for a load-bearing and reverent spirit. Verily, unto such a spirit it is preying, and the work of a beast of prey.

He puts it very strongly, a beast of prey. In our society it is criminal to break the law, to give offence, and one cannot create new values without giving offence, that is perfectly plain.

As its holiest, it once loved "Thou-shalt": now it is forced to find illusion and arbitrariness even in the holiest things, that it may capture freedom from its love: the lion is needed for this capture.

But tell me, my brethren, what the child can do, which even the lion could not do? Why hath the preying lion still to become a child?

Innocence is the child, and forgetfulness, a new beginning, a game, a self-rolling wheel, a first movement, a holy Yea.

Aye, for the game of creating, my brethren, there is needed a holy Yea unto life: its own will, willeth now the spirit; his own world winneth the world's outcast.

Here I think it is clear why Nietzsche needed the lion to symbolize an attitude which can break laws. It is the royal self-will, it is the antinomy.

Mrs. Baynes: You did not finish saying how Nietzsche was influenced by the Gnosis.

Dr. Jung: Oh, by the antinomistic point of view that one must break the law, must give offence, otherwise there is no redemption. The so-called Enkratites are the opposite. The Antinomists are law-breakers, and the Enkratites are those who abstain from everything, so that nothing happens. They simply keep everything at a standstill; nothing is done, not even a sin. They are also called the Continentes.<sup>8</sup> They hold everything in, storing up life so that nothing can happen. The river is blocked up and no water flows. Nobody can say that something evil has been done, because nothing has been done. Now here we come to the transition from the lion to the child. Why should the lion transform into a child? And what does Nietzsche gain if his attitude is child-like instead of like a rapacious lion?

Miss E. Taylor: He wouldn't think so much of "thou-shalt" and he would be open to the new thing that will come. The lion only finds the old thing.

Dr. Jung: But the lion can say "I will"; he is royal.

Miss E. Taylor: Yes, but the lion cannot choose the new thing. But the new thing will come and he must have a childlike attitude to see it.

Dr. Jung: You mean a child is the absolutely creative thing. Yes, the passage immediately before tells us that even the lion is not able to create new values. He is only able to create for himself freedom for a new creation; for this his strength is sufficient. As a rapacious beast of prey, the lion can tear down and destroy, on account of his great strength he can break through barriers, crash through a hedge, break into a herd of cattle and cause a stampede. He can upset things thoroughly, but he does not create anything new. Nietzsche realizes here that it needs more than mere destruction to create new values, a new attitude is needed. And the new thing is now symbolized as a child, an innocent and oblivious child, a new beginning, a play.

Then he uses a very peculiar symbol here, a self-rolling wheel; it is of course a literal translation: das aus sich rollende Rad is better because it means a wheel that is moving out of itself. The center of the impetus of the wheel being in itself, it is self-creative. And Nietzsche means that the attitude of the child is self-creative. You see, a child is in a state of development, still growing, and it is able to nourish itself, to help itself in its growth.

Mr. Baumann: I don't see creation in the symbol of the child as much as an unspoiled and unprejudiced attitude towards everything which is coming.

Dr. Jung: Yes, provided that the thing for which one is waiting, under such conditions, is really coming from the outside. But outside is the dragon. A mere childlike attitude which is expectantly waiting for something invites dragons. Therefore, the child must be self-creative in order to put something into the place of the dragon that has been overcome; it must create a new subjective, individual value. And for that the child must be playful. It must be like the creator of the world that played with world fantasies until they became. The child is always creating a world of its own; in its play it creates new values. New worlds never come from the outside because there are no worlds outside: there is only an old dragon.

Prof. Fierz: Is not what Mr. Baumann means, the saying of Christ that we must become like little children in order to enter into the kingdom of heaven?

Dr. Jung: But that is not exactly what Nietzsche means. You see, the innocence and oblivious nature of children causes a peculiar lack of prejudice which does not preclude new experience. This is, of course, absolutely indispensable for a creation, but even so something must be produced from within in order to make an experience a new one. For the new thing is not to be found outside; the world outside is just the world in which we have been, and if anything new comes into this world, it must come from within. Of course, in order to be able to create we must not preclude new experiences: we must be open to them. You see, that is what he means by the wheel rolling out of itself, moved by itself and not by external conditions. As soon as the wheel is moved by external conditions it is "thou-shalt"; then somebody has given a kick to the wheel to make it roll. But Nietzsche's idea is that a child can move out of itself. It will be creative because the condition of the child, even the physiological condition, is creative.

Now, the symbolism of the wheel suggests of course a mandala. In other words, this argument—the camel, the lion, and the child—is obviously the expression of the process of individuation, for which the universal dragon is killed. Then all the general laws are obliterated, and you must have values of your own for your orientation. You must have a guidance from within, and for that you need the attitude of the child in order to be humble and obedient, and not conceited, not having better ideas, so that you can obey the impulses that come from within. You are then like the wheel that moves out of itself. And that wheel is the sun symbolism, it is a mandala. The wheel has not only been since time immemorial a symbol of the sun, the sun itself has been a symbol—that wheel which moves over the sky with nobody moving it, the wheel moving by itself. So the sun has forever been a symbol of individuation, a symbol of the man who can stand by himself and move out of himself without being pushed.

With primitives it is the rarest thing to find initiative. Usually only the chief or the medicine man have initiative, and they are recognized to be the great inventors or promoters of the tribe. The ordinary man is lazy, inert, exceedingly conservative, and does things only inasmuch as his fathers and forefathers have done them; he will not move unless he is kicked into action, and it takes a great deal of kicking to make a primitive active. I told you the story of what one must do in order to send off a letter carrier. And also the story of the ceremony of the Australian bushmen to make men angry, to kick them into action.<sup>9</sup> Nobody is excited when a man has been killed, so they have a special ceremony which will insinuate rage into them; only then can they make up their minds to do something about that murder. Then they get their weapons and gather together, but if by chance they don't find their enemy that day, they go home and the war is finished. To excite them again, one must again have the ceremony for making men angry. But that hardly ever happens; if they don't find the enemy they go home, and nothing is done. Well, we come now to the end of the three metamorphoses:

Three metamorphoses of the spirit have I designated to you: how the spirit became a camel, the camel a lion, and the lion at last a child.—

Thus spake Zarathustra. And at that time he abode in the town which is called The Pied Cow.

There is this one reference to the city called "The Dappled Cow."<sup>10</sup> Have you an idea about it?

Mrs. Crowley: Is the cow not in a sense the counterpart of the camel? It is also an enduring animal, patient, but instead of carrying people to the desert, it would be more the physical side that gives nourishment, that carries them more into the body, as it were.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is quite possible, but we must try to find out in what sense Nietzsche used the word and in the next chapter, "The Chairs of Virtue," the text says: "But I think of what I have done and thought during the day. Thus ruminating, patient as a cow, I ask myself: What were thy ten overcomings?" Very often when you encounter a rather striking word, you find it again in a different connection; it is as if that word cow had been coming up from the unconscious, hovering below the threshold of the conscious, and then coming up again after a while in a new connection. That sometimes helps one to elucidate the meaning of a word. So I think one should lay stress here upon the rumination. The cow is to him chiefly a patient and ruminating animal. And that refers to the general theme of the next chapter, which is sleep. Now, the city is called "The Dappled Cow," so the city would be particularly representative of the good sleep which comes from a good conscience. To what town would that refer?

Mrs. Fierz: To Basel!

Prof. Reichstein: The cow plays a great role in Persian religion; there is a myth about the first cow, as there is about the first man.

Dr. Jung: That is true, but I rather think we have here a very local reference on account of that association with the ruminating cow. You see, the chairs of virtue are to found in Basel, and this particular chapter has little to do with Persia. It is not so far away.

Miss Hannah: He wrote it at Sils Maria and there are a fearful lot of cows there.

Dr. Jung: Well, many people from Basel go to Sils Maria, and he went up there from Basel, you know! I think if we assume that this town refers to Basel, we are not far from the truth, because in this chapter he says something which strikes right into the eye of that good old town. They believe very much there in traditional morality, and on account of that there is little real morality. There are rails, and it is just another rail that at the time of carnival there are none. It is like marrying and getting divorced according to the rules. The pigsty is well locked up during the whole year, but during carnival time the doors are open and because it is according to the rules, nothing can be said against it. And at that time, the beginning of the 80s, it really was ruminating on the values of the past. Not very long ago there was an article in the newspaper here about Gibbon, who, when he was living in Switzerland, went to Basel and was much impressed by the fact that the people there were still living in the time of Erasmus. That was in 1755 or thereabouts, but the same thing could have been said in 1870 and '80 and '90.

Prof. Fierz: We have a proof. Jakob Burkhardt, when he was inspired, always played the same song by Schubert and always wept at the same parts.

Dr. Jung: Yes, tremendous conservatism and a particularly rigid set of values. If you gave no offence you were accepted; you were right—just by giving no offence. That was the best you could do. If you did better it was worse: one should not do better. Now, Nietzsche lived in that atmosphere, and he spoke like that right in the face of his Faculty, his department at the University, and to Jakob Burkhardt for instance, and the other important people. That surely took the better part of his available courage. No wonder that immediately after such heresy, we come to a chapter dealing with the Chairs of Virtue, which would be very much the university set of people against whom he was speaking; and in that chapter we find an apology for the opposing powers.

Miss E. Taylor: I think cows are very inquisitive animals and interested in one's ideas.

Dr. Jung: They occasionally even eat hats!

Miss E. Taylor: So I think it refers to the chapter where he was ruminating—through this rumination he got all those ideas about the camel.

Dr. Jung: Oh you think he was the dappled cow lying in the meadow and ruminating his ideas about the camel. But that must have been a pretty restless sleep; otherwise, he would not have used such emphatic words. You see, when you are going to break through centuries of respectability, you surely cannot compare yourself to a ruminating cow. It would have to be a mad, stampeding one, breaking through all regulations. You must put yourself in the place of a poor professor at Basel University who had to say such terrible things. After this book, they said he was mad. Jakob Burkhardt got a chill when he touched it; he squirmed away from the awful thing. They didn't know when that fellow would be going crazy. Not that they would have been able to diagnose insanity in that book—not even alienists in those days would have been able to do that—but the ideas which he expressed gave them a sort of cold fever because the unconscious began to stir in them. They felt the coils of the snake in their own bellies. It gave people a feeling like something creeping up the spine, a sort of cold Kundalini feeling<sup>11</sup>—quite naturally, because their world of values was threatened. Therefore, for decades to come, if anybody committed suicide they said, "Oh, he has read Nietzsche. Those are the Nietzsche ideas. Of course, when one reads such books the world must go to hell." One heard that sort of thing in the world war; the German psychology was explained by Nietzsche. As if German politics were due to Nietzsche! Hardly any of them had ever read his books. Nietzsche had a thoroughly bad reputation, not on account of his aphorisms—nobody with a certain amount of médiance will have anything to say against those—but he will have a hell of a lot to say against Zarathustra. For Zarathustra is an exceedingly decent book, while the aphorisms are partially méd-isanee, partially malevolent; everybody will quote certain aphorisms with a chuckle as a sort of bon mot, like "the great Chinaman of Königsberg," meaning Kant. You can stand such things. They don't disturb your sleep. They give you a good digestion.

But reading Zarathustra is upsetting because you don't understand it. You read smoothly through the chapters and lap it up as a sort of poetical metaphor, and you don't know what you are eating. You swallow sugar-coated pills with all sorts of poison inside. Most of the people who read Zarathustra never bother to go into the detail in order to make out what is really said, so they get a revolutionary thing into their unconscious without noticing it. Therefore, all respectable people must have a natural reaction against it, and if you ask why, they always quote something quite wrong. They cannot keep his actual words in mind. Zarathustra is difficult to keep in mind because it becomes associated right away with the unconscious. That happens to me sometimes: I remember that Nietzsche's Zarathustra has said something—now what is it? And then I find I have quoted it wrongly. It is associated with my own unconscious because it came up from that dark place.

I think we can now end this chapter about the metamorphoses and go to the next, where we have a new movement. Zarathustra as a whole is a sort of enantiodromic movement, it is the river of the unconscious and the chapters are like pictures of the waves of that underground current. I assume that Nietzsche sat down every day and wrote out the river that flowed into his consciousness, and thus he represented what was going on in the unconscious. In a certain way Zarathustra is written like Joyce's Ulysses, but Joyce wrote from the conscious material and Zarathustra was written from the unconscious material.

People commended unto Zarathustra a wise man, as one who could discourse well about sleep and virtue: greatly was he honoured and rewarded for it, and all the youths sat before his chair. To him went Zarathustra, and sat among the youths before his chair. And thus spake the wise man:

Respect and modesty in presence of sleep! That is the first thing! And to go out of the way of all who sleep badly and keep awake at night!

Modest is even the thief in presence of sleep: he always stealeth softly through the night. Immodest, however, is the night-watchman; immodestly he carrieth his horn.

No small art is it to sleep: it is necessary for that purpose to keep awake all day.

Ten times a day must thou overcome thyself: that causeth wholesome weariness, and is poppy to the soul.

Ten times must thou reconcile again with thyself; for overcoming is bitterness, and badly sleep the unreconciled.

Ten truths must thou find during the day; otherwise wilt thou seek truth during the night, and thy soul will have been hungry.

Ten times must thou laugh during the day, and be cheerful; otherwise thy stomach, the father of affliction, will disturb thee in the night.

Few people know it, but one must have all the virtues in order to sleep well. Shall I bear false witness? Shall I commit adultery?

Shall I covet my neighbour's maidservant? All that would ill accord with good sleep.

And even if one have all the virtues, there is still one thing needful: to send the virtues themselves to sleep at the right time.

That they may not quarrel with one another, the good females! And about thee, thou unhappy one!

Peace with God and thy neighbour: so desireth good sleep. And peace also with thy neighbour's devil! Otherwise it will haunt thee in the night.

Honour to the government, and obedience, and also to the crooked government! So desireth good sleep. How can I help it, if power like to walk on crooked legs?

He who leadeth his sheep to the greenest pasture, shall always be for me the best shepherd: so doth it accord with good sleep.

Many honours I want not, nor great treasures: they excite the spleen. But is it bad sleeping without a good name and a little treasure.

What do you think about this? Could you confirm it? Or have you any argument against it? Is anybody sleeping badly here?

Dr. Schlegel: It is doubtful whether it is meant seriously.

Dr. Jung: Oh no, it is not doubtful. It is obvious that he makes fun of the teachers of such wisdom. For Zarathustra does not seem to be in favor of such teaching, so it sounds as if his speech had a double bottom. Now, if you criticize these thoughts carefully, can you contradict them? Don't you think it is perfectly good sense? For instance, "A good name and a modest treasure." Is that not a welcome thing to everybody? Or: "Sleep is no mean art." Well, if you suffer from bad sleep you think good sleep is something marvelous; you would give anything to have a good sleep. Then, "Ten times must thou laugh during the day and be cheerful; otherwise thy stomach, the father of affliction, will disturb thee in the night." That is perfectly true; a good laugh moves the diaphragm which is very healthy for the stomach, good for your digestion. Then, "Ten truths must thou find during the day; otherwise wilt thou seek truth during the night, and thy soul will have been hungry." Or, "Ten times must thou reconcile thyself again with thyself; for overcoming is bitterness, and badly sleep the unreconciled." What is better than to be reconciled to oneself? Then you are at one with yourself and sleep well. And, "Conquer yourself." Sure enough, we have to conquer ourselves many times every day; without that nobody could live decently. He would be unhappy and have a sleepless night and have to overcome himself then—so better do it in the daytime. That brings on wholesale weariness and is like opium to the soul. That is quite true. Is it not perfectly sound teaching?

Mrs. Crowley: It is not exactly lionesque.

Dr. Jung: But very wise.

Miss Hannah: It is very much what he said about the last man. He is again objecting to the ordinary man in himself which was his downfall.

Dr. Jung: That is true. It is almost the same voice speaking exactly the same kind of thoughts. And we have encountered that voice in another place, not the voice of Zarathustra or Nietzsche, but the voice of a certain wise man, a professor of good sleep.

Miss Wolff: The old wise man.

Dr. Jung: Yes. He says, for instance, not to bother about human beings; one had better return to the woods and worship one's god with the voices of animals. So this teacher also says very wise things. And if you remember that Nietzsche himself suffered very much from sleeplessness and always had to use drugs in order to sleep, you understand what secret passion is revealed in this chapter. He went to the lectures of that famous professor of good sleep because he himself needed it very badly. Then there is a possible psychological explanation for Nietzsche's sleeplessness. What would that be?

Miss Hannah: He identified with the spirit which did not need any sleep.

Dr. Jung: That would be the consequence; it would not be a psychological cause. Though of course one might identify with the sleeplessness of the spirit, and that would lead to the idea that one didn't need sleep. There are such fools. They think that people in the future, through diet and training, will come to a condition in which they can get along without sleep. They think that would be a sign of the progress of man. They train themselves to have only two or three hours of sleep, or one hour preferably, but when they come to no hour they are dead. That is the identification with the spirit. But what would be the real cause for the sleeplessness?

Mrs. Stutz: It is coming from the unconscious.

Dr. Jung: Of course. One of the most ordinary causes of sleeplessness is the agitation of the unconscious; it is like a stormy sea.

Mr. Baumann: He did not realize what he was writing, so the unconscious got overcharged.

Dr. Jung: That would be the primary cause; when moved as he was when he wrote Zarathustra, his unconscious would be just seething. Moreover, if he listens to his unconscious, if he is more and more forced to pay attention to the things which come surging up, he will associate himself with the unconscious too closely. And then there is always the danger, as the wall between the conscious and the unconscious becomes thin, with holes here and there, that there will then be no real defence against that movement. The unconscious may then break through those holes and cause peculiar conditions in the conscious. One finds very often in people who come into a sort of collision with the collective unconscious without knowing what is happening to them, that they get a hole in the partition through which the unconscious can come through, like a sea that washes in and out. And naturally they don't know what it is. That happened to Nietzsche because he did not know what it was; he tried to catch it, yet it caught him, and the evidence is his identity with Zarathustra.

Mr. Baumann: Does this happen to analytical patients?

Dr. Jung: Oh yes, that is a particular danger of analysis which one should not undervalue. If one touches upon an unconscious which is full and ready to burst forth, one may cause a most terrible explosion—insanity really. Whenever one finds traces of an unconscious in that condition, one must handle the case with the utmost care. It is exceedingly dangerous.

Mr. Baumann: I remember Professor Heyer showed a picture of such an explosion.

Dr. Jung: Yes, those fiery bulls breaking through a barrier. He was so frightened that he overlooked the fact that there were very positive signs in it which showed that the thing could be reconstructed. But if he knows the danger, a man can lose his nerve. It is a shattering experience. I never had such a case, happily enough [knocking wood]. The unconscious bursts forth and you cannot stop it; it is awful, just running away. I tried to stop such a case which had been handled by an inexperienced lay analyst; I came across something like an abscess which ran out and the man finally committed suicide. I could not stop it. Another time, a young woman doctor came to me in despair and asked if I would take over a patient as if I had analysed the case, so that she would be free of the responsibility and people would think he went crazy under my care. We weighed that out and I decided that my back was strong enough to carry it, so we put him into a lunatic asylum after a while, and I saved that woman's reputation. She had just started her work as a doctor and it would have caused a great scandal. It was, of course, carelessness that she had analysed such a case at all, but one needs a great deal of psychiatric knowledge in order to recognize the condition. You see, the analyst is able to carry such a responsibility; he can say the person was crazy when he came but didn't know it. It is a general prejudice that analysis makes people crazy. Send a patient to Burghölzli and the layman will assume that the doctors there made him crazy—or even that he was sent there for the purpose of being made crazy.

Sleeplessness, then, has its cause in the unnaturally agitated unconscious which is excited through new ideas. Of course, that would not happen to a person who was dull to the experience of his time. Such an unconscious would be only mildly excited and quite settled by several glasses of wine or any other nonsense. But Nietzsche was exceedingly sensitive to the spirit of the time; he felt very clearly that we are living now in a time when new values should be discovered, because the old ones are decaying. For no sooner does a doubt become obvious than the symbol is gone. If even one man dares to confront the church, to argue with its authority, a sensitive person is done for if he cannot refute his argument. He realizes at once that the whole system is gone, because there is one tiny hole in its authority. If it no longer works, then God has become vulnerable, and all the life has gone out of it. Nietzsche felt that, and instantly, naturally, the whole symbolic process that had come to an end outside, began in himself. Then he had that terribly tense, threatening unconscious, and it began to wear the partition wall thin, to break through here and there. And that, of course, upsets the sleep. So naturally he looks back with a certain regret upon a time when he could sleep, when he was not bothered.

I once discussed certain psychological problems with a professor, a very good Catholic, and he said: "I don't see why you should bother about such things. If anything is doubtful or problematic I simply ask my bishop and he tells me all about it, and if he perchance should not know, he writes to Rome where they will tell him what he ought to think about it. There they have the authority; for two thousand years the most intelligent heads in the world have studied these problems. Why should I imagine that I can settle them? I am not a specialist." And so he has, I am sure, a very good sleep and a very good digestion; he is not disturbed because there is not even the tiniest hole in the authority. But that was not so with the poor man Nietzsche.

LECTURE IX

5 December 1934

Dr. Jung:

We began last time the sermon called, "The Academic Chairs of Virtue." You remember we discussed its wisdom and came to the conclusion that that professor of the virtues was by no means stupid, that the sermon contained very commendable truth. Now we will continue:

A small company is more welcome to me than a bad one: but they must come and go at the right time. So doth it accord with good sleep.

Well, also, do the poor in spirit please me: they promote sleep. Blessed are they, especially if one always give in to them.

Thus passeth the day unto the virtuous. When night cometh, then take I good care not to summon sleep. It disliketh to be summoned—sleep, the lord of the virtues!

But I think of what I have done and thought during the day. Thus ruminating, patient as a cow, I ask myself: What were thy ten overcomings?

And what were the ten reconciliations, and the ten truths, and the ten laughs with which my heart enjoyed itself?

Thus pondering, and cradled by forty thoughts, it overtaketh me all at once—sleep, the unsummoned, the lord of the virtues.

Sleep tappeth on mine eye, and it turneth heavy. Sleep toucheth my mouth, and it remaineth open.

Verily, on soft soles doth it come to me, the dearest of thieves, and stealeth from me my thoughts: stupid do I then stand, like this academic chair.

But not much longer do I then stand: I already lie.—

What is your chief impression of this second part?

Prof. Fierz: It is ironic.

Dr. Jung: Yes, one feels that he is even rather sarcastic over it. But without taking into consideration what Zarathustra would say, what about the thoughts themselves? For instance: "Well, also, do the poor in spirit please me: they promote sleep." Or: "A small company is more welcome to me than a bad one; but they must come and go at the right time. So doth it accord with good sleep."

Dr. Allemann: It is common sense.

Dr. Jung: Yes, it is not at all stupid, particularly when we know how Nietzsche suffered from insomnia; it would be a sound admonition. If Nietzsche had consulted me, I would have given him such advice and he would have thought I was a good teacher of the virtues that conduce sleep. One cannot help thinking that Nietzsche sympathized with the teacher; otherwise, he could hardly have reproduced his sermon so well. So the general tendency here is quite clear, it indicates a sort of attitude which would lead the way to a healthy and normal condition. Now we will see what Zarathustra does with it:

When Zarathustra heard the wise man thus speak, he laughed in his heart: for thereby had a light dawned upon him. And thus spake he to his heart:

A fool seemeth this wise man with his forty thoughts: but I believe he knoweth well how to sleep.

Happy even is he who liveth near this wise man! Such sleep is contagious—even through a thick wall it is contagious.

A magic resideth even in his academic chair. And not in vain did the youths sit before the preacher of virtue.

His wisdom is to keep awake in order to sleep well. And verily, if life had no sense, and I had to choose nonsense, this would be the most desirable nonsense for me also.

Now know I well what people sought formerly above all else when they sought teachers of virtue. Good sleep they sought for themselves, and poppy-head virtues to promote it!

To all those belauded sages of the academic chairs, wisdom was sleep without dreams: they knew no higher significance of life.

Even at present, to be sure, there are some like this preacher of virtue, and not always so honourable: but their time is past. And not much longer do they stand: there they already die.

Blessed are those drowsy ones: for they shall soon nod to sleep.—

Thus spake Zarathustra.

We said last time that this wise man was another form of the old wise man we met in the woods, who is left over out of a time Zarathustra has left behind him: he represents the spirit that has been. Now why is this spirit so much associated with sound sleep?

Mrs. Crowley: It would seem to me, if we compare this chapter of the virtues with the one following, as if Zarathustra sees this old man in the woods in rather a caricatured fashion. I mean he sees him in opposition to his own point of view, but he is always influenced by him in an extraordinary way. He always absorbs something from the contact with him that influences his attitude immediately, though he is unaware how it is brought about. So wouldn't you say he represents the unconscious or shadow side of Zarathustra in a psychological sense, as well as in a symbolical one—the earth elements, the powers of nature that are eternally present, felt or at work even when they are not realized? The old man of the woods therefore suggests that capacity to receive or accept, as nature receives; and that constitutes the struggle in Zarathustra's soul. The spirit or conscious attitude alone cannot evoke the new value; it emerges out of the dual play. My point is that the message of the old man of the woods retransforms in Zarathustra, and that each time they meet there is an attempt, however unconscious, at reconciliation, as if a new focus or new perspective had been established.

Dr. Jung: That is perfectly true. Zarathustra is in opposition to the wise man, as any new truth is in opposition to the old truth. It is impossible to create without being in opposition to the thing that has been; the spirit of the time past is necessarily in opposition to the coming spirit, as the spirit prevailing now is in opposition to the one of the past. So we could say the spirit of the past forms the shadow of the spirit that is or that is to come. As in a time when the spirit of the past was still uppermost, still a ruling picture, the spirit of the future would be the shadow, because it would not yet be in the actual light. Inasmuch as Zarathustra exists, the light, the moment of greatest intensity, is embodied in himself, and the old wise man of the woods is the shadow. But as far as we can see here, the wisdom of the old man is in a way perfectly valid: that we keep awake in order to have sound sleep afterwards is also a point of view. One cannot say that sleep is of no importance, or that it should not be an aim in itself. As I said last time, there are certain fools who imagine that one could live without it, but anything that exists makes sense and is sought for or desired; since man has to sleep, it can be a goal, and particularly for a sleepless person.

chetyal figure is in a timeless condition—or at all events in a condition which cannot be compared to what we call time. Therefore, all archetypes have the particular quality of eternity, which is simply another word for timelessness; or it may be a different quality of time that is typical for archetypes. And therefore Plato said that the archetypes, or the eidola, the images, were eternally preserved in a heavenly place because they had that character of timelessness; they are forever there, they never change.<sup>1</sup> So, when you identify with an archetype in an inflation, your sleep is very often disturbed. One sees that in cases of mental derangement, in schizophrenia particularly, where people become identical with the unconscious and hardly sleep at all. They can be sleepless for weeks and weeks—I don't know how long—if drugs are not given them; and even when drugged, they exhaust themselves by that inner intensity which eats up their brains. They instantly share the wakefulness of the unconscious, which is always active. That condition of identity with an archetype naturally makes the old standpoint, which would allow one to sleep, particularly precious; and therefore, inasmuch as you want to hold to your new insight, you must fight the old, despite the fact that it is perhaps right, that it is common sense. And you particularly have to fight the continuous longing to return to the condition in which you were protected against the identity with archetypes.

You know, that identity is a torture, and naturally everything in you aches for liberation, and tries to go back to the protected condition where the archetypes are caught in symbols, in dogmas or in forms. That is the reason, for instance, why a man like Angelus Silesius, the German poet and philosopher, having realized the relativity of God (which was remarkable for his time), finally regressed into the Catholic church; he could not stand the extraordinary wakefulness of the idea, that devouring light. He was simply forced to seek shelter in the Catholic dogmatic forms where there seemed to be peace for him. But he forgot altogether that, having touched a new truth, retreat would mean the denial of the divine light and the return into darkness, into the thing which should have been overcome. So he was really denying his best. It was as if Nietzsche should say: "Oh, that damned Zarathustra makes me sleepless and excited, I cannot stand this new thing,"— and make a regression into the Lutheran church or, still farther, into the Catholic church. Then what would become of Nietzsche? Then he would make no point any longer; he would be settled forever, though he might think that he could sleep then. But he would simply become hellishly neurotic. He would destroy himself quite certainly, like Angelus Silesius, who began as a Protestant, then went far beyond Protestantism in his vision, and then, unable to stand it, returned and regressed into the Catholic church, where he became a bad neurotic, really a fiend. He lived in a monastery where his sole occupation was to write pamphlets reviling Protestantism, and that was his end.

If Nietzsche had denied Zarathustra, he would probably have come to his end much sooner, he also would have become an awful neurotic, and Zarathustra would never have been written at all. He fights that danger though he always craves for it; it is quite excluded that a man who suffers from such terrible sleeplessness should not crave for any kind of drug which puts him to sleep. And here he ridicules the teacher of sleep despite the fact of seeing that if he could only apply his advice to himself, he would be able to sleep. Being identical with Zarathustra, he sees too clearly; he cannot help seeing and he cannot help being Zarathustra. Therefore, he is in a terrible conflict all the time between that new being, Zarathustra, and the old thing which would be needed for the peace of his soul. In the next chapter we shall see the same struggle going on, the attempt at liberation from the standpoint of the past which recommends itself all the time. He constantly looks back to the past and yet his very life consists in keeping himself away from it. Now, that is the characteristic attitude of Protestantism. Zarathustra simply exaggerates it in a most extravagant way, but that is inevitable. Or could you conceive of another way of liberating himself from the spirit of the past?

Prof. Fierz: He could become Catholic.

Dr. Jung: Oh yes, but that would be no solution. He must keep his Zarathustra ideas and by becoming Catholic he would deny them, and then that whole explosion of light would have been in vain. Well, I must say I would not know any other way; the only thing Nietzsche can do under those circumstances is to go with his Zarathustra, with that attempt at liberation from the spirit of Protestantism, by applying the rule and mechanism which Protestantism always has applied—by kicking itself away from Catholicism. Something else can come only when he is entirely separated—when he has overcome the Protestant attitude, that is. But he must first be clearly separated from the Christian idea in general; only then can he adopt another attitude. He has to be a super-Protestant. So we can call the Superman a super-Protestant just as well.

We will now go to the next chapter: "Backworldsmen." The German word really is Hinterwäldler; Nietzsche makes a sort of pun in using the similarity of the word Wald, which means "wood," and Welt which means "world." You see, people who live "behind the wood"—i.e., in a remote forgotten corner—would be backwoodsmen, Hinterwäldler; and Hinterweltler (a word which does not exist) would mean "people who didn't live in the world of the present day."<sup>2</sup> He says:

Once on a time, Zarathustra also cast his fancy beyond man, like all backworldsmen.

This means that he projected his dreams beyond man, beyond the human sphere, like all those people who believe in other worlds. That is not, of course, exactly Nietzsche's wording; the word backworldsmen can be translated as "metaphysicians," people who don't know the world and are out of tune with the history of the day.

The work of a suffering and tortured God, did the world then seem to me.

The dream—and diction—of a God, did the world then seem to me; coloured vapours before the eyes of a divinely dissatisfied one.

Good and evil, and joy and woe, and I and thou—coloured vapours did they seem to me before creative eyes. The creator wished to look away from himself,—thereupon he created the world.

Intoxicating joy is it for the sufferer to look away from his suffering and forget himself. Intoxicating joy and self-forgetting, did the world once seem to me.

This world, the eternally imperfect, an eternal contradiction's image and imperfect image—an intoxicating joy to its imperfect creator:—thus did the world once seem to me.

Thus, once on a time, did I also cast my fancy beyond man, like all backworldsmen. Beyond man, forsooth?

Ah, ye brethren, that God whom I created was human work and human madness, like all the Gods!

A man was he, and only a poor fragment of a man and ego. Out of mine own ashes and glow it came unto me, that phantom. And verily, it came not unto me from the beyond!

Here Zarathustra begins to fight the metaphysical idea, the idea of a trans-subjective reality which would be embodied by gods or demons or angels or anything one puts into the beyond.<sup>3</sup> He begins to introject God, whom he supposes to be dead. This is the super-Protestantism where the idea of God is beginning to evaporate; already in Church Protestantism of the liberal brand, one observes that God is becoming more and more an abstraction. So a friend of mine used to say, speaking of the difference between the liberal and the more orthodox theologian, that the orthodox theologian thinks of God as an old German train conductor with a long beard; and the liberal theologians think he looks the same only a bit more gas-like. You see, this is a tale-telling joke: it shows that old-fashioned idea of the old man with the beard sitting upon the throne, or snapping tickets and controlling the train for those that have not paid. It is the moral point of view; he looks out for order, and is either benevolent or thunders like God. And “gas-like” means a thinner substance, which shows a certain influence of natural science upon the more liberal element in theology; the god evaporates to a certain extent. That is a very true description of the infantile image, and naturally you will discover nothing of the sort in theologists’ books; it is only an underlying image they have for their private use, utterly different from their books. But in reality, it is not so different, because their God always appears as a being who can only move within the limits they give him. They know exactly what God can do and what he cannot do: what he is and what he means and what his purpose is. So it appears that God is a limited being who also has to be omnipotent, even if on the same page the same professor shows that he cannot be omnipotent.

For instance, to quote Gogarten, a famous theologian of our days: “God can only be good.”<sup>4</sup> But that means that he can only do half the work, because the other half of the work is surely bad, and that is a fearful limitation. If I should set you the task of being only good, you would discover it to be well-nigh impossible; you would suffer like hell if you tried to be good only. That is just our trouble. You see, they make a neurotic of God, for he must suffer terribly if he cannot also do the bad things of the world; this is such a violation of the idea of the god that he needs must evaporate. So it becomes very clear, even talking theologically, that they have created a vapor which cannot contain God—a powerful, dynamic thing that never would come down so far as to be good only. That is absolutely excluded.<sup>5</sup>

Prof. Fierz: The devil is the other part, and they don't see that it is exactly the same.

Dr. Jung: Well, they don't talk of the devil so much. That is not quite good form. I gave my own father very bad hours talking about the devil. You find very little of the devil in their books. They want to hush up the fact of the darkness—they don't know what to do with it. Too much of it will disturb their sleep and they are teachers of good sleep.

Mr. Baumann: There is a saying that you must not paint the devil on the wall, or he will come.

Dr. Escher: Is not the vision of Nicholas von der Flüe the counterpart of this picture?

Dr. Jung: That was not a train conductor. That was an appearance of the devil quite obviously. Well, Nietzsche here tries to cut all that down for his own time and for our time still. Theologians have created such a picture of God that it can only be cut down; it is nothing but man's work. As soon as somebody tells me God can only be this or that, I know this is man's work; it is as if a louse should say Goethe or Mussolini could only be or do certain things. It is perfectly incongruous and absurd to even try to make limitations or definitions. For instance, the Catholic church holds that you can only attain the forgiveness of sins or redemption through the sacraments, by the means of grace of the church. Of course that is man's work; it is a limitation of the powers of God. As the idea that you can only be saved through faith is man's work, it is a limitation of the possible intervention of God. If God chooses to save a man against his faith he can do so if he pleases. You see, if I want, I can do something against my own principles apparently. If people say that I am bound by what they think are my principles, I am not free if I comply. Instead, I shall do everything in my power to prove to them that I am not what they suppose I am; I shall do just the contrary because I am a free being. The more you create such constructions, such images and limitations, the more you drive out the living spirit, and then the living spirit will appear in an entirely different place.<sup>6</sup>

Now, Zarathustra is here doing the necessary destructive work on

those conceptions which still infest our late Christianity. But he is doing even more. We could not say that the idea of a suffering and tortured God was our only idea of God. That would refer to only one third of the deity, it would be only in his form of Christ; another third would be God the Father who does not suffer at all, and neither is the Holy Ghost tortured in any way; he is not the tortured hero. Also, the explanation of the world as God's imagination is not exactly a Christian point of view. Here, surely, is an Eastern thought coming in via Schopenhauer, who took up that idea of the world as imagination, a dream of the primordial will in a sort of drunken self-forgetfulness. Of course, in Schopenhauer's world there was no such thing as a self that forgets itself: there was no self at all. It was a dream that just happened, a most irrational fact. Once in the aeons, the primordial will happened to stumble into a dream of a world; it could have stumbled into anything else but it just happened to be a world. It was absolutely incidental, having no meaning whatever. Therefore, he says man must apply his intellect in order to mirror to the primordial will what a world of nonsense and suffering it has created. A most pessimistic view in a way.<sup>7</sup>

Now, that idea comes in here under the element of intoxicating joy; and that will play a great role later in the idea that the creator of the world was a sort of Dionysos who, with a drunken imagination and a drunken joy, revelled in producing fantasy pictures of the world. The Dionysian idea came from the East by way of Asia Minor, probably from India. He would be an equivalent of Shiva the dancer who, in a sort of drunken ekstasis, dances the world and all the ten thousand forms of existence, the joy and the suffering of such a world, its creation and its destruction. Therefore, he is always represented as dancing upon corpses amidst the horrors of the burial ground, the idea being that this world is a paradise which grows luxuriantly upon the corpses; but soon this form also will decay and become corpses or a dung heap. Schopenhauer reduces all that to the imagination of man, which is absolutely consistent. It is super-Protestantism. He not only protests against the dogma of the virgin birth, for example; he also protests against the last remnant of dogma in the Protestant church, the belief in God.

In the history of the Protestant church, you will find that the Lutherans have still preserved certain integral and essential parts of the <sup>7</sup> Arthur Schopenhauer's The World as Will and Representation was a powerful influence on both Nietzsche and Jung. See Introduction above.

Catholic dogma, the idea that you cannot be saved without the means of grace of the church for instance, that it needs the intercession of the church. Or that you cannot enter the kingdom of heaven without partaking of the communion, the body of Christ, as administered by the church. This was the cause of the conflict between the Swiss Reformer Zwingli and Luther. Zwingli said that the communion was symbolic and not the real body of Christ. It only meant the body of Christ, a metaphor in other words. And against that Luther wrote on the table at which they were sitting during the discussion the Greek word estin, because in the Greek text it says, "This is my flesh, this is my blood," and not "This means my blood." But Zwingli was already more liberal and insisted that it was only a memorial meal and was not to be taken literally—with that, of course, exploding the means-of-grace idea, the particular metaphysical magic which Luther wanted to preserve in order to save the church. For the church makes no sense whatever without the sacrament.

You see, if the church doesn't administer the magic means which cannot be obtained anywhere else than through that apostolic succession, then it has no existence at all. It means nothing, but is just a place where people meet and somebody talks: all the magic, all the appeal to the unconscious is gone. You can imagine what it means to be in the place where the actual magic is happening which can happen nowhere else; of course your unconscious is gripped, you are caught. For instance, if I should imagine that, in Notre Dame de Paris or in St. Stephan's in Vienna or in any other beautiful old church, there would be a priest of apostolic succession, who had received the blessing coming in direct line from the very first blessing bestowed upon the head of St. Peter by Christ himself and so handed on through the centuries, and that such a priest could perform a rite of magic value which could not be repeated anywhere else, which could not be imitated, which could not be bought, or produced by any other means—well, sure enough, I would gladly be a Catholic. I could not avoid being Catholic. Only knowing it would mean that I was already Catholic. I would be in the fold. The liberal Zwingli, a very common-sense and sober man, did not believe in that magic. He laid all the weight upon the human mind, thereby showing that he was already super-Protestant; he protested against Luther and went one step further, destroying the legend of the magic performance in the communion. It really meant the destruction of the communion, and so, piece by piece, all those symbolic forms were destroyed.

Protestant parsons of today take little interest in the Trinity and the equality of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, or in the virgin birth, etc., but the Catholic church still insists upon them. And that is quite logical, for they express the unconscious just because they are irrational. The sacrifice of the intellect demanded by the Catholic church is absolutely consistent with the idea of a church. Inasmuch as Protestantism, with an increasingly liberal point of view discusses these matters, they lose their magic and fade away. The very last dogma is the fact of God's existence, and that is already undermined. We speak lightly of der liebe Gott, we say, "Oh, the lord knows!" "God has become far too much a sort of bon mot to have any particular magic still. So Zarathustra doesn't need to explode that idea. And then, naturally, that whole metaphysical or animistic world turns in to ourselves. Then where is the virgin birth, or the Trinity, or anything of Christian metaphysics? Well, that is all in my imagination; it is made of my own stuff. It comes back to me. I am the whole show. Then I think, "Now this is pretty poor. I have made such a tremendous enterprise and what is the result of it? I cut the whole performance down, and I find only ashes and remnants and debris in myself." You see, you assume that those old things have collapsed into fantasies and imagination and forget entirely that they once had an extraordinary intensity and life. And you don't know that you secretly canalize a huge river into your unconscious. You think all the time that you have only gathered up the remains, those nails and screws and door-handles and so on which belong to you. You store them away and if nothing happens you forget entirely that an enormous manifestation of life and libido went into all that. And you now have the whole thing in your unconscious, where it causes a tremendous tension. That is the tension, the dynamis, which is pushing Zarathustra up to the surface, so that even the sleeplessness cannot convince Nietzsche that he should dismiss that figure. Zarathustra is too strong for him—not even sleeplessness counts.

Mr. Baumann: Certain modern theologians have tried to give more metaphysical substance to God.

Dr. Jung: Oh yes, naturally, but they disregard entirely the fact that when a metaphysical form has lost substance, man cannot put artificial substance into it: that is absolutely excluded. So when a theologian tries to show that God is very substantial and still working miracles, it is only a man-made god: that parson has invented an idol. He found that the idea of God had become depleted, so he puts up an idol of his own make instead of the living god, or instead of trying to discover where the living god has disappeared. He doesn't follow after God and seek him everywhere; he is simply satisfied with the fact that God has gone and that something ought to be done about it—so he puts up an idol. You see, you may try to create a god in a trans-subjective world, but he would surely not be of that trans-subjective reality; he would be an entirely subjective reality. When Nietzsche says here that he has created a god, it means such an idol, and he realizes in this sentence the content of his god-image. He says, “A man was he, and only a poor fragment of a man and ego.” In other words, his God was a man-made projection and nothing else: “Out of mine own ashes and glow it came unto me, that phantom. And verily, it came not unto me from the beyond!” He recognizes that in that image of God he has believed in, nothing has come from beyond, and that whatever the beyond may be, it is a trans-subjective sphere. You see, the existence of a trans-subjective sphere is not discussed here. The statement is merely that nothing of a trans-subjective nature has come to him: he recognizes nothing objective in his divine experience.

This is very much the condition which prevails in our actual times, a condition which has been brought about in the course of the last centuries, having begun at the time of the Reformation. More and more people felt that nothing from beyond came to them, that they were safely cut off from beyond, that all things divine were on this side of the river, in the visible church for instance, in man-made images, ideas, rites, and so on. And they missed the beyond, the trans-subjective fact, without which no religious experience is possible. So one can say their religious experience was nil; it was Anempfindung, a sort of aesthetic feeling into, an imagining that one has experienced, but it was not the real experience. If you study the quality of a real experience, like that vision of Nicholas von der Flüe, you see it is of a very different and very peculiar nature. The experiences of Francis of Assisi, of Jakob Boehme, or of Angelus Silesius,<sup>8</sup> for example, were not within the dogma, and it would take any amount of diplomatic work to squeeze them somehow into the building of the church. I realize that such a statement would be most offensive in certain milieus, yet I am thoroughly convinced that it is so. And Zarathustra here simply gives voice to that generally prevailing conviction.

Of course, nobody would insist upon faith if they were sure in their faith. A man who has had immediate experience of the trans-subjective reality never speaks of belief or faith because he knows. You would not insist upon believing in the existence of Mussolini because you know he does exist, as you know America exists. So, for anybody who has had an experience of trans-subjective reality—whatever that is—to preach of faith, what you ought to believe, would be as utterly futile as preaching the existence of London or Paris. No preaching is needed, no faith is needed, because it is a fact; to such a person it was an overwhelming experience. The very fact that Protestantism insists so much on faith shows the weakness of their situation. It shows that nobody has actual experience, for the trans-subjective reality in which you ought to believe is exceedingly doubtful. It is nice if you can, but it is really nothing you could experience—particularly when they say, like that very modern theologian Karl Barth, that there is an absolute god.<sup>9</sup> I don't see how one can experience an absolute thing, for absolutus means completely detached, and if a thing is completely detached from us, how can we experience it? How can it touch us? For instance, to know whether the planet Mars is inhabited or not is completely detached from us. If there are any humanlike beings there we don't know it; at all events, we have no connection with them. They are to us absolute. If a thing has relation to us, it is relative to us and we are relative to it. And so the experience of an absolute god is excluded: that is only a man-made word.

If I were God, I would not be absolute. I would relate myself to human beings, for I would like to do something to them and I would like them to do something to me. To be absolute means that there is no creation. Before the creation of the world God was bored to tears, the old records say. He got awful headaches and finally contracted until the first light came forth because he simply could not stand his immense worldwide loneliness. You know, all the symptoms of modern Christian conviction are very doubtful. If anybody insists upon his absolute reliability and honesty, I know he lies; for why does he insist upon it? Why cannot we take it for granted that he is an honest and reliable being? Obviously he himself does not, so he preaches it. When I was a child it already sounded very queer to me to hear: "You ought to believe." I always said: "Do you know? Have you had any experience?" Otherwise, you can say what you please: it carries no conviction whatever.

<sup>9</sup> Karl Barth, Swiss Protestant theologian, professor at Basel. The doctrine that God is "Wholly Other" was put forth first in his revolutionary Epistle to the Romans (1918) in his Church Dogmatics (Kirchliche Dogmatik) (Chicago, 1932-1962). In response to a storm of protest, he somewhat modified this view in his later work.

Now, the statement which Nietzsche makes here is not a subjective whim or his personal point of view. He simply gives voice to the general fact that our modern conception of religion completely lacks primordial experience. So I think he quite rightly says: "it came not unto me from the beyond." This "coming from the beyond" is most impressive in its brevity; you might easily read past it without paying particular attention, but it is of the utmost importance. You see, belief or faith is your own activity, as what you touch or see, what you experience, is all your own making. You are entirely in the world of known things even if you approach God, which is the strangest thing you can imagine. You discover that you believe in God and if you did not he would not be. God would be nowhere, he could do nothing. You must believe and then he begins to operate. Your belief instigates such a phantom; you can inflate the phantom till it exists, but it is all your own body, your own make. So you are completely cut off from the beyond by your very faith. I say to people: "For heaven's sake, don't believe; we know nothing, we have no experience, so in what and why should I believe?"<sup>10</sup> If it is a thing which I create, I then simply envelop myself in the cloak of my own imagination. I blindfold myself by a self-created veil. The beyond is the trans-subjective, and this is the experience of something within that sphere you call psyche or mind, which is not your own make, which is very clearly an intercessio divina—an intervention of something which is not yourself and which is not a part of our external world. It must be an effect within your innermost self, where you are quite alone with yourself, where certainly nothing else exists. Then if something happens there which is clearly not yourself, you know it is from beyond. It is trans-subjective.

This may come to you in a very banal form, in an almost imperceptible way, and if you are not in the mood, you will not see it at all; it may be in a dream, or it may come in the way of a fantasy. I think I told you of that Catholic woman who discovered in her fantasy, after long vain attempts, that there was some moisture in the air. That was the turning point, that did it. She suddenly came across a fact which she had not created. It simply was there. You naturally think that a fantasy is all your own make, so if something comes into it which is most certainly not your make, and not your ego, that is a trans-subjective experience. Suppose you were quite alone in a room, and suddenly something stirred, something which could not be accounted for and which you have not moved; you can say it is a ghost or it might be a human being or an animal—God knows what—but you instantly have the feeling of not being alone in the room. And so the experience of a trans-subjective reality gives you suddenly the feeling that you are not alone in your psychology. There is something else that seems to come from outside, yet you clearly know it is nowhere outside.

Question: Is this not just the unconscious?

Dr. Jung: Oh yes, you can call it “the unconscious.” Just what the unconscious is we don’t know. To call it “the unconscious” is merely façon de parler. You can call it “the dark continent,” or “heaven,” or “hell,” or anything you like: it is simply something from the unknown. When you recognize the unknown as a really existing thing, you have had the trans-subjective experience. Now, neither Zarathustra nor Nietzsche have had that experience yet, though Nietzsche had an opportunity for just that. What would it have been?

Mrs. Brunner: He might have noticed that Zarathustra was not himself.

Dr. Jung: Yes, you see that was a great chance. He himself said, you remember, Da wurde eins zu zwei und Zarathustra ging an mir vorbei “. . . Zarathustra was passing by,” which means that Zarathustra was an objective reality.<sup>11</sup> But he did not realize it. He was identical. If he had stopped at that verse and asked himself what it really meant, he would have seen that Zarathustra was a free agent and not exactly himself, and that would have been his first trans-subjective experience. Otherwise, such a thing becomes identical with one: one falls into it. Therefore, it is a principle in analysis that we always try to dissociate from the unconscious, to make a difference between ourselves and the voice, or the influence, or the mana, or the archetype—whatever you like to call it. And you can make that difference by criticizing carefully whatever your experience may be. But if you take it for granted in a general way that of course your thoughts, for instance, are all your own, such an obscurity prevails that you can discern nothing. Make the simple experiment of criticizing your own thoughts. (I am now talking chiefly to the ladies.) You have a certain opinion about something, and when I ask you if that is what you really think, you say, “No, I must think what my idea of it really is.” And then you come to the conclusion that you think something quite different. Now, how did you come to that other opinion? Did you make it? “No, it was just there.” Who then produced it? Who had the intention or the will to create such an opinion? If you can realize that, you have had a trans-subjective experience. Therefore I say, don't identify with your animus. That is not yourself, that is a trans-subjective reality. And mind you, the animus is as terrible a reality as the anima.

If a man takes it for granted that his moods are just himself, he has an anima inflation and makes a fool of himself. But if he can criticize his moods, he asks himself, "Is this really my feeling?" By no means. His real feeling is even suppressed in favor of that nonsense, an emotion which is really strange to him. And if he can make this a real experience, he has realized a trans-subjective reality. That is the way I came to the conception of the anima. I criticized my emotions and came to the conclusion that they were not myself. They were simply made for me, so I asked myself, "Now who on earth can produce such things in me?" I was almost inclined to believe in witchcraft. That was of course the origin of witchcraft and why men still say they are bewitched; they naively feel that their emotions are not their own. A man who is bewitched is filled with intense feelings which he thinks must come from somewhere, and then he discovers a red-haired girl and thinks she is responsible—and then he could kill her for witchcraft. But if he had a philosophical mind, he would understand that this is a trans-subjective reality which he must not project into a red-haired girl.

Prof. Fierz: What you have just said reminds me a little of Buber. He said that the real prophet did not even know what he was saying when he spoke. He was simply the medium. He spoke with his tongue and not with his head. It was unconscious.<sup>12</sup>

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is the thing.

Mr. Baumann: If anybody had spoken about such a trans-subjective experience ten or twenty years ago, he would have been declared a schizophrenic.

Dr. Jung: Naturally. It depends on how you tell it. You might rouse the most terrible mistakes in a naive mind. For example, a girl of about twenty-six once came to me and said: "Doctor, I have a black snake in my abdomen and it is asleep." I looked at her and thought, "Now, now!" Then she said: "I see you think I am crazy, but I am not; what I tell you is symbolic. I don't think that there is really a black snake in my abdomen." Now, if she had omitted to tell me that she was only using a sort of metaphor, I would have been under the impression that she was mad, because she would have been stating something which was absolutely inadmissible. Nobody has a black snake in the abdomen unless they are crazy. Since she knows that this sounds crazy, I know she is not. She conveys that idea to me, and then she can go on talking about it, and it is understood as being a subjective psychological phenomenon. You see, a crazy person would talk about that snake as if it were a reality, disregarding the impression it makes upon the audience, while this girl tried to establish an understanding, or a feeling rapport with me about it. So I always say to people on the borderline. "As long as you can explain yourself and feel the need of explaining yourself to a human being, and succeed more or less, you are not crazy." But it is characteristic of insane people that they go on talking without caring or knowing whether they are understood, disregarding the rapport, disregarding the impression they make. If a woman declares to me that she is the queen of the world, it can be exceedingly witty if it is understood that she means her power complex; otherwise, it is a case of schizophrenia. Insane people never realize that anybody could be shocked by what they say. People who disregard the effect they have on other people are on the way to insanity, even if they are still within the normal. In other words, as soon as they become unconscious of what they do and what it means, they are on the way to insanity because they cut the human relation and then there is no guarantee that they won't get lost.

Mr. Baumann: If Nicholas von der Flüe had not tried to build his vision into his conscious in a symbolic form, might he have been insane?

Dr. Jung: Yes, because any trans-subjective experience is of such a nature that one can easily go crazy. But he showed his humanity in the fact that he tried to translate the whole thing into the language of the church, into the Trinity conception; by that he established his rapport with people. The vision itself had an absolutely segregating effect, however; it is said that he appeared terrifying to people. He had been so frightened and had such a look of horror in his eyes that he infected them with it. He realized that, or he would never have taken the trouble to establish a human rapport concerning it. Otherwise he would have been just an ordinary schizophrenic, he would have degenerated because he had cut the human relation. That is the arch sin. One often finds very basic trans-subjective experiences at the bottom of cases of insanity; they are of such an impressive nature that people are spell-bound and forget all about humanity, they simply fall into the archetypal experience and disappear. So any archetypal experience which is trans-subjective has that dangerous quality of segregation, separation, cutting the human relationship and isolating the individual, all the more when the experience is of a more or less inexplicable nature. One could say it was also a characteristic of the trans-subjective experience that it offers the greatest difficulties to explanation—as a dream cannot be explained unless one knows a good deal.

Mrs. Brunner: Would you call the traditional animus also trans-subjective?

Dr. Jung: Not in itself, it is not a trans-subjective reality if you have not experienced it as such; you must criticize your experience and know what in the experience belongs to yourself. Moreover, this should be not only an intellectual criticism, it should also be a feeling criticism; you should take the experience as a whole and react to it as a whole, because your mind will naturally make the attempt to assimilate that experience right away within the human sphere. If Nicholas von der Flüe had had a mind—which he had not—it would have told him that the vision was the Trinity, for instance, and so he would have assimilated it in spite of the trans-subjective character; it would have been extinguished, killed. And the same thing might be done by feeling. You see a feeling type can harmonize a trans-subjective experience by the power of his differentiated feeling, put it into a nice frame with other curious things which are also a part of himself, and create such a feeling soup about it that the thing can swim among the other pieces of meat or bread. The more one-sided the type the more certain it is that the experience will be killed, because the superior function is then so powerful that it simply assimilates everything; whatever happens, such a person will declare it to be all in his world, and if it is something too extraordinary he simply says it is not true. There are surely so-called occult phenomena, those peculiar psychic phenomena, and they are strange, trans-subjective. What can you do with them? Well, you simply say they are not true and the case is settled. It is like the famous story of the rabbi: When he was travelling he always drove four white horses, because he was the so-called Jewish pope. And there was a very powerful count in the same country, who travelled with four black horses and who had a driver called Johann, because the driver is always called Johann. Now unhappily enough they both approached a river at the same moment from opposite sides. There was a narrow bridge over the river, and the great rabbi thought: I am the great rabbi, I go over the bridge first. And the count thought: I am the great count, and I go over the bridge first. So they both drove onto the bridge and then naturally there was not room for them to pass each other, and when the horses shot together the count jumped up and said: Johann, give me my pistol that I may kill the horses of this damned Jew. And then the rabbi got up, and he simply spoke the magic word. Thus the whole situation was no longer true.

LECTURE X

Dr. Jung:

We have today the report which I asked for at the beginning of the term. Professor Reichstein has been kind enough to make it for us.

Prof. Reichstein:

THE ARCHETYPE OF THE OLD WISE MAN

In handling this subject I have picked out single examples more or less arbitrarily which I will explain as briefly as possible. I could not of course attempt a general summary on account of my ignorance of the ancient languages and an insufficient knowledge of religious history.

Mrs. Fröbe-Kapteyn kindly sent me a lot of material.<sup>1</sup> As I only can speak about a small portion of it, I have just treated the whole of it as an appendix, which will be in the library for reference. For further material, especially about Egypt and Hermes Trismegistos I wish to thank Mr. F. Allemann. And I wish also to thank Mr. Felix Fierz for the translation of some Greek texts. Also Mrs. Baynes, Miss Hannah, and Mrs. Baumann for their helpful translations into English.

Out of the rich abundance of possible examples I have had to choose those which were in a measure known to me. The choice is therefore necessarily very one-sided.

For the discussion of the function of the symbol of the Old Wise Man, we will consider:

- (1) The function of the old man in human society.
- (2) The Gods or superhuman beings in whom this function is expressed, according to myth and tradition.

1. The old man. I will deal with this first point very briefly.

(a) First of all, we can bring forward the extraverted side, which emphasizes those qualities of old men growing out of experiences accumulated over a long period of time. Old men play a special role as judges, lawgivers, regulators generally, teachers, guardians of tradition, masters, sometimes also as rulers. The old man has steadiness, is less inclined to lose himself in his surroundings. One sees this in individuals as well as in whole nations. The primitive, for instance, loses himself and degenerates in foreign surroundings far sooner than a representative of an old civilization.

(b) The old man possesses an introverted side also: he is the one who has the secret knowledge. He knows the goal, in that he stands nearer to death, to the secret side of the world, the invisible. The near relationship between spirit and death is very far-reaching. The old man is therefore also magician, sorcerer, medicine man, doctor, priest, and initiator. He can become the embodiment of the supernatural or the deputy of a God or Demon.

In those stages of civilization where the inner and outer world (perhaps not yet distinguished) are not separated, the extraverted and introverted aspects of the wise old man appear in one individual. Thus the priest is also judge, the chief role being played by the divine judgment, which is based on the ordeal by fire, water, etc. The social order springs from the taboo laws and totemism. The taboo laws also supply the morals. They tell me, for example, which girl I may not marry, as well as which animal I may not eat. Taboo is everything which is charged with mana. The sorcerer receives the necessary mana (like an electric charge), by a special ordination and is thus set apart from ordinary people, and possesses power insofar as he is possessed by the spirit. Also through contact, for instance with a corpse (hunting, war, burial), man becomes taboo (susceptible).

The ambivalent nature of the mind is very much in evidence in primitives' forms of thought. In the common expressions, white and black magic, this ambivalence is specially emphasized. It is difficult to find a definition which really hits the mark. We could perhaps say that white magic works in the service of the "self," black magic in the service of the "ego." Quite apart from whether these definitions are correct, they do not explain very much in any special case. The old wise man cannot escape the fate of those Gods who are not allowed to enter the temple and who transform into Demons (perhaps sink back into a primitive form). He can, therefore, appear as good or evil sorcerer, but even that does not decide the question as to which of the two forms possesses the efficacy (the light). This depends on the situation. Every living symbol can become convention, dogma, etc., lose its divine light, and sink into darkness. In this case, the black holds the light, and this can be the cause for it to change color again. Usually, however, it is said that the light must be snatched from the black sorcerer again. (Compare for instance, the fairy tale of Aladdin and his miraculous lamp, in the Arabian Nights.)

To sum up, I would like to say that the old man is he who knows what is to be done (in a difficult situation) and understands how to perform the magic rite. In the most civilized as in the primitive form, the outer and inner aspects of the wise old man appear together in one individual. The most highly developed form is perhaps that of the inspired teacher, called by the East the "Guru." (With us this social role has for the moment no acknowledged representatives; perhaps the burden of carrying it is not infrequently offered to the psychiatrist.)

2. The old wise man in Religion and Myth

Among primitives. It would be extremely interesting to be able to examine more closely the archetype of the old wise man as it appears among primitives. Here, in all probability, we would have the closest contact with a living survival of the first form of the archetype. Unfortunately, I have no knowledge of this field. But in order not to omit this important stage altogether, I have given a rough sketch of the probable development of the religious views that throw light on this question. (I have taken my material in part from a short chapter by E. Lehmann, "Die Religion der Primitiven," appearing in P. Hinneberg's Die Kultur der Gegenwart, Die Religionen des Orients. Page numbers refer to that.)<sup>2</sup>

The primitive form of religion is magic. To the primitive, the mysterious life force, "mana," is more important than purely physical force, and the chief aim of religious practices is the preservation and increase of life force. On the lowest level, the increase is obtained by simply taking the power away from a fellow man, as for instance in cannibalism. At a less barbaric stage it is done by the sacrifice of animals, as, for instance, by the eating of the totem animal. Magic is not necessarily connected either with gods or spirits; a magic rite suffices, and anyone who knows how to practice magic already possesses the desired power. He draws directly upon the secret springs of power in nature, and needs no intervention from supernatural beings. In Australia, for instance, all old men understand the practice of magic (p. 13).

Mana is that which has immediate and direct effect. Anyone who knows how to use it can destroy his enemies and help his tribe. The ambivalent nature of mana is expressed in the fact that everything which has mana or is under its spell is taboo (the medicine man, the chief, etc.), and this means that it is either holy or impure. The all-important thing to a primitive is to know how to handle mana.

Among very primitive peoples the spirits do not appear in personal forms, but quite undifferentiated; they are material, but invisible. They are the force that makes things live. The primitive is to a high degree under the spell of this mysterious force. He lives in constant fear of it and never knows when a trap may be set for him by a secret enemy against whom the best counter-magic is impotent.

The art of magic can be said to show some progress, therefore, when these forces are differentiated and recognized as real spirits. The ordinary man does not know the name of the spirits, but the priest-magician does and if a misfortune occurs, it is his task to find out the spirit that has caused it (p. 15). As soon as he knows its name, it is a small matter to exorcise the spirit, or to overcome it by a more powerful demon. (Thus, knowledge is mana.)

The cult of the soul seems to be a later extension of the belief in spirits. The souls of the dead are honored as spirits. After death, at least one soul of the dead man continues to exist. In magic, the fact that the soul can be brought under the sway of a foreign influence is of great importance. The souls of dead ancestors are especially significant. Thus, for example, any important new events must be immediately reported to them. (The cult of the soul probably leads directly to the rites of sacrifice.) Junod says that the gods of the Ba-Rongas are for the most part the dead ancestors (p. 17).

For the purpose of comparison with the examples which follow, it is interesting to note the primitive's belief about the origin of the world. The primitive picture of the world is taken from the features of the locality in which the particular tribe and its neighbors live. There is the dome of the sky set with sun, moon and stars, and there are rivers or mountains that mark off the boundaries. Behind these borders lies the fabled land of the gods, or the dead.

Egypt (Thoth). Here we have to leave a wide gulf unbridged and turn to Egypt for our next example of the old wise man. One of the best examples of a culturally highly developed form of the old wise man is the Egyptian God Thoth. He really plays the role of the doctor among the Gods. Thus, for example, in the Osiris myth when Horus avenges the death of his father (he overcomes Seth, his evil brother in a dreadful struggle in which both gods are wounded, Horus in one eye and Seth in the testicles), Thoth heals both of the gods again.

Here he shows also his adjusting and equalizing role. As this is very important I will quote a passage from Mead, Thrice Greatest Hermes, vol. 1, p. 58.<sup>3</sup>

The names of the God of Light and the God of Darkness change, but what does not change is the name of the arbiter, the mediator, whose duty it was to see that neither god destroyed the other or gained a decisive victory.

It was Thoth who performed this function of keeping the opposites in equilibrium. Thoth was originally a moon-God. He was usually pictured with an Ibis-head with the crescent moon above, or as a dog-headed ape. Often, both forms are given side by side. The dog-headed ape plays a special role in the judgment scene in the Book of the Dead. Here he sits on the top of the support of the beam of the balance, in which the heart of the deceased is weighed. His duty is to watch the pointer and tell the Ibis-headed Thoth when the beam is exactly level.

This ape is a form of Thoth as the god of "equilibrium." Perhaps it is a symbol of the equinoxes. The figure of the ape has, perhaps, a significance similar to the one ascribed to the frog, i.e., it is a hybrid form between man and animal.

Thoth was considered to be the wisest of all gods. In many places his power was held to be greater than that of Osiris and even than that of Ra himself. He was also called the heart, or the tongue of Ra. For a very long time in Egypt he was held to be the teacher of all secret wisdom as well as the author of the holy writings.

It is easy to understand how later on this god played a very dominating role in the gnosis and in various secret teachings. In the syncretistic era he became identified with the Greek god Hermes and was called Hermes Megistos, or Trismegistos. In hermetic philosophy he played an important role up to the late Middle Ages, and when its decline set in, his name was transformed into Megistophiel and from that became Mephistopheles. But he rose again from this depth even, and took his place from time to time on the forefront of the stage on which the fate of the soul of man is played. (Compare Faust.)

Iranian Conceptions and the God Ormuzd (Primal Man, Anthropos). Out of various fragments, especially out of those coming from the syncretistic period of antiquity, we can reconstruct, not very clearly to be sure, an ancient Iranian folk myth. It does not follow the orthodox Zarathustra tradition, but deals with a god named Asonakes ("the knower"). (This God is mentioned by Hermippos as the teacher of Zoroaster.) The myth probably originates in a time when the strict dualism so characteristic of Persia was not yet developed in its final, clearly marked form. Asonakes created both the principle of good and the principle of evil, something which to a later time would have seemed out-and-out blasphemy.

A reconstruction of the sort indicated is given by R. Reitzenstein in Das Iranische Erlösungsmysterium:

The serpent-shaped son of the Prince of Darkness desires the daughter of the King of Light, and finally obtains her. (He represents matter and she, the Psyche, the soul.) He has promised her a magic palace, and there he holds her prisoner. After a brief period of joy, her misery begins. While she is in this state there comes to her an invisible, divine messenger whom she only recognizes by his voice. He reminds her of her descent and of the home she has left.

Psyche breaks the power of the evil demon and escapes from her prison, but when she is left alone she is overtaken by sorrow, fear and perplexity. She wanders through the whole realm of matter and thus endows it with soul, but she can never find the way out—the border always stops her. Finally the god appears again, and leads her up to a heavenly marriage.

The Iranian Cosmogony is dominated by similar fantasies. Parts of it are reminiscent of the dragon myth and the night sea journey:

A theme which is afterwards interwoven with this myth is contained in the teaching about the Primal Man, the God Ormuzd, who, at least in the fragments from the syncretistic era, is identified with the "psyche." According to Reitzenstein this word which is given here as psyche ("the soul"), is in many cases best rendered by "essence" or "self." No wonder, therefore, that it could be identified with the God Ormuzd, the Primal Man, which psychologically means the same. It is the pu-rusha of the East.

The myth has certainly exerted a strong influence throughout the ages, and can be said to have affected our own culture even. The ideas hidden in it can be followed in a direct line through most of the so-called secret doctrine of the Western world. They had a marked influence on Christianity, not only directly but through Judaism also. The strongest imprint is the one appearing in various gnostic teachings. I need only mention the Manichaeism and the Mandaean.

These teachings are dominated by a well-defined dualism which divides off the World of Light (God) from the World of Darkness (Matter, Hyle). The soul of man takes its origin in the World of Light, and in a struggle with the powers of Darkness is sent to the dark world where it is fettered and narcotized (deafened and stupified). According to the Cosmogony, the soul had been sent to the dark world in order to combat that world from within. The soul, asleep in the World of Darkness, is intoxicated or blind. (It is comparable to the condition of Muladhara in Indian philosophy.)

The primal God (or primal man) sends a messenger who awakens the soul. (The fettered, primal man has his eyes opened; it is "the great vision," megiste dea.) The messenger—once more primal man in another aspect—appears as the wise man, the leader, or as the Virgin of the Light, who afterwards can take on the form of the wise leader. It is said that she or he is the heavenly counterpart, the heavenly image of the fettered soul. He leads the soul (usually after a waiting period), as well as its five elements, into the World of Light, and the rest is left to Darkness.

It is somewhat confusing at first to find that the primal god, the primal man, and the divine messenger, all three, have at times, the same name, Ormuzd. But after all, it is not so very strange because it indicates that all three are in reality one; that is, they consist of the same "substance." Frequently also, primal man appears as the son of the primal god, which is another way of saying that the two are of the same substance.

At the awakening of the sleeping Ormuzd, two more gods often appear on the scene. They are Chroshtag ("the call," in German der Ruf) and Padwahtag ("the answer"), and these two are companions of the wise leader. Chroshtag personifies his first form in the world of phenomena. (He is the voice, the Logos.) Apparently this symbolism arises from an inner experience, according to which one hears the wise old man call out, or speak, before one sees him. The immediate, creative power of the call is quite evident in German—for example, the word hervorrufen, "to bring forth." The figure of Chroshtag as a messenger is also often represented by a letter, etc. Writing is an invention of the old wise man. The important moment, which represents the beginning of the release, is paralleled in Indian Yoga by the moment when Kundalini is awakened. Here Chroshtag awakens the sleeping Ormuzd.

There are also versions of the myth in which Padwahtag (the answer, i.e., the self of primal man) is the only one to mount upward. The five Light Elements (the robe of primal man that is his manifest form) at first remain behind and only follow later on.

The goal is the return home of primal man (of the soul or the self of man) to the World of Light, where he again receives his robe of light.

An important way in which the myth is applied is to be found in the Cult of the Dead. Abbreviated versions of it were apparently recited in order to help the soul of the dead man at his resurrection. (Just as in a case of snakebite, the story of a god who had been bitten by a snake and made well again was recited.) The great experience of divinity is given to man in a picture. Applied to the living person, the myth shows him how it is possible for the soul of a man to unite with its origin, to return to the paradise from which he has fallen. The messenger of the god Ormuzd, the wise old man, shows him the way.

One of the most beautiful and best preserved of the fragments that have come down to us is the "Hymn of the Soul" from the Acts of Thomas. I have chosen as an example another Manichaean fragment which, though not of so much value from a literary point of view, is better suited for presentation here, because it is not so extensive.

The destructive devils made an uprising in behalf of their own spirit. And out of the excrements of the devils and the offal of the witches, he brought forth this impurity (matter), and he (the Prince of Darkness), settled himself therein. Then he captured from her place among the five elements, the body-guard of the god Ormuzd, the beautiful soul (gyan) and fettered her in the impurity. Because he made her blind and deaf, she had no consciousness and was confused so that at first she did not recognize her origin and the primal cause of herself. He made the impurity for her (the body) and the prison, and locked up the soul within it.

And devils, witches and all the elves threaten me the prisoner.—She grew evil herself.—But the god Ormuzd had pity.—He frightened the blind devil of greed away from her, and made her to see with her eyes, and showed her clearly all that was and will be. Quickly he made it clear to her that the god Ormuzd had not created this fleshly impurity (the body), nor had he fettered the soul. Resurrection came to the soul of the blessed one, she believed in the wisdom of Ormuzd etc. She divested herself of the impurity of death and was eternally redeemed, and taken up to Paradise, to that realm of the blessed.

Afterwards the end of the world is announced. This is typical and also logical for a point of view which believes the world to have been made by the devil.

Probably Indian and Chinese sources would yield still better material for the symbol of the old wise man. Clearer examples could be found perhaps, and ones showing more human proportions too. As this field was too foreign to me I had to renounce it. Moreover, I believe that we have here at least one advantage, that of touching upon our own territory because, as I have said above, it seems to me that these ideas are deeply imbedded in the soul of Western man.

In order to give only a brief example of how similar ideas are depicted in the East, I join, without commentary a song of Tibet's Great Yogi Milarepa.

MILAREPA I am Milarepa, great in fame,
the direct offspring of Memory and Wisdom;
Yet an old man am I, forlorn and naked.
From my lips springeth forth a little song, for all Nature at which I look,
serveth me for a book.
The iron staff that my hands hold, guideth me over the Ocean of Changing Life.
Master am I of Mind and Light;
And showing feats and miracles, depend not on earthly deities.

Poimandres. I will give a resumé of the most important chapter of this treatise which dates roughly from the first century after Christ. Poimandres means "shepherd of men." The Poimandres Community was a Gnostic sect whose teaching had a great influence on early Christianity (compare the Pastoral Hermas) and especially on hermetic philosophy (the Alchemist Zosimos was a member).

The text gives a cosmogony and contains a great mixture of the most varied elements which makes a clear summary very difficult. It may seem odd that I chose again a cosmogony for an example, but such cosmogonies often contain the teaching in a condensed symbolical form and are better than long descriptions. It is an old idea that the process of transformation consists in having to repeat the work of the creation of the world. He therefore must first know how this was done. Only then the micro- and the macro-cosmos correspond to each other again. It is very significant whether someone imagines that first there was chaos, or first the light, or whether this world was created by Jahveh as the Jews believe, or by the devil as was believed in Iran.

This correspondence is the chief point. It is best expressed in the so-called "Logos from the gospel of Eve" in G.R.S. Mead, ed., Thrice Greatest Hermes.

I stood on a lofty mountain, and saw a gigantic Man and another, a dwarf, and I heard, as it were a voice of thunder, and drew nigh for to hear; and he spake unto me and said: I am thou and thou art I; and wheresoever thou mayest be I am there. In all I am scattered, and whencesoever thou willest, thou gatherest Me, and gathering Me, thou gatherest Thyself.

Poimandres appears to the pupil in the meditation as a giant of tremendous size and asks what he would like to know. (Poimandres says he is always with him and knows what he desires.) The pupil wishes to learn the very essence of existence and to know God. Poimandres says: "Hold that in mind and I will teach thee." These words are followed by the vision. (The great vision means here again the awakening of the divine part in man, by the revelation that his very essence is of divine origin.) In the vision we can distinguish distinct sections which correspond to world periods. In order to make it clearer I will designate them as follows: creation of the primal world; creation of the material world; creation of man as mediator between them; the separation of male and female, and at last, the ascent of man to God.

The creation of the primal world is described as follows: At first, all was light (the Spirit, or God the Father). Out of it came the darkness coiling down like a snake. From this darkness (the earth) came the water. Now, out of the light a holy word came (the Logos) which provoked pure fire to leap up from the moisture, and rushing air followed it. Earth and water remain mingled as lower elements, fire and air are nearer to God. Here the creation of the primal world seems finished. Poimandres says: "The logos which consists of light is the son of god. Know that what sees in thee and hears in thee is the Lord's Word." And through the mind of Poimandres the pupil sees the light divided in innumerable living forces.

Then follows the creation of the material world. The "nature" (will, mind, reason) of God who wanted to copy the primal world united with the Logos and begot with him the elements of nature as children. The male-female primal god created the demiurgos and he created the seven planets, the visible world and fate. Out of the lower elements rose the Logos and united with the demiurgos his brother, so the lower elements are abandoned by the Logos and are purely material. Out of them came the dumb animals. (The demiurgos, the creator of the world, is called here: he who holds the fire.)

Creation of the Primal man. The all-father mind brought forth primal man in his image. Primal man saw the creation of his brother (the demiurgos) and broke through the partition of the spheres (fate and the evermoving wheel, are other conceptions of this symbolism), breaking the power of the bad demon, and thus showed to lower nature god's beautiful form (himself). (We see only in this passage that the demiurgos is supposed to be an evil demon.) Nature and primal man were longing for each other in love and primal man took his home in the unintelligent form, in the body.

Therefore out of all the living things on earth, man alone has a double nature, mortal through the body and immortal through his essence, primal man. Although immortal and with power over all, yet he suffers as a mortal, subject to fate. Although above the spheres (fate) he stays within them, has become their slave. Male-female, descended from the male-female father, though sleepless descended from the sleepless one, yet he is overcome by the longing of love and by sleep.

In a new world-period all female things are separated from the male. Poimandres teaches that he who recognizes himself will attain salvation, that is, he who recognizes the primal man in himself. But he who is seduced by love and is content with the body wanders confused in darkness, suffering the fate of death in the sensual world.

Now the pupil wants to know how the ascent is accomplished. Poimandres gives him the following advice:

Thou surrenderest the body to the demon, The senses to their sources, Passion and desire thou givest back to nature. Then thou traverses the seven spheres (Moon, Mercury, Venus, Sun, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn) returning to each its malevolent influence.

Completely stripped, man enters the eighth sphere and from there he can ascend directly to god and become divine.

The meaning is that everything must be given back to the source it came from. Then a perfect state is reached which is in some way comparable with the primal one.

ALCHEMISTIC PHILOSOPHY OF THE MIDDLE AGES

Example 1 (Franz Kieser, Cabala Chymica, Mühlhausen, 1606). In a treatise in the form of a vision and dialogue between pupil and Master (Hermes), the master gives at first instructions on the "natural things" in the form of a cosmogony.

The pupil sees the firmament with the seven planets, the earth in the middle as a great sphere, in the center of which is the water as a small white sphere. Everything however is dark and at a standstill. With thunder and lightning the red fire breaks forth. Through the rays that it sends forth, everything begins to move. The part of the rays which reaches right into the innermost sphere (water) gives it the strength to produce minerals, plants, animals, and men. Hermes explains all this minutely and calls the red fire the star of wisdom and the eternal light. He says, "This fire awakes nature" (p. 106).

Then they proceed to the "supernatural." (He calls it the key of the insight into all things.) The pupil meditates and has the following vision: He is in a deep valley and hears something behind him. Startled, he looks behind him and sees a very old man, with a long snow-white beard, in a black robe, with a compass and square. The old man approaches the globe and becomes gigantic. There he draws the lines and calls a magic number spell with a horrible voice. On the top of the quadrangle appears a dove. This he calls the spirit of conjunction and vivification. A flame of fire shoots down from above, a white star rises up from below, and where they come together a brilliant red star remains. It is the symbol of the philosopher's stone which illuminates everything. Its rays are stronger than any former ones. Everything becomes red and is burned up at last; neither sun nor moon remains. But from the star arises a new world in a complete form. The earth is green as an emerald; the sun, the moon, and the stars are brighter than before, only they are standing still, immovable. The old man cries: "Praised be God that for once evil is put down and the truth revealed. Rejoice that the darkness has an end, the sun will not set again but will shine eternally." With that he vanished.

Through the magic of the old man, the turning of the wheel of the world is stilled, or, from the star there appears a new world, that is not subject to the eternal rotation of nature. (This is in peculiar harmony with the first state which is pointed out in the Cosmogony, where too everything is standing still, only now everything is full of light, while in the first state it was dark.)

Example 2. As a second example I would like to mention The Chymical Marriage of Christian Rosenkreutz in the Year 1459 (written anonymously by Joh. Valentin Andreä about 1602, first edition, Strasbourg, 1616).

This is a treatise written in allegorical form and with a great deal of humor. In part it is very difficult to understand, so that it was possible for some of the author's contemporaries to take it as mere persiflage. The whole action transpires within seven days which represent the seven stages of transformation. I give the resumé of the first day only, and would like to call attention to the striking analogies with gnostic tradition to be found in this story.

On the day before Easter, there appeared to Christian Rosenkreutz a heavenly virgin who brought him a letter (this is the divine messenger, the awakening). This letter is an invitation to the heavenly marriage which is to take place only under certain conditions. As he reads what these conditions are, he breaks into a cold sweat of terror because he does not believe he can possibly fulfil them.

The following dream comes to him then in his sleep: He is with some other people in a dark tower and they are held fast by heavy chains (compare Ormuzd fettered in matter). After a long period of suffering, they hear music; the roof of the tower is opened so that light falls in, and a man hoary with age calls out that his mother (nature, corresponding to the Mother of the Living in some gnostic teachings) had commanded a rope to be lowered seven times. Those who could hold fast to it would be drawn up to the light (liberated). A wild struggle then ensues, because all want to be saved and the result is that most of them drag one another down and only a few are able to cling to the rope. Some of them, who were too heavy and yet who refused to let go, had their arms torn from their bodies, so great was the desire to get out. Finally the dreamer himself succeeded, by chance, in getting out and then had to help, as the others had done before, with the final pulling up of the rope.

Then the tower was closed up again. The old man spoke words of comfort to the prisoners remaining behind, but that did not prevent them from breaking out into a bitter lament. Those who had escaped were freed of their chains. Then the dreamer awoke and understood that he could now start off for the wedding.

As in this story, in alchemistic writings generally, the old man often appears only at the beginning of the story. A striking feature of this piece is the complete helplessness of the imprisoned people—not only is a way shown to them, but they must be literally pulled out of their predicament.

Dr. Jung: Thank you very much. You have gathered a great deal of interesting material. It is perhaps a bit difficult for some of you to follow, because it is chiefly collected from literature of which you may not be aware and from spheres of experience which are probably very strange to you, but it gives you a certain impression of the universality of the old wise man. And you noticed, of course, that this archetype appears under particular conditions—when a man is in a hole, for instance, or when he is fettered or in prison, or in a situation where he needs help. What would that denote?

Mrs. Crowley: That he is a redeemer, a savior.

Dr. Allemann: The helper.

Dr. Jung: Yes, or the medicine man simply, who is called in when something is wrong. So the wise old man and the complicated or dangerous situation belong together; one could say that when man is in a difficult situation, there is a chance of this archetype appearing. He hardly ever comes just out of the blue, but only in a moment when he is really needed. Then you also noticed that it was in particular periods in real history that a man who embodied this image made himself noticeable. When would that be?

Prof. Reichstein: In a time of disorientation, when there was no great living symbol; in the beginning of our era for instance, and in the Middle Ages at the time of the Reformation. Perhaps also at the time of the Egyptian Thoth.

Dr. Jung: Yes, but we are too little informed about the history of the Egyptian mind to know under what conditions Thoth came to the foreground; that figure extends over a period of three to four thousand years. You mentioned another example, however, where we can observe how a religion originated: the calling and enlightenment of Zarathustra would be an instance. Of course we also know very little of those days, but we can gather from his teaching that he appeared when the religion of the time had degenerated into ordinary vulgar black magic, such as Taoism became in China. In recent years there has been a revival of Taoism in China, but it had deteriorated previously into sort of street magic—soothsayers, and astrologers who made horoscopes, even the oracles of the I Ching were cast in the streets. The priests were mere jugglers, and the classical Taoist philosophy was practically gone. Zarathustra encountered such a condition in Persia, and his teaching had chiefly the purpose of destroying that luxuriant weed of superstition and popular magic. Religions have always had the tendency to degenerate into those low magic rites and customs, like the Catholicism of the 15th century, when they made money out of the grace of heaven. This was a most disturbing fact to the people who still had some idea of a decent religion, and was indirectly the cause of the German Reformation. They broke loose from the church which had declined so far as to sell the grace of heaven; it was a sort of regeneration brought about through the degeneration which had existed before. So even in the time of Zarathustra, about the ninth century B.C., we can observe that archetype. The wise old man has probably forever played its part in human history, and has become collectively manifest whenever the supreme ideas which regulate our lives have turned into dirt.

Dr. Jung: That is true. You know, the primitive idea of the creation of a world is the creation out of the mind. The old cosmogonies are really sort of symbolical representations of human thought; they represent a mental creation, in other words. That is very clearly seen in the Vedic hymns, in the Rigveda for instance, where it is said that the world took its origin from the prayer of a sage; it was a sort of invention hatched out of the head. You see, this symbol comes from the fact that the world does not exist if there is nobody who is conscious of its existence; no statement could be made of the existence of the world if there were no consciousness to make the statement, and without that no world exists. What exists unconsciously might just as well be non-existent. That is, of course, the character of the world as understood by Hindu philosophy: it is existent nonexistent.

Now we have here a question by Mr. Allemann. He says: "I am a little bewildered by the fact that on the one hand many of the texts concerning the old wise man insist on the fact that teacher and pupil are one, and on the other hand I see by the example of Nietzsche, Steiner, Inayat Khan, and others, how dangerous it is to identify with this archetype. Is it that the identification can only take place while man is on an exalted level, and this identification has to be very clearly broken in ordinary life?

“Example of texts: ‘An invocation to Hermes’ (Mead, Hermes): ‘Mayest thou come into my mind and heart for all the length of my life’s days and bring unto accomplishment all things my soul desires. For thou art I and I am thou.’

“‘Logos from the gospel of Eve’ (Mead, Hermes): ‘I stood on a lofty mountain, and saw a gigantic man and another a dwarf; and I heard as it were a voice of thunder, and drew nigh for to hear, and he spake unto me and he said: I am thou and thou art I, and wheresoever thou mayest be, I am there. In all I am scattered, and whencesoever thou wilt, thou gatherest me, and gathering me, thou gatherest thyself.’ In the mysteries of Isis the mystes became Helios.”

That is, of course, not quite the same thing, because Helios is a god. Well, the mere fact that it is so easy and almost normal to identify with an archetype is clearly shown by Nietzsche’s Zarathustra. It is obvious that Nietzsche is identical with Zarathustra because he takes him as a sort of poetical figure, a creation of his own mind; unknowingly he assumes that he is producing an archetype while in reality the archetype exists by itself. It is just the peculiar thing about an archetype that you have the feeling of having produced it, yet the archetype is always self-existing and you are simply the victim of the illusion that you have made it. That is the disastrous thing which leads us astray. So it is of the highest importance, practically, to learn that there are things in our minds which are not of our own make.

For instance, suppose you have an intuition about a certain fact or condition; then you have the feeling that you are somehow the creator of that intuition, as when you see a thing, you can, of course, say it is your seeing it that causes this kind of experience. So when you have an intuition of something, it may be that you cannot apply it to anything outside of you, and therefore think it is mere fantasy which you have created, because it clearly came up in yourself. You can see that in experiments in telepathy, for example, particularly with untrained mediums; a professional medium, of course, knows that such a telepathic intuition is a perception. But an untrained, naive person doesn’t assume right away that he can be aware of something real outside himself. He is only aware of a certain thought which comes, and he just thinks it is funny that his mind is occupied by such an idea and wonders how the devil it got there. That is what he says at least, but he means all the time that his mind has created the idea, not knowing that this is projected upon him by somebody in the next room who is concentrating upon that object. The one who perceives, that is, wonders why it is in his mind as if it were his own doing. You see, when the light suddenly comes on in a room, you don't wonder that you see the light, and you don't think it is your own invention. You quietly think somebody has switched on the light. But if you feel suddenly as if a light had been switched on within you, then you wonder how on earth you have come to that idea, why do you think that somebody has switched on a light in you? Now, the real cause for it is that somebody has in fact switched on the light; somebody has concentrated upon that idea and wanted to transmit it into your mind. But you handle it as if it were your own invention. That often happens, and I observe it in myself.

For example, I see a patient and say, "Good morning, how do you do, please sit down," and in that moment a thought is crossing my mind, a vivid image of something, and instantly the patient begins to tell me a dream containing just that. I simply got it from her. Or it may be that a case is in a particular condition and when I get up in the morning, I think, "Oh, so-and-so is coming today. I must not forget to tell him or her such-and-such a thing." That seems to me of great importance, so the moment the patient sits down I begin to talk, and it happens that I speak of things that occurred in dreams she has had the night before, or two nights before, which I thought I had invented. I once had a most peculiar dream from Sunday to Monday. I dreamed that I was in my consulting room with a patient, an unknown youngish person, and was quite bewildered by what she told me, but finally discovered that it was the most complicated father complex I had ever observed. I asked myself, "What on earth does that mean? Is my anima under such a father complex?" I could not make head or tail of it. Now I had a consultation marked in my book for five o'clock, but I had forgotten entirely who it was, such an appointment being made a fortnight before perhaps. Well, I came into my waiting room and there was a youngish woman whom I had never seen before. I took her into my room and she began to talk. I thought, "Damn, what is she talking about? I have no idea what she is driving at," when suddenly I understood that it referred to the father and that it must be quite a particular case. Then instantly my dream jumped into my memory, and it was really exactly as I had dreamt it the night before. You see, I wondered why I made such a dream—as the Frenchman says, J'ai fait un rêve—as if it were my own invention. As a matter of fact, of course that girl thought: tomorrow I am going to Dr. Jung. She broadcast it, and as I am a sensitive receiver I got it.

Mr. Baumann: I think I have told already how Mark Twain saved a postage stamp: He wrote the letter and took it near the postbox but he didn't have to mail it; he only thought about it, and then he went home and the other person answered it.

Dr. Jung: Well, I would not swear that it was exactly like that, but such things do happen, as you all know. But the point is this, that when you have such an intuition you are always inclined to think you made it yourself. So with dreams we should always leave a door open: it might be a telepathic effect. I have observed in numbers of my own dreams most absurd facts which I could not place anywhere in my life, and a few weeks later they happened in reality. From that I learned that one has intuitions about things which are really outside of ourselves and we simply imagine that we are responsible for them. It is the same with that wise old man or with any archetype; when it comes up in us, we are identical with it to begin with and then we must learn to detach ourselves from it. Therefore, one should always say, "I am not thou."

But if a man says: "For thou art I and I am thou," as in Mr. Allemann's quotation, it is a very different situation. That is a magic incantation. He is making an incantation to the Logos or to the wise old man, announcing himself as a relation or a son to the other side of himself. It is exactly like contemplating the Eastern orthodox mandala: you put yourself into the god, saying, "I am thou, and thou art I." But that can only be in a situation which is already ritualized. The psychological experience is just the reverse. I told you recently how mandalas have been invented: the old wise man wanted to know what things were, so he began to draw circles, and then disciples came and thought that was it, and they also drew circles and thought they had it. But making circles means nothing; you must have an experience which can be expressed in forms of the mandala or otherwise. Just making drawings does not mean that you have gotten it. You see, those dogmatic representations, those rites in the religious world, are often expressions of experiences, and later on they are used in order to remember them, to bring the experiences back into the human mind. But that is already the process of feeling into, what we call Anempfindung. That word cannot be translated; it means creating a situation in which you make believe, as if you yourself belonged to it. For example, suppose you build an antique house. Of course, you must have central heating, but it is hidden behind marble work of some kind, and you wear an antique toga and recline at the table when you eat, although what you eat is cooked on an electric cooking range, and you feel exactly like Plato or any one of those old sinners. That is Anempfindung. There are any number of examples. If you know something of the life of the poet Maeterlinck, you get it—an old monastery, madonnas, moonlight nights—you feel very medieval.<sup>4</sup> Now, that becomes inevitable when the original experience is lost, when the pupils don't experience what the master has experienced. They ought to know really in order to make circles. So this "Thou art I and I am thou" is a magic invocation to force the Logos, or whatever name is applied to the old wise man, to come down and admit the one who is praying to him to be raised to his social status.

But the original experience, becoming aware of the objective presence of the archetype, is just the reverse. Nietzsche's poem proves that originally he had the experience of Zarathustra as being different, split off even from himself, so that he could not say, "Thou art I." He could only say: "You are Zarathustra and I am Professor Nietzsche." But then there was no Mr. Zarathustra living anywhere near Maloja in the Engadine, nor was he in Basel. Nietzsche was not true to his original experience; he had no pistis, no loyalty, no confidence in it. He said to himself that it was hardly possible that Zarathustra should be a reality who really had separated himself from him. You know, the Bible teaches us that the woman was taken out of the body of Adam, having been one of his ribs. That shows a reality that became a separate reality from Adam, though made of his flesh and his blood and his bone. And so it is with that experience of the wise old man; if Nietzsche had been true to his original experience, he would have understood that Zarathustra was somebody else with a life of his own, a separate being. For an archetype has a life of its own; the life that is proper and peculiar to the archetype shows its autonomy by the fact that it can swallow one's own life. It is so strong that one can be swallowed up into it and be nothing but that archetype. Of course, one does not know it but other people can see it.

Well now, if that fact is accepted, then naturally an intercourse begins between man and the personified archetype, from which it becomes finally obvious that that archetype is in a peculiar way man, as man is an archetype; that is, a widening out of consciousness comes about in which the archetype is included. That is why we analyse the unconscious. We try to bring it into our scope. We try to extend consciousness even over the sphere of the unconscious, and finally we see that the psychical experience includes those archetypes. And then it is not that I am the wise old man, or that the wise old man is myself, because there is no longer that "I myself"; the wise old man is not contained in the "I myself," but is contained in the self. So you can say—and we see it with Nietzsche—that the wise old man is also a personification of the self. But the self is still more powerful because it is not only inclusive of the wise old man but of that young stupid fool, man: the self contains both. So the identity with the archetype forms an experience which only takes place after a long intercourse with the archetypes; such a pupil becomes master only when he has been long enough a pupil. He acquires mastership in the moment when he understands what kind of experience the master represents, when he has the same experience practically.

Mrs. Baynes: I would like to push it one step further and ask how it comes that the wise old man is identified with God?

Dr. Jung: Well, the wise old man is always a personification of God. That is why we represent God with a long white beard sitting upon a golden throne. I have brought you a book where you can see a picture of this wise old man in his medieval alchemistic form; it is the book of tears and flames, passion and repentance. Here is the wise old man being the image of God: he is the Word. Thoth for instance, is the anticipation of the Logos, so he is also the anticipation of Christ inasmuch as Christ is the Logos. Now peculiarly enough, the temple of Thoth is called the house of the net—the fisherman's net—and the Babylonian Marduk is the Logos and his attribute is also the net. Then the Pope, as the head of the church, is the living impersonation of the Logos, the church being the body of Christ. He is in the place of Peter who is the representative of Christ, endowed with the apostolic blessing, the grace or the mana that has emanated from the Lord himself. And the Pope's attribute is the fisher ring upon which is carved the miraculous draft of fishes with the nets. You see, the Logos worked like a net which gathered in mankind like a swarm of fishes; the power of the word, a concept, an idea, a point of view, is really like a net. It constellates, it brings together, it unites. You learn once that two things are the same and they will remain the same forever. This is the creative power of the mind.

So this Logos quality of the old man puts him right in loco dei, as Christ is the visible face of God; he is in a way like the Old Testament conception of the Angel of the Face.<sup>5</sup> In Islamic mysticism the Sufi god is the same idea; Chidr, the green one, is the visible element or god. My Somali headman explained to me that Chidr is the first angel of God, meaning the visibility of Allah who is without form, without appearance, without quality. But Chidr is visible; his mind can be seen as man can be seen, as light can be seen or a blade of grass. He has shape. The old wise man, then, is a sort of visible god because he is the word of god—the word that became flesh. You see, according to our biblical ideas, God is sitting on his throne surrounded by his angels, with his orchestra playing on harps and trumpets and so on, and he has a long beard exactly like the old fellow in this book. And it is a curious fact that the same figure occurs in an entirely different book, Les Tableaux des Riches Inventions.<sup>6</sup> This book was published in Paris in 1600, a reproduction of a much older one, but the frontispiece dates from about 1589. And here is a German book of 1588, printed in Basel, in which there is the same figure, of course with certain variations. This shows that there must have been a tradition—there were typical symbols. In both, you find the lion with its paws cut off, for instance. We don't know where they originated, but one thing seems to be certain: there is hardly a trace of these symbols before the 15th century. As a rule, they date from the time of the Reformation.

My idea is that they are another manifestation of the wise old man who was again teaching symbols, having appeared in a time when there was particular need of him. And that great need simply came from the fact that, until that moment, everybody had had the great advantage of confession and absolution; then, that suddenly became obsolete, and instantly people discovered an impossible moral conflict from which there was no redemption, no absolution. Nobody told them that they were absolved—they were never absolved—and that created an intolerable tension. Therefore, the old man came and told them they should make images in order to solve their problems by the priesthood within. The whole church became introverted, and the institution of the church became introverted, and that brought about these series of pictures. They are exactly what you can observe in your own drawings; we have such picture-series again in our days because we also are confronted with moral problems which we cannot solve, which are impossible—much worse than those in the year 1500. But, of course, their problems were as bad to them as ours are to us in the present time.

<sup>6</sup> A member of the seminar, Linda Fierz-David, was to publish The Dream of Poliphilo, first in German (1947) and then in an English translation by Mary Hottinger (Princeton, B.S. XXI, 1956). Jung wrote the foreword for this work of interpretation.

LECTURE I

23 January 1935

Prof. Jung:

Ladies and Gentlemen: We were speaking a while ago of the Oxyrhynchus papyrus. Do you remember in what connection?

Mrs. Fierz: The Ein-siedler and the Zwei-siedler.

Prof. Jung: Yes, I said that Nietzsche, by this play of words, brings in the idea that if there are two together—not just one alone—they also can produce the Superman. And I said that this idea was expressed in the New Testament where Jesus says: “For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.” But in the Oxyrhynchus papyrus, which is probably older than the first conception of the Gospels, that saying is quoted as follows: “Wherever there are two they are not without God, and wherever there is one alone I say I am with him.” There, you see, the emphasis is on the Ein-siedler, the hermit, and where there are two together it is of secondary importance, though “they are not without God.” You remember I read from the Greek text the original publication by Grenfell and Hunt, and I pointed out that the hand of the church had wiped out the very passage that is particularly emphasized in the original conception, “where there is one alone,” and only the remaining passage is left in, “where two or three are gathered together in my name,” which means that only in a community is God present, but when there is one alone the devil knows what happens to such a fellow. In other words, outside the walls of the church there is no salvation, for one alone cannot make a church. That is the way the church has backed up her claim of being the means of grace, the intercessus divinus, the mediatrix between God and man. Our theologians have never wanted to know about these papyri apparently, despite the fact that they are at least of equal authority with the New Testament. And now Mr. Allemann has just given me a very remarkable document humain, a book by a theologian who does know about them, called Die Ersten Christen Quellen, quotations from ancient pagan writings concerning the sources of Christianity. Here he quotes from the Oxyrhynchus papyrus, 1897-1914, by Grenfell and Hunt: "Wherever there are two together they are never men without God."<sup>1</sup> But "wherever there is one alone" is not mentioned. You see, it is just a downright cheat, a four-square cheat, and that happens in 1935! He has entirely misquoted it. It is a conscious fraud. Eberhard Arnold is the man's name, Leipzig.

Miss Wolff: Is he a Catholic?

Prof. Jung: No, a Protestant. Oh, Catholics won't quote it at all; they are not so stupid. But this Protestant thinks he can pull wool over our eyes.

Well now, we began before Christmas with the chapter called "Backworldsmen," and we spoke of the play of words in the title. Then I read you the first part but I think I had better go over it again. You see, in reading Zarathustra, one is apt to just slur over it. It sounds like something and one simply ceases to think: it is like wine.

Once on a time, Zarathustra also cast his fancy beyond man, like all backworldsmen.

Ah, ye brethren, that God whom I created was human work and human madness, like all the Gods!

We must think a little more about this picture he is painting of his idea of theology. Is this a Christian picture? What kind of theology does it presuppose?

Miss Hannah: You said last time it was the super-Protestant.

Prof. Jung: And what kind of theology is that?

Mrs. Brunner: Indian.

Prof. Jung: It would be more Indian and Gnostic than Christian. Now he says, "The work of a suffering and tortured God, did the world then seem to me." What is that exactly?

Miss Hannah: Schopenhauer, is it not?

Prof. Jung: Schopenhauer is in it. But does the blind creative will of Schopenhauer suffer?

Miss Hannah: The suffering crucified God is Christian.

Prof. Jung: Well, Christ is the son of God, he is not the creator. Elohim or Jahveh are the creators of the world, according to Christianity, and Elohim did not suffer, nor did Jahveh. He was very angry at times, but only other people suffered from it—that was his purpose. The next source for that suffering idea in Nietzsche is Schopenhauer, but do you think that the blind creative will to existence suffers?

Prof. Fierz: No, the will doesn't complain about the suffering. Schopenhauer complains.

Prof. Jung: Yes, man complains, and man is the result of that will. The will had a bad dream, which just happened to be a world in which there were suffering beings; but they knew they were suffering, and inasmuch as they were manifestations or incarnations of the preexisting will, they had the possibility of holding a mirror to the face of that will, showing him what he was: that in his endless desirousness, he was creating evil and suffering. And Schopenhauer's idea of salvation is that when the will, through man, through the intellect, sees and understands that he is creating evil and suffering, he will desist, and then the world will come to an end. Now this is of course an Eastern idea. In what kind of Eastern teaching do we encounter it—with this specific idea of suffering?

Mr. Allemann: It is more in Buddhism than in Hinduism.

Prof. Jung: Yes. You see, in Schopenhauer's time the knowledge of Eastern religious systems was very restricted. Schopenhauer only knew a few Buddhist writings which had been translated, the Oupnekat, a very corrupt form of the Upanishads, and a collection of about fifty Upanishads translated into Latin by Anquetil du Perron.<sup>2</sup> Otherwise they were unknown in Europe. The main source, then, for his philosophy was this knowledge of Buddhism, and there, as you know, the central teaching is that concupiscentia, desirousness, is the sole cause of suffering; if one can bring one's desires to an end, one brings the suffering of the world to an end. So redemption, or salvation, consists in leading the created back into the non-created, the non-existent. For instance, in the epic description of Buddha's death, the Nahaparimbana-sutra, the great disappearance, Buddha returns to the utter non-existence which is called nirvana or nibbana. But that is not what we would understand by "not being," which is a mere negation; Nirvana is a positive non-being, which we cannot render in our language because we have no conception of a thing which is positively non-existing. To the Buddhist it is as if non-existence were just as much a quality as existence.

That is because the original Indian idea was that there are two forms of existence. The one is a potential existence expressed in Tantrism, for instance, as the Shiva bindu, the unextended point in which the god is dormant before his expansion, or his manifestation. The other is an extended or actual existence expressed by the Kundalini coiled three and a half times round the linga, as you see it in the muladhara chakra. That is the first manifestation of the god; he already appears, but he is still in a dormant condition. The latent or potential existence of course cannot be depicted, but it is always contained in the Shiva bindu, that little point from which a bridge is usually shown leading to the two inset medallions, the second one containing the corresponding divinity Shakti, the form which is characteristic for the state of Shiva in that particular chakra. But the god himself and with him the whole manifestation of the world, is latent inside that one bindu, because the world, according to this particular branch of Eastern philosophy, is always existing and non-existing at the same time. Inasmuch as there is existence, there is non-existence.

So this full expanse of world that we see is at the same time non-existent. Therefore they call it Maya, illusion. The meaning of illusion is thoroughly negative to us, but in the East that is not so. The word Maya, as you heard in the Hauer Seminar,<sup>3</sup> comes from the root ma which means mater, materia, and maya means building material; so the illusion is building power. If you have an illusion you have built something; something exists which is different from yourself or different from the creator. Illusion is not negative, therefore; it is the positive appearance of the world, or really the positive existence. We have here, then, a philosophy which came from India through the medium of Schopenhauer by whom Nietzsche was much influenced. This passage: "The dream—and diction—of a God, did the world then seem to me, coloured vapours before the eyes of a divinely dissatisfied one" is more or less the Schopenhauer viewpoint. But there is one point which is not Schopenhauer. What is that?

Mrs. Brunner: The personality of God. It is a personal God who suffers. He says his god has eyes and looks away from himself.

Prof. Jung: Yes, that he has eyes and is discontented shows that he must be different from his creation, whereas Schopenhauer's blind will is in participation mystique. It is the unconscious itself. Therefore, after Schopenhauer, von Hartmann appeared, with a philosophy very much like Schopenhauer's only he called this blind will "the unconscious.” He used that term.<sup>4</sup> But it was the same metaphysical factor that created the world, an unconscious creator that could not possibly be discontented because all eyes were his eyes. He saw nothing beyond himself because he was in everything. Would that be a Buddhistic idea? Is God discontented in Buddhism?

Mr. Allemann: God does not exist really.

Prof. Jung: Well, he is a sous-entendu.<sup>5</sup> But I never heard that there was anything like a discontented god in Buddhism.

Mrs. Baynes: I think you told us that the Gnostic idea was that God got horribly bored with the situation and created a world.

Prof. Jung: Yes, in the Jewish Gnosis God suffered from headache because he discovered that he was all alone. There was nothing but himself and he was tremendously extended, so he pulled himself together and formed a cloud, and the tension grew till suddenly lightning burst out of the cloud, and that was the first sun, the first light. There is also a Hindu parallel in the Upanishads. There again you find the idea of that lonely suffering god who is so intensely bored with himself that he must do something about it, and so, like a toy, he creates a world—he dreams a world to relieve his loneliness, to have an object.<sup>6</sup>

Now this is an intensely male philosophy, while the Tantric philosophy assumes the coexistence of an equally important female creative principle, the Shakti of the god. And the female principle is so strong that Shiva himself is represented at times as a female. I have a Tibetan picture of him dancing on the burial ground in his female form, the form of his own Shakti. So in Tantrism the idea of creation is a different one; the Shakti really creates through her own will. Of course, Shiva enjoys his creative ideas in the creation of the Shakti, and Shakti realizes the creative thoughts of her husband in the form of the abundance of the world. Shiva in himself is always in a creative dream, but his dream would not come off if the Shakti did not realize his dream and therewith create the beauty and the suffering of the world. You see, that is an entirely different conception, and it is most characteristic that Nietzsche emphasizes the masculine form, the loneliness of the suffering creator who created the world in order to relieve his infinite boredom. Therefore, he says, "Intoxicating joy is it for the sufferer to look away from his suffering and forget himself."

<sup>6</sup> “In the beginning this world was Soul (Atman) alone in the form of a Person. . . . Verily, he had no delight. . . . He desired a second. [Being himself both man and woman, he split in half and the halves copulated.] . . . Thence arose creation.” Brihad-Aranyaka Upanishad I, 4, 1-5, in Hume*, p. 81. For the Jewish Gnosis, or Kabbalah, see below, 23 June 1937, n. 8.

Then he says, "This world, the eternally imperfect, an eternal contradiction's image and imperfect image—an intoxicating joy to its imperfect creator:—thus did the world once seem to me." Here he lays stress upon the imperfection of the world. You see, in the Old Testament the idea is that the creator is perfect and creates a perfect world, and the only regrettable and damnable thing is that man makes a mistake. Of course, one could ask why man was made in such a way that he made the mistake, for which a clock-maker has made a bad clock, the clock is not held responsible. Now where does that idea of imperfection come from?

Prof. Fierz: It is Gnostic.

Prof. Jung: Yes, specifically Gnostic, though I don't know whether Nietzsche ever studied Gnosticism or whether it is his own invention. The demiurgos was by no means a universal god, but a sort of sub-god, a secondary god, an angel or demon who in his vanity created a world.<sup>7</sup> It was only a material world though he was quite satisfied with his work and thought he had made something very wonderful and perfect. Then he looked up and saw a light which he realized he had not created, so he lifted himself up to see what it was and came to another world, the world of the spiritual father, the real God, and thus he understood that he had made a mistake. And then the father of the spiritual world took pity on those half-conscious worms, human beings, whom the demiurgos had made without consciousness enough to see their own imperfection; and he sent his son in the form of the first snake in Paradise to teach the first parents to eat from the tree of knowledge. So despite the evil invention of the demiurgos, when they had eaten they could understand the difference between good and evil, and that was the way to salvation.

Now whether Nietzsche got this idea from the Gnosis, I don't know. As a boy and during his early years Nietzsche read a good deal, but later he read astonishingly little, because his nerves and his eyes gave him no end of trouble. His neurosis began really when he was a very young man; I think he was about twenty-four when he became a professor at Basel and he soon became neurotic. So it is quite possible that he had not read about Gnosticism, particularly because it was then in ill repute. He would have asked his friend Professor Overbeck, a professor of religion, who would most certainly have told him that it was only imagination, unsound thinking, and all that. And then, you see, he came to the conclusion that that image of God—the kind of theology which claims the metaphysical existence of a God—was all man's work and man's madness. He cut the whole thing down.

Prof. Fierz: I think the conception that man has made God, instead of God having made man, came from Feuerbach.<sup>8</sup>

Prof. Jung: It is possible, but I assume he would not have been particularly delighted with Feuerbach even if he had read him. But that idea was in the air generally. You see, Darwin became known then, and he was most horribly shocking to late Christianity and caused many people to lose their faith. I remember that time very well, and know how Darwin's views were received in my set; it was whispered that there was a dreadful person who said that man came from the monkeys; and it was quite particularly awful because the scientists seemed to back him up. It was the age of materialism, and though Nietzsche's philosophy is of course not a banal materialism, he understood that it was necessary to have that kind of critique. The time was not ripe for a psychological conception of the deity; either a thing was real or it was not. Anything so subtle as analytical psychology was beyond the mind of those times. So for Nietzsche the dilemma was: if there is a god, he must have a metaphysical existence as concrete as this table, or he does not exist. And he came to the conclusion that he did not, though that conclusion was less rigorous than is usually supposed—we will find a passage later where Nietzsche leaves a door open.

Now we will go on:

A man was he, and only a poor fragment of a man and ego. Out of mine own ashes and glow it came unto me, that phantom. And verily, it came not unto me from the beyond!

<sup>8</sup> Ludwig Andrew Feuerbach (1804-1872), an important link between Hegel and Marx, developed in The Essence of Christianity (1841) a naturalistic interpretation of religion. Nietzsche would have approved this approach, but his only written mention of him had to do with Feuerbach's "healthy sensuality" as an influence on Wagner. Genealogy, #3.

What does he convey by the sentence: "From mine own ashes and flame came that phantom"?

Mrs. Dürler: It is a contradiction.

Prof. Jung: One is the outcome of the other; the ashes are the result of the flame.

Mr. Allemann: It is the living body, a process of combustion.

Miss Wolff: In German it is Asche und Glut. That means the flame has burned down—it is not an actual flame—and out of what is left God is made.

Prof. Jung: Well, as Mr. Allemann rightly pointed out, the living process of the body is a combustion, and out of that God is made. The living body is the originator of the god. Now how is that?

Dr. Escher: It is the living energy.

Prof. Jung: Yes, living energy is in the body in the form of combustion, oxidation, but how does that living process form the god?

Mrs. Jung: Suffering might be understood as combustion. Then as the world is created by the suffering of the creator, so God is created by the suffering, the combustion of man.

Prof. Jung: Ah, yes. You are right.

Prof. Fierz: I think Asche means his body and Glut his spirit, Körper und Geist.

Prof. Jung: No, they are more or less the same; the one is still hot and the other no longer hot. One uses that kind of simile when one wants to express conflagration and the outcome—that a great passion has burnt itself out, for instance, and what remains are glowing embers and ashes. So I should say that he refers here to a conflagration that has taken place in himself, and out of the result he has made his god. You will find in the next paragraph, "I carried mine own ashes to the mountain; a brighter flame I contrived for myself." So there must have been a fire, and then he invented a new flame. Nietzsche often uses that fire simile, and to him it seems to always mean a passionate life, a passionate conflagration of emotions and interests, a passionate understanding of the pathos of life. That is what he expresses here. If we reconstruct the underlying idea, it is that he had the idea of fire or a conflagration in his mind, and the intensity of that process had a destructive influence, and then out of that came that former idea of God. In other words, he projected his own suffering into God. And his God is metaphysical; he did not put God into himself, he put him out in the extra-mundane existence, into the cosmos, and assumed that his own suffering was that God's suffering.

Prof. Reichstein: He says "only a poor fragment of a man and ego," which would mean that this God is made of his ego standpoint, the material standpoint, and the expression "ashes and embers" explains this.

Prof. Jung: It is synonymous. The ashes and embers would be that poor piece of humanity. It is Nietzsche the man himself who has undergone a passionate conflagration, and he projected this experience into a metaphysical suffering God. In other words, he made the attempt not to accept that suffering as his own.

Remark: Is it not specially the resignation of man that is the ashes?

Prof. Jung: One could say it was a sort of resignation, in that he assumes it is God's suffering, and is incapable of accepting the truth that it is his own. That is the reason why there have always been suffering gods, not only at the beginning of our era, but long before. Osiris, one of the oldest gods of Egypt, was a suffering God; they have existed for an eternity, quite apart from the god-kings, who, when they were old or when the crops failed or the cattle died, were put to death because their mana or medicine power had gone wrong. There were many suffering gods in Asia Minor. Christ is only one of them. Prometheus is also a divine sufferer, for instance. So there has always been a tendency to project the suffering into a divine figure. Why is that so? Why can't one accept it as obviously one's own?

Mrs. Sigg: I think Nietzsche's whole life was looking away from himself. He created his work and totally neglected his own existence, and so he was identical with the creator.

Prof. Jung: A creator would say it was his own suffering; but no, he projected it into a metaphysical creator. He was identical and just did not know it.

Mrs. Baynes: Would it not be true to say he swung between two poles, the psychological and the philosophical? First he looked over the past to see how the idea of God had been taken. He made a philosophical critique and repudiated it. Then he looked within himself and found the same psychological situation that created the gods before, as we have just said, and called it by a new name.

Prof. Jung: That is rather complicated, but there is something in it.

Dr. Schlegel: I should say he projected it in order to be able to tolerate it better.

Prof. Jung: Yes, to endure it; that is what I wanted to hear. For example, if you try to sleep when suffering from toothache or any other painful ailment, you are apt to dream that somebody else is in the same bed and has that toothache; you make a difference between yourself, quite comfortable, and somebody else who suffers. You see, our psychology is easily disintegrated. It disintegrates every night; one part of the system is suffering and another is not, because they are separated from each other. It is quite a usual occurrence that we simply split off the suffering part. The phenomenon of the so-called Hexenschlaf, the witches' sleep, is an example. You also see it in the Malleus Maleficarum, in the Middle Ages, which is about the diagnosis of witches.<sup>9</sup> When they were submitted to the torture, it often happened that those women just fell asleep, or they fainted away. They got into a state in which the body became absolutely anaesthetic, no sensation whatever. And you can hypnotize suitable subjects to such an extent that they lose the sensation of the body completely. I made an experiment once with a young girl at the Polyklinik. She was a bit hysterical, and I told one of my assistants to entangle her in an interesting conversation. He was a nice young man and it went beautifully, and then I went up behind her and pushed a needle into her neck about a centimeter deep. It would naturally be painful and she did not even wince, but her pupils contracted. The physiological person felt the pain, but her whole libido was in the man and withdrawn from the surface of the body, so she felt nothing consciously. That explains why in war a wound received during action is not noticed; only when there is a lull is it suddenly discovered. In the excitement of the moment it is not felt because the libido is concentrated on something else.

This is a general mechanism and it looks as if it underlay Nietzsche's philosophy; his idea that man has created the suffering God is in order to get rid of the acute realization of his own misery. There is a great deal in that. If you study the suffering of the Christian god, you will see that this explanation fits the situation. We are even taught to put our suffering upon him and that he will carry it for us; we leave all our sorrows for him to take care of. He redeems us from the eternal pain in hell through his self-sacrifice; he undergoes the excruciating agony of a terrible death on the cross in order to save us from an analogous pain. Therefore, we cling naturally to that hero-god, for then we are unconscious of our suffering. It is a fact that one is quite capable of being unconscious of suffering, and particularly can one be unconscious of moral suffering. For instance, you can say your stomach is ailing, but in reality it is a moral situation which you cannot stomach. Or perhaps you have a pain which you call rheumatism, but if you had that pain in connection with the real cause, if you realized what that so-called rheumatism meant, you would undergo a most acutely painful moral or psychological problem. So the more people are in the church, the more they escape psychological suffering—to such an extent that they have no problems when they are good Catholics; and good Protestants can economize a good deal on moral problems by putting their suffering upon the Lord. They say, “It is a very peculiar situation and I don’t know what to do, but I don’t need to worry; I put everything upon the Lord and hope that he will do his job. I am glad in Jesus, fröhlich in Christus; he will take care of it.” This is surely very nice as long as it works, but it doesn’t work always.

We will continue our text:

What happened, my brethren? I surpassed myself, the suffering one; I carried mine own ashes to the mountain; . . .

What is the meaning of this?

Prof. Reichstein: Can it refer to the beginning where Zarathustra is quite alone on the mountain?

Prof. Jung: Quite so. He is alone with himself in his retreat. And according to this passage he carried his own ashes to the mountain. How do you understand this?

Mrs. Sigg: I think that is the western way of looking at one’s own illusions; he has had illusions and they burned down and became ashes.

Prof. Jung: Yes, one says an illusion has burned itself out or collapsed, like a house after a conflagration; and that process of conflagration is the acute suffering which has been projected into God. Now, by the understanding, or the confession, that God is dead, all the suffering which has been in God, returns to him, and so he carried his own ashes to the mountain. And he says, a brighter flame I contrived for myself.

Again a fire. What is this new flame?

Mr. Allemann: That is the idea of the Superman.

Prof. Jung: Exactly, because as soon as he says God is dead, he is God and then the inflation begins. The Superman is the deification of the ordinary man, and that is the new flame. Therefore, he says,

And lo! Thereupon the phantom withdrew from me!

This means of course that the projection came to an end. You see, the former condition, despite all the allusions to Hindu or Buddhist philosophy, was also a Christian situation in which the suffering was projected onto a suffering God; and now, by denying the extra-mundane metaphysical God, that whole so-called illusion has collapsed, and the suffering returns to him. That is the inevitable consequence. Is that right or wrong?

Mrs. Sigg: It might be a natural process, because first Nietzsche accepted the conventional God, and then Zarathustra grew out of his own material, one could say, out of his own soul; it is his own god really.

Prof. Jung: Yes, but that is an interpretation of Zarathustra. I want to know whether this process is legitimate, or if there is any cheat about it.

Prof. Reichstein: The cheat is his saying that he has invented the flame. But it might be a beginning of something else.

Prof. Jung: I am glad you have pointed out that he says "I invented." You see he has invented before also. He said he invented a god, and that is man's work, man's madness; it is an artificial product. It shows that he trusts his mind with almost uncanny powers. If he criticized such a statement carefully, he would soon see that was impossible, for the idea of a god existed long before Nietzsche. It did not originate with him. What happened to him was that, being human, born in the herd, he adopted the ways of other people. He quite naturally accepted his metaphysical fate, the prevailing belief, and so participated in the general good of humanity. And then he says man invented it; that it is an illusion or something of the sort. You see, the fact that he comes to such a conclusion suggests to him that he can invent something else, invent that flame, as if it were his own activity. Now what is the psychological danger of such a formula?

Prof. Reichstein: It is identification, and it would create an inflation.

Prof. Jung: If somebody in practical analysis said he had invented such and such a thing, I would jump upon it with both feet instantly. You see we must be accurate in these matters; we cannot slur over them. If it is a matter of one's bank balance and one thinks like that, there is soon trouble. Or if it is a matter of a book and one assumes that one invented it, it is as if one claimed to have invented the Bible. That is just cheat. Nietzsche did not make "God"; that idea already existed. Of course, when one studies carefully how the idea of God came into existence at all, one can say that somebody once made an idea of it. But the fact was there long before. For we know that the primitive man sets out—not with the conviction, he does not need to have a conviction about it—but with the fact that his world is animated, full of spiritual life. Gods are in every tree, in every animal; the demon's voice is everywhere. So the existence of the divine presence was an original fact with which man was confronted. In the moment when he was confronted with any physical object, he was also confronted with the fact that this object was animated. The profound original fact is the divine presence. Then very much later people came to the notion that one can make an idea about it—that one can say, this is such and such a god, having such and such a quality, and one must do such and such things. But first of all, it was simply an animation, a presence, and they did not break their heads over what the presence was; they could hardly give a name to it. Or they simply called it numen, which is the Latin word for a hint; it is the nodding of the head, the divine presence or the divine power, like mana. One doesn't know what mana is; mana is an impression one gets, or it is the magic quality of the thing that impresses itself upon one. It has no form, no personality—there is no concept that would formulate it—yet it is an absolute fact.

So God has never been made. He has always been. Then slowly, with the increase of consciousness, when people discovered that they could make different ideas about the deity, they came to the conclusion that it was nothing but an idea, and they quite forgot the real phenomenon that is behind all the ideas. You see, they became so identical with the products of their own conscious that they thought there was a god; and of course God was there so they thought they had created him. But such abuse brings its own revenge. The more people created ideas about God, the more they depleted and devitalized nature. And then it looked as if that primordial fact of the world had only taken place in imagination. Of course, by that process we create consciousness, but we have built up a thick wall between ourselves and primordial facts, between ourselves and the divine presence. We are so far away that nobody knows what one is talking about when one speaks of that divine presence, and if anybody discovers it suddenly, he thinks it is most amazing; yet it is the most simple fact. But we are no longer simple enough on account of that thick wall of ideas; we have so many preconceived ideas about what the divine presence ought to be, that we have deprived ourselves of the faculty of seeing it. Yet the primordial facts are still in the world; they happen all the time, only we have given them so many names that we don't see the wood any longer on account of the trees.

Nietzsche easily is led into that error, therefore, of thinking that man has invented God and so can invent something else—therefore the inflation. For God is a fact that always has happened; it is just a mistake to think that God can be created by a magic performance or by calling magic names. Naturally, he is led in this way to the assumption that he can create a Superman. You see, he has readily undergone an objective psychological transformation, and he should see that as an objective fact. The moment you understand that the suffering of the God is your own suffering and that it ought to be—that it is simply primitive to leave your very personal suffering to a god—in that moment you are transformed: the suffering god has come into yourself. Then you are confronted with a terrible dilemma: Am I a miserable worm that suffers, or am I now the suffering god? And the one saving idea doesn't come into your head, that God is also a suffering worm. That is too paradoxical. For we have such an idea of what God ought to be that we cannot possibly conceive of the divine presence in a very small isolated fact.

But the primitive can easily conceive of the fact that God is this particular locust, or that particular bird, or particular flower; that is entirely acceptable to the primitive mind. It is the way they think. Therefore those three ways of the apparition of God in the Sufi religion, where God can also appear as a leaf of grass if he chooses. This is a psychological truth: that peculiar phenomenon which is called God, the experience of the divine intervention or presence, can be connected with anything. It is just a fact and the primitive mind acknowledges it, but we have ideas about it and think it is not possible; we think that God can only appear in certain prescribed ways. The fathers of the church were very strong in that respect; in order to make suitable differences between God and the devil they had to be careful to make a sort of casuistic wall about the ways in which God is allowed to appear. The primitive man is of course not disturbed by such considerations, because he never would extend his moral conceptions to the deity, who is to him beyond human conceptions. Of course, the more he extends his ideas, the more civilized he becomes: the more God is put into the prison of ideas. Nietzsche here decides obviously for the identification with the God and so he creates the Superman. He could have created the idea of the inferior man just as well, and that such an idea was in his mind too is shown towards the end of Zarathustra when the question of the ugliest man comes up. You see, the ugliest man is just as much the divine man as the Superman.

To me the convalescent would it now be suffering and torment to believe in such phantoms: suffering would it now be to me and humiliation. Thus speak I to backworldsmen.

He obviously means that it would be humiliating to him to assume that he could project his suffering into a god. For instance, suppose that a divine being really were living among us and that you could project your personal suffering into that man or woman, and he would be willing to carry every damned trouble you have. Then I hope you would be ashamed to do so, because by getting rid of your own trouble and your own responsibility, you would not grow up; you would remain a little child. You can only grow up when you say, "This is my business, my life; my suffering is my own and it cannot be projected into anybody else." Perhaps you project it into your father and say, "I am your son; you can carry the whole load. I cannot work and earn money because it hurts me. I cannot get along with people; you must get along with them for me." That is terribly infantile, but there again you have the theologians.

For instance, you remember in the Wandlungen und Symbole der Libido, I say the Christian teaching is that you must sacrifice your own childishness, for how can you become like unto a child when you are still a child?<sup>10</sup> First, you must overcome your childishness and then, after you have been an adult, you can become a child again. That is very clearly the teaching of Christ. But I got an article from a theologian which he had published in the Archives de Théologie in which he said that I, in flagrant contradiction to la parole du Maître, said that one should not remain a child; one should give up le sentiment filial. I did not trust my eyes! I simply gathered some quotations from the Latin text of the New Testament, and I put them on a postcard and sent it to that man. Then I must say he had the decency to put a little paragraph in the next edition of the "Archives de Théologie," in which he said, "Notre article sur le rôle du sentiment filial nous a valu la critique suivante de la part de Dr. Jung," and then he reproduced my postcard with the quotations. I am sure not one of the readers understood it, because they believe that you should always remain a little infant and then, out of your childhood, you simply slur over into the church, where you are still a child, or a sheep.

Dr. Escher: But that is the real standpoint of the clerical hierarchy.

Prof. Jung: Of course it is. And it is so unspeakably immoral that it needs a man like Nietzsche, who philosophizes with a hammer and smashes the whole damned lot.<sup>11</sup> It is immoral to keep people below their level; they must assume their responsibility and not project their doubts and God knows what into the Lord. Projecting our own difficulties onto God reminds me of the story of the sleepless man, which is a very good psychological example. There was a man who had to pay a debt the next day, and as he hadn't the money, he could not sleep. It was one o'clock and then it was two o'clock and then it was three, and he still could not sleep. It was a very cold night, and he made up his mind he must do something about it. So he got up and went to the house of his creditor and rang the bell, and after a long time he came to the window and said: "Who the devil is there?" And the man said: "I am, and I ought to pay you my debt tomorrow." And the creditor said: "Tomorrow morning is early enough to pay me." "But I have not the money," said the man. "You can tell me that tomorrow; why do you disturb me now?" "But I cannot sleep." "What the devil do I care for your sleep?" "Well, now I have told you, and I can sleep and you can't." So what you would not do to any human being, don't do to God.

<sup>10</sup> The Symbols of Transformation: An Analysis of the Prelude to a Case of Schizophrenia, on its initial publication in 1912, made clear the important differences between Jung's and Freud's conceptions of the symbol. As revised, the work appeared as CW 5.

LECTURE II

Prof. Jung:

We spoke of the suffering god last time, and I have brought you to-day a vision given me by a patient which is interesting in that connection. He is a youngish, educated man, who was originally a Jew, and he has also been a Catholic, but he has almost forgotten that. As a matter of fact, he believes in nothing in particular; he was not especially interested in religious problems, and was hardly bothered with such ideas at all until suddenly he had this vision of the crucifixus. He was very much gripped by it, so that he got into a state of ekstasis and heard a voice saying: "But Christ is not able to redeem you. If you could redeem yourself, he would be bleeding less. When men in general are able to redeem themselves, he will cease to bleed. It will then be like a song that has lost its significance." The vision was particularly important because it happened in a time when the man was not concerned with such problems. I have his dreams before and after, and there are very few that indicate anything of the kind; occasionally, certain hints occurred but nothing was really visible, when in came suddenly this amazing experience, a sort of short ekstasis. He is capable of having such moments; later on, he had similar syncopes of consciousness, trancelike conditions which did not last very long, and at those times he sometimes heard such a voice. There is nothing schizophrenic in the case; they are truly psychic phenomena—what one calls mystical experiences. I quote this case because it is similar to the psychology of Nietzsche but with a certain difference. Nietzsche is definitely anti-Christian—he wrote a book as you know, called The Anti-Christ—and he is intentionally destructive, while this vision is very much more human because it shows pity.<sup>1</sup> It is very clear that the voice means that if you as a personal being are doing your duty, if you carry your own burden, you will relieve the suffering of God. Instead of casting all your burdens on him and letting him bleed, do some of the bleeding yourself. I mentioned this also because in the continuation of our text we shall come to the bleeding, which is of course important Christian symbolism. Now we will go on:

Suffering was it, and impotence—that created all backworlds;
and the short madness of happiness, which only the greatest sufferer experienceth.

In the main, it is the suffering that creates the other worlds, but occasionally it is also that brief illusion of happiness, because it is the happiness of one who suffers. So the idea of this passage is again that man has created through his imagination another world, a fantastical world of refuge against the suffering in this world, against the fire which burns him to ashes. Therefore Nietzsche speaks of “carrying mine own ashes to the mountain”; that is, of course, the hill of suffering, and the suffering itself is the flame of passion. You see, the word passio means suffering, and the German word Leidenschaft has been explained by a poet in a very nice way: Leidenschaft ist das was Leid schafft, passion is that which creates suffering. Leidenschaft is really sufferingness.<sup>2</sup> That is the Buddhistic explanation too: the desirousness, the concupiscentia, of man, creates the great suffering of the world. This passio, then, is the flame which turns man into ashes if he exposes himself to it. But Nietzsche did not. He avoided it, and I cannot blame him, for if anybody can avoid the fire he is very wise to do so.

Now, there is another saying of Jesus, similar to those found at Ox-rhynchus, which is not in the Canon. It runs: Whoever is close to me is close to the fire.<sup>3</sup> That means that whoever is close to Christ, is close to Christ's passio, and is apt to have Christ's own psychology and the same fate. He was the one who took up his passio. He submitted to it and suffered correspondingly, and whoever is close to him will do the same. This is exceedingly intelligent and exceedingly true, and would therefore have been abolished if the father of the church who quoted it had not been too stupid to understand it. Other things which were less intelligent and less hidden have also been destroyed, and they would be equally interesting but perhaps not so profound. Now we go on with the text:

Weariness, which seeketh to get to the ultimate with one leap, with the death-leap; a poor ignorant weariness, unwilling even to will any longer: that created all Gods and backworlds.

It looks here as if Nietzsche shared the belief of his time, a materialistic conviction that other worlds—metaphysical matters—have no existence except in the imagination of man. He is paying a tribute to his age, not seeing what the imagination of man really means. When anybody says a thing is merely imagination, he is really saying something quite formidable; for whatever our imagination may be, that is our world, unfortunately. If people imagine that you are the archfiend, they will kill you; whatever the mere imagination was, the end is a corpse and it happens to be your own corpse, which is a very disagreeable fact. The imagination which was apparently nothing at all has wound up with downright murder. One should say, "This is imagination and now look out!" as one would say, "Be careful in handling that gun! There is a cartridge in it." For any imagination is a potentiality. The chair upon which I am sitting and the house in which I am, have once been the imagination of a builder; first he made a drawing of it and then he built this house, and if it comes down on my head I shall be crushed. There is nothing in our civilized world which has not been imagination. So imaginations are potential realities, exactly like a loaded revolver, a shot that has not gone off yet; but some ass might pull the trigger and I would be dead.

With the point of view of that time, then, Nietzsche assumes that those other worlds have been only the imagination of suffering people, while the point is just that suffering people have such imaginations, and that they are as real as they can be. You see, there are plenty of situations in life where your imagination about it is far more important than the situation in itself. Usually the world is what you imagine it to be, and we don't know to what degree that is true; it might be that our world would be quite different if we had a different imagination about it. I am certain, for instance, that the primitives live in an entirely different world from ours; we assume that it is the same, but that is by no means true. They have different impressions, different imaginations about it; it functions in an entirely different way. Only a short time ago, any educated Chinaman—not a modern Chinaman—was quite convinced that magic worked, and he was equally convinced that it did not work with a European because a European is not built that way. It does not grip him anywhere; he is not accessible to it. But with them it really does work; it is not mere imagination, because they live in a world and they have a psychology where such things are possible. We are not accessible—apparently—but I have my doubts about that. At all events in our conscious personality we are not accessible. I have seen so many effects that I have come to the conclusion that it is also imagination to imagine that such things have no access to us. We like to overlook these facts and prefer, from sheer fear, the so-called rational explanation, because it would be too awkward to introduce magic effects, as rational, into our calculation of the world.

Believe me, my brethren! It was the body which despaired of the body—it groped with the fingers of the infatuated spirit at the ultimate walls.

This is not an easy question, so we had better stop at it. Can anybody give us a commentary on it?

Prof. Reichstein: I think it is explained in the next sentence where he speaks of “the womb of being.” This would be the female part of God, just the opposite of the flame which he invented himself; this is something which he just accepts as mere being.

Prof. Jung: Well, I think we must here try to formulate Nietzsche’s thought, and separate it from the psychological vocabulary for the sake of clearness—then translate it into psychology afterwards. Can you explain to us that concept of “the womb of being” from the standpoint of Nietzsche’s philosophy? You see, it is quite certain that to him there is no such thing as a female aspect of the deity because he admits no deity. So to him, “the womb of being” has nothing to do with a metaphysical deity.

Prof. Reichstein: But here it is the first time, perhaps, that he accepts anything as beyond his invention.

Prof. Jung: Ah well, we are perfectly certain that he accepts his world as being. Being, to him, is not a metaphysical concept, and so “the womb of being” cannot be a metaphysical concept. He is trying to abolish all metaphysical concepts as mere wish-fulfilments. Therefore, we are really forced to assume that “the womb of being” is here a sort of figure of speech, a metaphor; we cannot go farther in the interpretation of it as long as we remain with Nietzsche’s philosophy. But when we come to psychology, that is something else; then the figure of speech becomes an important hint. What I want a commentary upon first, however, is the sentence, “It was the body which despaired of the body—it groped with the fingers of the infatuated spirit at the ultimate walls.” That simply means creating another world, creating the beyond.

Mrs. Baynes: I think he was hitting again the Christian point of view, saying: here are people who are such fools that they don’t appreciate the meaning of the body. They turn their backs upon it, and go to work to create a world which they could find within the body if they had the sense to do so.

Prof. Jung: Yes, he is here attacking the Christian standpoint which neglects the body. He says it is just the despised body which creates the reality of other worlds; from the body is taken that substance by which the substantiality of the beyond is created. You would not see a super-human divine figure if you did not repress or suppress your body; it is the non-recognized reality of your own body that gives body to metaphysical creations. That is Freud’s point of view in his The Future of an Illusion.<sup>4</sup> It is also the materialistic and rationalistic idea that the reality of a metaphysical being is chiefly due to the fact of the repression of the body. So Nietzsche says it is the despised body which has created the body likeness, the reality of the things beyond.

Believe me, my brethren! It was the body which despaired of the earth—it heard the bowels of existence speaking unto it.

You see the repressed, despised body took its revenge and made metaphysical figures more real than human beings; the body took revenge on man and made him believe that reality lay beyond, and that nothing here was worth while, that they are illusions. So he hits, not only Christianity, but Buddhism and all those religions which recognize the futility of secular existence.

And then it sought to get through the ultimate walls with its head—and not with its head only—into the other world.

That is perfectly clear. When the reality of the body is repressed or despised, you naturally seek for the essential world, and that seems to be the world beyond; so you naturally will treat this world as merely passagère, an illusion, a futility, or a mistake, and you just wait for your redemption or your transition to a divine world.

But that “other world” is well concealed from man, that dehumanized, inhuman world, which is a celestial naught; and the bowels of existence do not speak unto man, except as man.

<sup>4</sup> The Future of an Illusion (1927) contains Freud’s claim that the godhead of all religions is simply a projection into supernature of a father-figure who protects and judges.

So the womb of being is really, one could say, the essential truth, the essential being. To Nietzsche, “the womb” is a speech figure: it means the innermost. The essence of being is naturally where one has the greatest interest, that is the most real thing, and if one assumes that the divine place for mankind is another world, then the womb of being is there, and from there it calls upon one. Therefore, he says that the womb of being, which is the essence of being, speaks not unto man save as man. That means that only inasmuch as one assumes the ultimate and divine and essential reality to be in man, is the womb of being in man, speaking in the form of man. In that case, naturally the other world would be a celestial nothingness, a dehumanized world. Inasmuch as body is banished, man has gone; he is a mere question mark, a triangle or square, an abstraction of man. He is dehumanized, and he moves in a world of non-being; there is no matter, no stuff, no substance. Reality for Nietzsche is entirely linked up with the visibility, the tangibility, the definiteness of the body.

Verily, it is difficult to prove all being, and hard to make it speak. Tell me, ye brethren, is not the strangest of all things best proved?

Yea, this ego, with its contradiction and perplexity, speaketh most uprightly of its being—this creating, willing, evaluating ego, which is the measure and value of things.

You see it is most improbable that the ultimate reality should be the “I,” for the “I” is a most confused and contradictory thing. Yet to him this “I” is the measure and the value of things, the ultimate reality. Is there any justification for this point of view?

Miss Wolff: I don’t know whether one should point to the next chapter where it is no longer the “I”!

Prof. Jung: Knicken Sie nicht die Pointe!<sup>5</sup> You see, when we have made the mistake of believing it is the “I,” then we are suddenly slapped in the face. It is interesting. It shows how Nietzsche’s ideas grow in the text of Zarathustra; for it looks here as if the “I” were really the ultimate essence, the absolute being. Now, is there any justification for such an assumption?

Mrs. Adler: I think it is the compensation for the Christian standpoint.

Prof. Jung: Yes, it is a compensation and therefore it has definitely its justification. The Christian point of view is that the ultimate reality is

God, and only inasmuch as there is God is there existence at all; but the other reality, the empirical reality from which Nietzsche draws his conclusions, is obviously only created by the immediate awareness of the existence of the "I." And that I am, that I am aware of being myself, is such an immediate fact that it needs no other justification. On the contrary, you can derive from this reality of man every other so-called metaphysical reality, as he has just done; he says the other world is nothing but a derivative of the suffering ego of man. There is no substantiality to such metaphysical figures except through the absolute reality of "I"—the "I" exists and suffers and has imagination and so on. Now, of course, this is all egocentricity over against the Christian idea of a metaphysical universality, of God.

Mrs. Jung: Does he not mean consciousness by this "I"? I think that in this conception he is influenced by Schopenhauer.

Prof. Jung: Yes, the justification in Nietzsche's case is of course not only an empirical one; it is also dependent upon Schopenhauer's philosophy, where the "I" is the indispensable mediator for the redemption of the world. For if there were not an "I" capable of some ideas of its own, there would be no mirror to be held up to the face of the primordial will, in which to behold his own countenance and the nonsense he had created. And also, as you say, "I" means man's consciousness. What is "I"? Merely awareness, it is consciousness. When something is a reality to myself, or when I know there are contents which are related to a center, then I can say "I"—I do, or I think, or I hear, for instance—then only have I an awareness of myself. This ego consciousness is to Schopenhauer the turning point of the whole history or development of the world; if that did not exist, the world could never be redeemed. So Schopenhauer introduced an important change in the conception of the world. And it is interesting that he is really a Buddhist missionary, the first influence from the East, which is changing our conceptions in the most extraordinary way. Then after Schopenhauer comes Nietzsche with the background of natural science, materialism. The whole metaphysical importance has now shifted onto man, but one could say it was really the Buddhist influence upon the West; by that subtle and secret infection the idea is brought in that man is capable of doing something for himself. Of course we have an idea in the West that man is capable of a certain independence; the Catholic church assumes that, but the strict Protestant church assumes that everything is dependent upon the grace or the mercy of God. If man does not encounter the grace of heaven, there is nothing within him but darkness. Inasmuch as the Protestant theologian assumes that man can do something towards his redemption, even in the most modest way—that he has at least a certain capacity in himself to receive the grace of heaven—then it is already an approach to Catholicism. But even in Catholicism it needs the means of grace, the holy communion, and so on.

Miss Wolff: I would say that in Catholicism he has a disposition to get saved but he can do nothing without the grace of the church; it goes further than the Protestant point of view.

Prof. Jung: You see, the Catholic church believes in the justification through work; thus far the Catholic church gives a possibility to man. While the strict Protestant, Karl Barth for example, denies absolutely that man can do anything for himself; if the grace of God doesn't descend upon him, nothing doing. This is the actual conflict between Brunner and Karl Barth; Brunner compromises but Karl Barth makes no compromise.<sup>6</sup> Psychologically, I am on the side of Karl Barth. Not philosophically of course—I am no theologian—but psychologically I think that is right: the Protestant ought to insist upon man himself as being absolutely devoid of all means vis à vis God. That is psychologically very important.

Miss Wolff: Doesn't Nietzsche go a step beyond Schopenhauer? For Schopenhauer emphasizes merely the mind or the intellect, including art or anything which is a cultural achievement of man, while with Nietzsche there is apparently consciousness or awareness of the body, of the earth.

Prof. Jung: Ah yes, with Nietzsche we come into a new sphere; Schopenhauer is really a classical philosopher while Nietzsche is something else: with Nietzsche it becomes drama. You see, Schopenhauer's philosophy had little to do with his own existence, while with Nietzsche, the man, his life and his philosophy were tragically the same. Schopenhauer makes a wonderful philosophy about the suffering of the world, and then every day he goes to his hotel and has an excellent lunch. Of course, with such a philosophy, one should deny existence, one should vanish into Nirvana. Some people once watched Schopenhauer while he was taking a walk on a hill behind Frankfurt. He was walking up and down, always murmuring to himself, and they thought he must have great secret thoughts in his mind. Then somebody went up behind and listened to him, and to his great amazement he heard: If only I had married Ann So-and-So fifty years ago! Nobody knew that name but they investigated and found out that this Miss So-and-So was the daughter of a druggist who had sold the best pills against cholera, and with his death the recipe was lost. Voilà! That is Schopenhauer.

Miss Wolff: There was a story about one of his landladies. She was really very mean and he went to all possible courts, finally to the Supreme Court, in order to fight her. But he did not get his rights, and that was terribly important to him.

Prof. Jung: Yes, he was full of contradictions. His human existence was quite apart from his philosophy, while in Nietzsche the two began to come together and in a very tragic way. So he goes really further than Schopenhauer whose philosophy is merely a mental affair, while Nietzsche feels that it concerns the whole man; to him it was his own immediate reality. It is impossible to be this on the one side and something entirely different on the other, to have a philosophy which has nothing to do with one's reality. Schopenhauer's philosophy is in a way also a Christian philosophy, because he accepted the likeness of Buddhism and Christianity where they coincide in the conviction that this world is a futility, the thing that should be overcome, and that the other world is the reality—whether it is called heaven or the positive non-being in Nirvana. He still believed in the non-importance of this world. But Nietzsche begins to emphasize the importance of the body by losing his belief in other worlds. As soon as the transcendent goal of life fails, the whole importance is of course in the ego consciousness and in the personal life. That is inevitable.

And this most upright existence, the ego—it speaketh of the body, and still implieth the body, even when it museth and raveth and fluttereth with broken wings.

Always more uprightly learneth it to speak, the ego; and the more it learneth, the more doth it find titles, and honours for the body, and the earth.

A new pride taught me mine ego, and that teach I unto men: no longer to thrust one's head into the sand of celestial things, but to carry it freely, a terrestrial head, which giveth meaning to the earth.

Here he continues to attribute the essential reality to the "I," and the reality of the "I" consists in the obvious reality of the body. The body is the truest thing; this is indubitable and undeniable even if it should fabricate poetry and philosophy or other illusions and delusions—the fluttering with broken wings.

Dr. Escher: The “I” of Schopenhauer is the conscious “I,” and the “I” of which Nietzsche speaks is between our psychological “I” and the self.

Prof. Jung: Ah yes, but just wait! In the next move Nietzsche gives a new definition of the “I,” but for the time being we must share his insufficient formulation—especially since this is the mistake which has also been made historically. As you know, with the collapse of metaphysical convictions, the “I” of man really became important. That was the age of individualism. Individualism has nothing to do with individuation; individualism is an inflation of the ego of man, because suddenly the ego finds himself in the position of the Kontra-punkt of God himself. You see, the great ego of the world was God and we were nothing but the thoughts of God, and now we find that God is a thought of man. Therefore, man in all his modesty becomes a cosmic factor of the very first order, because he is the maker even of gods. And mind you, man is forever in the funny position of the religious atheist, whose psychology has been beautifully characterized by Bernard Shaw in one of his plays: the atheist complains and laments over the fact that he has lost his atheistic belief—all his highest convictions have been lost, he can no longer believe in atheism. Of course, it is exactly the same whether a man is a theist or an atheist; it is only plus and minus. But that has been the preoccupation of man forever.

You see, Nietzsche speaks here according to the prejudice of his time, the materialistic individualism of the eighties: if the ego has everything it wants, everything is all right. Our modern socialistic philosophy is still that; Karl Marx is of that time. It is the enlightened individualism called socialism, the idea being merely that every individual should be granted a decent existence. That is the individualistic ideal sure enough, because if all individuals are not granted a decent existence one doesn’t feel well. If I have no friends with decent homes, I cannot be invited to dine with them, and if I have not a decent home I cannot give them nice dinners. So it is assumed that a certain number of human beings must have nice homes.

Now inasmuch as that formulation of the “I” is a mistake due to the inflation of the ego, at the end of the nineteenth century it began to be overcome. Soon Nietzsche brought an entirely new point of view which was more up-to-date. He was, in a way, a prophet. “Always more uprightly learneth it to speak, the ego; and the more it learneth, the more doth it find titles and honours for the body and the earth.” That is, the more you enter the mood of this ego consciousness, the more you will find how important the body is for that reality. You see, the ego consciousness is exceedingly narrow; it contains only a few things in the moment and all the rest is unconscious. You need to gallop from one continent to another in order to have a survey. And you must make abstractions in order to have a total vision of things, because you cannot imagine all the details of things and at the same time have a view of their totality. Your consciousness is so restricted that you must economize, make abstractions; it is really the exact opposite to what people suppose to be the universal consciousness of the deity. One could say that man has come home to himself after travelling in God's consciousness in the cosmos, and finds that the origin of the whole business is the very small and narrow house of the human mind, the narrowness and restriction of consciousness. And he finds that the reason for that restriction is very obviously the body.

You cannot be conscious of many things simply because you are not where they are; I am not conscious of what is happening in the library, for instance, and I cannot hear what somebody says in the library because my ears are here and not there. If I could do without my body, then my ears might be anywhere in New York or Stockholm. I could hear and see all things, God knows what. But as a matter of fact there is the body and the body is in time and space; if it were not, there would not be that restriction of consciousness. Also, if there were no restriction, there would be no consciousness, for if you are conscious of millions of things as it seems to you, you are conscious of nothing: your consciousness is then exceedingly blurred. And the distinction, the real essence of consciousness, is exclusiveness.<sup>7</sup> You must be able to exclude many things in order to be absolutely conscious. So restriction is the very being, the very character, of consciousness. And the reason for that distinctness, that particular capacity of acuteness of consciousness, is the body, which restricts you to a certain place in space and a certain moment in time. It protects you against the elemental quality of cosmic indistinctness. Without consciousness, how can anything be distinguished, how can anything happen? There can be no world if nobody is aware of it. If there is nobody to speak of the existence of a world there is none. And how can there be an acute consciousness without the restriction of the body?

So it comes home to us that the body is the ultimate reason of everything which can be represented in and by consciousness. The great realization of the end of the nineteenth century is that the body is extremely important, at the bottom of the whole business, and any change which happens to the body will influence the mind. People believed that even hysteria had to do with the body, and that there was no such thing as a psyche. This was, of course, the extreme reaction against the metaphysics of the preceding time. "A new pride taught me mine ego, and that teach I unto men: no longer to thrust one's head into the sand of celestial things, but to carry it freely, a terrestrial head, which giveth meaning to the earth!" That is exactly what I meant: it is the head of earth which gives meaning to the earth. The body is the guarantee of consciousness, and consciousness is the instrument by which the meaning is created. There would be no meaning if there were no consciousness, and since there is no consciousness without body, there can be no meaning without the body.

A new will teach I unto men: to choose that path which man hath followed blindly, and to approve of it—and no longer to slink aside from it, like the sick and perishing!

This means: Since man—or his ego consciousness—is a living body, his body is ultimate reality. And that is right: it has to go its own path. It is a good path, and any deviation from it is wrong, just morbidity—wrongness in the biological sense. You see here something very important. This passage would justify the criticism one often hears of Nietzsche, particularly of Zarathustra, that he preaches a ruthless egoism or individualism. If Nietzsche had written nothing else but this sentence, that surely would be true: one could accuse him of it. But it all comes from the fact that he speaks the language of his time. He says "I," the ego consciousness, without clearly examining that concept of the "I." He never asks what the "I" is really, he has no psychological criticism. The moment he began to criticize it psychologically, he would see that the statement "I," or the expression "ego consciousness," is too limited, it is a mistaken concept; it is wrong.

The sick and perishing—it was they who despised the body and the earth, and invented the heavenly world, and the redeeming blood-drops; but even those sweet and sad poisons they borrowed from the body and the earth!

To what do these blood drops refer?

Miss Hannah: To the communion.

Prof. Jung: Yes, the redeeming blood-drops would be the blood of Christ. And he says they drew even those from the body and the earth.

Mrs. Jung: Wouldn't it be the bread and the wine?

Prof. Jung: Yes, the red wine is the blood, and the substance of the earth is the bread, and that is the body and the blood of Christ. He calls them sweet and poisonous, because he says our morbidity comes from the fact that we live by the metaphysical instead of the physical principle—we live by the spirit but the spirit is nothing but our imagination. There again he is lacking in psychological criticism, for what is imagination?

From their misery they sought escape, and the stars were too remote for them. Then they sighed: "O that there were heavenly paths by which to steal into another existence and into happiness!" Then they contrived for themselves their by-paths and blood draughts!

This is of course a blasphemous desecration of the communion.

Beyond the sphere of their body and this earth they now fancied themselves transported, these ungrateful ones. But to what did they owe the convulsion and rapture of their transport? To their body and this earth.

That is plain. They were not grateful to the body, allowing themselves to be transported in their ekstasis away from this earth to a heavenly place. But the very ekstasis is due to a convulsion of their humble servant, the body. If the body did not help them, they would not have an ekstasis. How can an ekstasis be brought about otherwise? If they are in the body, then they can step out of it; the body indirectly helps the ekstasis. And of course if you ill-treat the body, it can throw you out of the house entirely, out of your body.

It is like ill-treating objects. You know, objects are inanimate things; they lie about heavily, have no legs or wings, and people are often quite impatient with them. For instance, this book would like it very much better, I am sure, if it were lying near the center of the table where it is safe, but I have put it on the edge. It is an awkward position for that poor creature of a book. It may fall down and get injured. If I am impatient, if I touch them in an awkward way, it is a lamentable plight for the poor objects. Then they take their revenge on me. Because I ill-treat them they turn against me and become contradictory in a peculiar way. I say, "Oh, these damned objects, dead things, despicable!"—and instantly they take on life. They begin to behave as if they were animated living things. You will then observe what the German philosopher tells about the die Tücke des Objekts. And the more you curse them, the more you use speech figures which insinuate life into them. For instance, "Where has that book hidden itself now? It has walked off and concealed itself somewhere." Or, "The devil is in that watch, where has it gone?" Objects really take on dangerous qualities with people who are particularly impatient with them: they jump into your eyes, they bite your legs, they creep onto a chair and stick up a point upon which you sit—such things. You will find many beautiful examples in that book by Vischer. What spectacles can do, for instance! If there is a chair with a concealing pattern, my spectacles will seek it and become invisible, the contours merging with the pattern. And, of course, buttered toast will never fall on the unbuttered side. And the coffee jug will most certainly try to get its spout under the handle of the milk pot, so that when you lift the coffee pot you pour out the milk. But such things only happen to people who are impatient with objects—then the devils go into the objects and play the most extraordinary stunts.<sup>8</sup>

Gentle is Zarathustra to the sickly. Verily, he is not indignant at their modes of consolation and ingratitude. May they become convalescents and overcomers, and create higher bodies for themselves!

Neither is Zarathustra indignant at a convalescent who looketh tenderly on his delusions, and at midnight stealeth round the grave of his God; but sickness and a sick frame remain even in his tears.

Many sickly ones have there always been among those who muse, and languish for God; violently they hate the discerning ones, and the latest of virtues, which is uprightness.

Here we see much of the personal experience of Nietzsche himself. You know, when you have overcome a prejudice, for instance, you are inclined to be tolerant. You say, "Oh, God, yes, one can understand things that way; people don't know yet." But those people who remain in a prejudice, with their half knowledge that it is a prejudice, get quite resentful against those who have given it up.

<sup>8</sup> The German philosopher Friedrich Theodor von Vischer wrote about the mischievousness of inanimate objects in his novel, Auch Einer (Leipzig, 9th edn., 1902). Jung discusses this idea in CW 6, par. 627.

Backward they always gaze toward dark ages: then, indeed, were delusion and faith something. Raving of the reason was likeness to God, and doubt was sin.

Too well do I know these godlike ones: they insist on being believed in, and that doubt is sin. Too well, also, do I know what they themselves most believe in.

Verily, not in backworlds and redeeming blood-drops: but in the body do they also believe most; and their own body is for them the thing-in-itself.

What does he mean by the godlike ones?

Mrs. Brunner: He means the priests who think they know what is right.

Prof. Jung: Ah yes, but why are they godlike? Or why should they behave like that?

Miss Wolff: I think he means the people who in a certain drunkenness thought they knew what godlikeness was; he speaks of the Middle Ages or the old times.

Prof. Jung: Well, it is sure that they are looking back towards dark times, obviously the Middle Ages, when their delusion and belief was a different thing. So the mania of reason could be understood as a disoriented state of mind. I think that interpretation is right—a disordered reason is God Almighty-likeness, and doubt is sin. And that is perfectly true. He means by those godlike ones, then, people with a medieval mind. But why should he think that they are godlike? There must be a sort of psychological justification for calling them godlike.

Prof. Reichstein: Perhaps he means that they live in the other world; he speaks here of the godlike people, and of the people who live in this world.

Prof. Jung: Yes, the psychological justification for such an attribute is that the condition in which such people live is a godlikeness. If you assume that there is a metaphysical god and that people live a metaphysical existence, then they are like God; and psychologically the metaphysical place would be the unconscious. People who live in the unconscious are like the unconscious; they are also unconscious. So, in as far as you can call the reality of the unconscious the deity, they are like the deity: they are like unto God. This shows itself in reality through the fact that they have a peculiar self-evidence in life, they feel justified; it is certain that their way is right—or wrong. There is no doubt about it: they have the natural self-evidence of an animal. Therefore, an animal is godlike in a way, because it fulfils the meaning of its pattern. And this is a metaphysical thing to the animal. It is not conscious of its pattern—as little as the Pueblos know that they are living in a Pueblo, or the elephant knows that he is an elephant—though he knows perhaps better that he is an elephant inasmuch as he has to do with man. But we usually do not know what we are. You know, perhaps the story of the knight in the thirteenth century, who was caught by his enemies and put into a dark dungeon, and finally, after years of suffering in that cave, he got impatient and beat his fists upon the table, saying, “If only these damned Middle Ages would come to an end!”

Miss Wolff: Doesn't Nietzsche here make an allusion to certain historic facts when he uses this word Gottähnlich? He means those who believe in God are Gottähnlich.<sup>9</sup> There must be the association of epileptic people here, who were considered to be particularly in touch with God, as the dancing dervishes and such people were also, according to those medieval beliefs. So I think he probably compares the godlike people to them—since those who were mad, who had no ego, who were dissolved, were supposed to be particularly near to God.

Prof. Jung: According to primitive people, crazy people are possessed by spirits.

Miss Wolff: Yes, and as he puts the emphasis on consciousness and the ego, he criticizes them particularly.

Prof. Jung: But now he says, “Verily, not in backworlds and redeeming blood-drops: but in the body do they also believe most; and their own body is for them the thing-in-itself.” You see even for those other-worldlings, the body is the absolute thing, even they believe most in the body. We were assuming just the contrary. How is that?

Miss Hannah: That is just true. Nobody worries over his health like a theologian.

Prof. Jung: Well, there is something in the idea that people who are too metaphysical are bothered by their bodies. For the more the mentality or the psyche leaves the body to itself, the more the body goes wrong. The two ought to live together. That explains the bad state of health of intuitive people who don't even need to be metaphysical; it is enough that they are a bit too intuitive. They live too much in mere possibilities, and then the digestion begins to suffer, they get chronic diseases, ulcers of the stomach or the duodenum, for instance. Or they may get other disturbances of the body of an infectious nature; many organic diseases are due to this peculiar lack of attention. People who have lived too much upon spiritual ideas should bring their attention back to their bodies. So one can say it is always a wise thing when you discover a new metaphysical truth, or find an answer to a metaphysical problem, to try it out for a month or so, whether it upsets your stomach or not; if it does, you can always be sure it is wrong. It is necessary to have metaphysical ideas—we cannot do without them—but it is also necessary to submit them very seriously to the test whether they agree with the human being: a good metaphysical idea does not spoil one's stomach. For instance, if I hold a metaphysical conviction that we live on after death for fifty thousand years instead of fifty million—if that is a solution—I try what it means if I believe in fifty thousand years only; perhaps that is good for my digestion—or bad. You see, I have no other criterion. Of course, it sounds funny, but I start from the conviction that man has also a living body and if something is true for one side, it must be true for the other. For what is the body? The body is merely the visibility of the soul, the psyche; and the soul is the psychological experience of the body. So it is really one and the same thing. Therefore, a good truth must be true for the whole system, not only for half of it. According to my imagination, something seems to be good—it fits in with my imagination—but it proves to be entirely wrong for my body. And something might apparently be quite nice for the body, but it is very bad for the experience of the soul, and in that case I have a metaphysical enteritis. So I must be careful to bring the two systems together; the only criterion is that both are balanced. When life flows, then I can say it is probably all right, but if I get upset I know something must be wrong, out of order at least. Therefore, people with one-sided convictions of a decidedly spiritual nature are forced by the body to pay attention to it. I have seen many people who suffered from all sorts of ailments of the body simply on account of wrong convictions.

But it is a sickly thing to them, and gladly would they get out of their skin. Therefore hearken they to the preachers of death, and themselves preach backworlds.

Hearken rather, my brethren, to the voice of the healthy body; it is a more upright and pure voice.

More uprightly and purely speaketh the healthy body, perfect and square built; and it speaketh of the meaning of the earth.

Here you have it. He trusts to the reaction of the healthy body. The healthy body is the healthy life, and the healthy life is the life of the soul of man as much as his body, because soul and body are not two things. They are one.

LECTURE III

6 February 1935

Prof. Jung:

I have a contribution by Mrs. Baynes. "Here is a curious parallel between the last verse in the chapter on the Backworldsmen and one of Wilhelm's commentaries on the I Ching. Nietzsche says: 'More uprightly and purely speaketh the healthy body, perfect and square-built: and it speaketh of the meaning of the earth.' "

You probably noticed that peculiar expression, the "four square" body. The body is of course very much the earth, and "it speaketh of the meaning of the earth" means that inasmuch as the body has produced consciousness, it produces the meaning of the earth. If you could give consciousness or a creative mind to a book for instance, or to any kind of object, it would speak its contents; give consciousness to wood and it speaks the meaning of wood; give it to stone and it speaks the meaning of stone.

Then Mrs. Baynes goes on. "Wilhelm is commenting on the second line in the hexagram Kun, the Receptive, Earth, and he says: 'Heaven has a circle for its symbol, and the earth a right-angled quadrangle. Thus right-angledness is an original attribute of the earth.' "

Kun is the sign of Yin, and the absolute Yin hexagram with six weak lines is the receptive sign; Kun is the conceiving earth. The first line of that hexagram is:

If you tread on frost, firm ice is not far away.

The hoar-frost is not quite solid, it crumbles, but ice is solid. That is the quality of the Yin: it is cold and solid, the northern side of the mountain; it is night, humidity, the earth. Then going on with the description of the earth, the second line is:

Straight, right-angled, large.

Even without purpose, nothing remains unfurthered.

This means that even without purpose things move or are helped to move. Then the third line:

Hidden lines, we can remain steadfast.
If perhaps you are in the service of a king,
Seek not works, but bring to fruition!

This shows that if one remains persistent in the hidden, unspoken purpose, then the very nature of the earth, the hidden lines in the earth, will lead you. You are as if in the service of a king; you have no purpose because the king has the purpose. The hidden king, the king dormant in the earth, is the ruler or the leader. And "Seek not works but bring to fruition" means "Don't go about as if you didn't know what to do, seeking works out of your own invention, but follow up the thing which is there already and accomplish it." It is all blind doing; it is the doing in the night, following dark intimations, the concealed lines.

The fourth line says:

A tied-up sack. No blame; no praise.

The idea is that one is as if tied into a dark sack. You cannot escape, you cannot see, you are entirely passive, and therefore no blame and no praise attaches to your position. And the fifth line is:

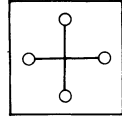

Yellow undergarment brings the highest good fortune.

Yellow is the color of the earth and the desired middle way. So it means the correct inner attitude, which would be an adaptation to oneself; as an outer garment is an adaptation to the world. If you have a correct attitude to the things within, it brings good fortune. The German word is Heil which originally meant a bit more, almost salvation. But good fortune in the I Ching usually refers to worldly good fortune; it is often used for direction in an entirely worldly enterprise. Before a person starts a business, for instance, he asks one of the Taoist soothsayers to cast the I Ching oracle, and in that case what is called the judgment at the beginning of each sign is chiefly used. That is the oldest interpretation—dating from the eleventh or twelfth century B.C., the time of King Wen and the Duke of Chau—and there it is said whether a sign is in general good or bad. It might say: "Great good fortune without blame," for example, or, "It is now a good time to cross the great water." Such indications are all the person who asks the question wants to know, as a rule. The deep moral implications of the subtle lines which follow are usually not mentioned. But of course anybody with a subtle mind would ask the oracle less for his worldly than for his spiritual good—in order to find the right way through the chaos or labyrinth of his own soul.

Mrs. Baynes particularly calls my attention to the second line, “straight, right-angled, large,” which refers to the earth. Wilhelm worked out the Commentary on the I Ching with the help of Lau, that old Chinese sage who initiated him, and concerning this line, it says: “Heaven has the circle for its symbol and the earth the right-angled square. Thus the four square quality is the original or primordial quality of the earth.” In the old symbolism of the cosmogonic forces in Chinese philosophy there is a center which is called Kian, (“heaven”) from which four elementary forces—all with special names—emanate into the spaces of the earth, which is square like this:

And around this quadrangle are the moving qualities of Yin and Yang as even and odd numbers, which are at the same time the qualities of the elements: fire, water, earth, metal, etc. These form a sort of vortex; the whole system is rotating. That is the idea of the basic structure of the world. “On the other hand, movement in a straight line,” the Commentary goes on, “is an original attribute of the creative power, and quantity (greatness) is such an attribute. All four-square things have their root in the straight line and in their turn form corporeal entities. Now the Kun, the receptive, conceiving quality of the earth, adjusts itself to these qualities of the creative power and makes them its own. Thus out of the straightness of the creative power, the straight line, there develops a square, and out of a square, a cube. That is the surrender of Kun, the conceiving earth, to the original intimation of creative power.”

In other words, this creative power which is just a straight line, like an arrow or the course of a projectile, is translated by the three dimensions of space into bodies; that is the origin of bodies. From all this, one can appreciate the depth from which Nietzsche drew his speech symbolism. Probably he himself was not conscious of the meaning of that four-square; if somebody had criticized him severely for using such an expression, and asked just why the earth should be four-square, it is possible that Nietzsche might have yielded and said, “Oh, let that expression go, it is not absolutely indispensable.” But it is indispensable in a deeper sense. For the idea that the earth is four-square has been found at a tremendous depth in the collective unconscious, here as well as in China, and probably all over the world.

Mr. Baumann: The Egyptians had the same idea about the form of the world: there were four principles.

Prof. Jung: Do you mean the four monkeys and the four toads that watched the creation of the world?

Mr. Baumann: There were different conceptions about it; there were four gods, and four couples of gods, and then they have four principles which mean time, space, materia, and power.

Prof. Jung: There is also the idea that the four-square quality of the temples really meant the earth: the four-square altar was understood to be a symbol of the earth. But I am not so certain about these interpretations. The only source for the philosophical interpretation of Egyptian symbolism is Plutarch. Jamblichus is not absolutely reliable, he is a bit fantastical sometimes; unfortunately it is not on a sound basis. That the old Egyptians had philosophical interpretations we know from Herodotus as well as Plutarch, but we have very little material to prove what the interpretations actually were.<sup>2</sup> The Greeks were the main source. The later speculations are quite unreliable, based upon mere air or intuition—which is of course not a recognized scientific principle. Now we will go on to the next chapter: “The Despisers of the Body,” where Zarathustra continues to preach the paramount importance of the body. He elaborates upon the meaning of the body and makes some very curious discoveries.

To the despisers of the body will I speak my word. I wish them neither to learn afresh, nor teach anew, but only to bid farewell to their own bodies—and thus be dumb.

“Body am I, and soul,” so saith the child. And why should one not speak like children?

But the awakened one, the knowing one, saith: “Body am I entirely, and nothing more; and soul is only the name of something in the body.”

This statement sounds entirely materialistic, as if the soul were really nothing but a derivative of chemical processes in the body. It is unfortunate that Nietzsche always uses the word body instead of saying “the living body,” for the dead body surely never produces a soul; and what sents the most elementary form of life. See above 6 June 1934, n. 11 for Hauer’s lectures. Cary F. Baynes did an English rendering of the monumental Richard Wilhelm translation of I Ching or Book of Changes, for which Jung had written an extensive Foreword. It is likely that Nietzsche would have traced “four square” to Pythagorean sources rather than to Chinese.

a living body is we don't know exactly. We only know that there is such a thing and that it has decidedly different qualities from a dead body. The dead body has the disagreeable quality of decomposing very quickly; it suddenly becomes the physical process of chemical decomposition or oxidation. While the living body is always striving against decomposition, it is in the highest degree synthetic; from simple chemical bodies in the foodstuff, it builds up extremely complicated synthetic substances, which are kept on that level without being destroyed by oxidation. So there is an additional secret in the living albumen which science does not know, and it is that living body which produces something like a psyche. You see, if he said: "Living body am I entirely," it would be correct and the materialistic mistake would not be possible. Of course, it makes all the difference in the world whether a body is living or dead. Now, one can say that psyche is an accompaniment of the living body, or even that it is produced by the living body, that it is a derivative; this is, at all events, a perfectly workable hypothesis, and you know science for a relatively long time now has proceeded upon that assumption. Of course, it is sound materialism for people to take it for granted that they know what a living body is. But no intelligent man would believe that he knows what life is; only idiots believe that they know, in the way of a sous entendu, or a silent premise.

The body is a big sagacity, a plurality with one sense, a war and a peace, a flock and a shepherd.

This is a very important and interesting statement. You see, inasmuch as the living body contains the secret of life, it is an intelligence. It is also a plurality which is gathered up in one mind, for the body is extended in space, and the here and the there are two things; what is in your toes is not in your fingers, and what is in your fingers is not in your ears or your stomach or your knees or anywhere else in your body. Each part is always something in itself. The different forms and localizations are all represented in your mind as more or less different facts, so there is a plurality. What you think with your head doesn't necessarily coincide with what you feel in your heart, and what your belly thinks is not what your mind thinks. The extension in space, therefore, creates a pluralistic quality in the mind. That is probably the reason why consciousness is possible. Different things are represented, and these are always supposed to be in a field of consciousness, in a sort of extension, that is. Yet you feel that the whole, that plurality, is drawn together and referred to something you call "I"; it is referred to a center which you cannot say has extension, as little as you can say of a thought that it has extension. Thought is a disembodied something because it has no spatial qualities. So "I" is as if it were something abstract, yet in a vague way it coincides with your body; when you say "I" you beat your chest for instance, to emphasize the "I."

You see that with primitives: whenever they speak of themselves, they say "Me! Me!"—emphasizing their body. They even go as far as to be very particular about their shadows which they think belong to the body; they are just as offended, they consider it as much an outrage, when you step upon their shadow as when you give their body a kick. To that extent is the body identical with the ego consciousness in primitive man. We don't include the shadow, and our ego is more detached from the body, but our ego concept is for that reason abstract, and therefore less spatial: it has almost no spatial quality. To say "My body is myself" sounds to us like a metaphor or a plastic manner of speech; when you say "I" you don't usually mean this unworthy body that sits here. But the primitive is weighed down by the fact that the "I" is chiefly the body, and that expresses itself in an entirely different way also; namely, he only refers to that center of the ego which affects his body. For instance, a thought which does not affect the working of his stomach or the act of breathing or the palpitation of his heart, does not exist. The only thought which he has consciously, is one which affects him physically, through the skin, or the muscles, or the position of his body, or the function of his intestines. It is as if a thought which did not upset the regularity of the respiration would be non-arrivé, not psychical.

That explains why a primitive is quite unable to fill his whole day with consciousness, there are hours on end when he is just sitting, gazing into space, and thinking nothing at all. Of course, all the time a psychical movement does take place in him, but such thoughts are subliminal; they don't reach consciousness because they are not underlined, or supported, by physical disturbances. Therefore, certain negro tribes hold that thinking is done in the stomach exclusively; so only thoughts that upset your digestion would be authentic. The Pueblo Indians say thinking is done with the heart, and that the people who believe they think in the head are obviously mad: so all Americans are of insane mind. I had to correct myself very quickly in order not to be reckoned as American, to agree that only that is thought or consciousness which affects the heart or the breathing, the anahata region. Of course, there are numbers of ideas or emotions or representations or perceptions which definitely upset the act of breathing. Watch the curve of your breathing, and you see that if something is said, or you hear a sound, or if there is any other disturbance, your breathing is instantly affected, particularly when you are just starting to speak, when you are gathering up breath to have the necessary volume of air to produce the sound.

The next stage is the throat where the sound is made, speech, and there are a vast number of people on the level of thinking in words only; when there isn't a word to designate a thing, when they cannot hear it or see it printed, then the thing doesn't exist. Because they see a word, they think there must be the corresponding thing in existence. For instance, Kant says in his Critique of Pure Reason, that because people say "God," they think God is.<sup>3</sup> The psychical center of millions of people is in the throat; somebody shouts a string of tremendous words and they all think, "Now something has happened, isn't it marvelous? It must be true." Yet the words mean nothing whatever. If they would only use this thing up in their heads, this inexorable light, they would see it was perfect nonsense. But somebody has produced a world, made a reality, by making a string of words, and they accept it; they take it seriously without hesitating one single moment as to whether it makes sense or not. Of course, it cannot be denied that a number of people have climbed a bit higher and arrived at the level where even words don't produce worlds, but they are rare, a very small percentage of the population.

Mr. Baumann: Some psychological tests were recently tried on me, and I discovered that unless words were associated with a sight or a sound, I could not remember them.

Prof. Jung: Yes, it is of course necessary to associate things with the body in order to keep them. You have to visualize them, to project things out into the field of vision as if they were optical realities. Or you have to project them into the sphere of sound, as it were, and you do that best by using the word. Otherwise you cannot stabilize things. It is exceedingly difficult to think in absolutely abstract terms; even the most abstract mathematician uses signs—letters and numbers and formulas—in order to give body to utter abstractions which could not be kept in mind at all if not translated into something like a body. So what Nietzsche is saying here about the importance of the body is quite correct. His point of view that the soul is a mere derivative of the body is true insofar as we are unable to establish anything psychical without the aid of the body, without the aid of the connection with physical things. A complete abstraction is really impossible. It is wordless; it has no affinity with anything that could be called matter, and therefore is well-nigh non-existent. The highest center in the chakra system, sahasrara, would be the complete abstraction. It is utterly beyond any physical likeness or affinity. It is really non-existent because any kind of existence is always linked up with extension or body.

Now, we must consider this phrase "a war and a peace." You see, a plurality of things only exists or can exist because they contradict each other. For instance, if you have a peculiar sensation in your hand, and at the same time in your foot, there is a conflict between the two; one is above and the other below, and you don't know whether you should look first here or there. So all the pluralistic elements of your mind can be the cause for a conflict, if it is only the struggle for the priority of attention—you don't know to which you should attend first. It is also like a flock and a shepherd; the flock consists of a plurality, and if the units of a flock disperse, the shepherd must gather them together. And so the ego consciousness is the shepherd of a flock of psychical units, and if the shepherd is killed, the flock disperses. That would be schizophrenia. The splitting of the mind is a separating of the units, and then each unit behaves as if it were a little ego consciousness, and if there is a remnant of the shepherd left somewhere, if his ears at least remain, he will hear voices. The units behave like little egos and they speak with sheeplike intelligence.

One observes the same phenomenon in mediumistic experiments, where certain fragments of the mind are split off. The psyche is exceedingly dissociable. The fact that the mind really is based upon a plurality makes this a serious danger. One also observes very frequently in schizophrenics that as soon as the flock disperses, as soon as the war breaks out, the fragments of consciousness are projected into different parts of the body, so that they begin to speak with a certain amount of consciousness. I would call the attention of those among you who read German to that book by Staudenmayer called Experimentelle Magie.<sup>4</sup> He had voices in different parts of his intestines, for instance. It is a very frequent thing that patients localize their voices somewhere in the body. We say quite normally, "It was as if my heart said to me," or, "as if I heard a voice within." But schizophrenics hear voices coming out of their feet or head or eyes. I have a patient who says: "Today I have voices in my upper lip." Or, "Now they are occupied with my navel." The voices are also personified as infinitely small men, who in thousands, like ants, walk over the body. That famous case, Schreber, was such a fellow.<sup>5</sup> He found dozens of little men upon his eyelids, trying to raise or lower them, or walking upon his skin; and time and again one of the little men lost his independence and merged with the patient's consciousness. He always got angry and cursed when that happened. That would be a relative dissociation—the parts are not all absolutely independent; at times they join on again. It would be as if the frozen surface of a lake were broken up so that fragments were drifting on the surface, and then occasionally two pieces would join and freeze together and become a unit again. That is the moment when the little man says "Damn it!"—and merges with consciousness.

An instrument of thy body is also thy little sagacity, my brother, which thou callest "spirit"—a little instrument and plaything of thy big sagacity.

From this sentence you can see that Nietzsche treats the spirit very much on the same basis as the mind: he makes little or no difference between the two. That is the fatal mistake which was made in the late nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth. They identified mind and spirit, which came from the fact that they had lost the empirical understanding of what spirit really is.<sup>6</sup> The spirit descended to the level of mind, and particularly the mind which consists of words. That vast majority of people whose minds consist of words conquered the small minority whose minds consist of thought—and they in turn conquered those whose minds consist of spirit. So the spirit slowly descended from its celestial place to the level of intelligent thought, which of course was not as it should be, but better than when it descends still further and becomes mere words.

That idea is not my invention. It occupied very different minds in the latter part of the nineteenth century. Mauthner has written a philosophy on the basis of the mind being speech; he thinks that mind is derived chiefly from language, that mind is speech.<sup>7</sup> You find these connections in the Upanishads also. And Anatole France says: "What is mind other than sound, an utterance, L'aboiement d'un chien?"<sup>8</sup> You see, that is the bodily basis of the mental phenomenon, and the bodily accompaniment from which what we call "psyche" develops. So in coming down from the heights of the spirit, you get first into the plurality of thoughts, then into the vaster plurality of words, and you wind up with the barking of a dog—the utterance of mind in its origin was of course like the barking of a dog. That has led to the philosophy of Klages who identifies spirit and intellect, or mixes them up with mind, till spirit has become utterly unrecognizable; he fights the spirit as a destroyer of life. If he knew what the spirit was, he never could assume that, for spirit is originally a most effervescent thing, like the opening of a champagne bottle. It is most emotional, really a culmination of life.<sup>9</sup>

<sup>5</sup> Dr. D. P. Schreber, a German judge, published his Memoirs of My Nervous Illness in 1903. Freud, without ever seeing the person, made a detailed study of this case in "Psycho-Analytic Notes on an Autobiographical Account of a Case of Paranoia" (1912), std. edn., vol. 12.

<sup>6</sup> Jung often blames this confusion on the ambiguity of the word Geist which means mind, spirit, ghost, etc.

<sup>7</sup> Friedrich Mauthner, Wörterbuch der Philosophie: Neue Beiträge zu einer Kritik der Sprache (Dictionary of Philosophy: a New Contribution to a Critique of Language) (München und Leipzig, 1910). Mauthner claimed that if Aristotle (for instance) had spoken Coptic

The German word Geist expresses it; the etymology of that word points to an effervescence, a welling up. The Latin word spiritus means just wind, and the Greek word animos has no spiritual meaning; it also means wind. Therefore, in the miracle of Pentecost, the descent of the Holy Ghost, there was the phenomenon of a great wind.<sup>10</sup> Then the word pneuma in antiquity meant chiefly prana, the breath of life, and prana is characteristic of the living being. The living being is filled with the pneuma; there is no life without it. And it is by no means a mistake that the concept pneuma, which originally had no spiritual meaning whatever, later on under Christian influence took on that meaning. That was logical because spirit is a culmination of life, by no means destructive. But the intellect, this demon of words, is a destroyer of life; the more the mind becomes words the less there is life substance. It becomes just thin like words—or inasmuch as words are sound only, flatus vocis, a breath of voice.

Miss Wolff: Doesn't "to mind" also mean to memorize? "I mind" means I remember.

Prof. Jung: Well, that also hangs together with the fact that abstract or Dakotan instead of Greek, his logic would have been different. Mauthner once said of Nietzsche that he was seduced by his own language.

<sup>8</sup> He gives elsewhere a fuller quotation from Anatole France's Le Jardin d'Epicure (Paris, 1895), p. 80: "What is thinking? And how does one think? We think with words. That in itself is sensual and brings us back to nature. Think of it! A metaphysician has nothing with which to construct his world system except the perfected cries of monkeys and dogs" (CW 6, par. 40).

thoughts, in order to be kept, must be associated with the body; that is minding or remembering something.

Mrs. Jung: I think we got this idea of the word as being spirit from the Bible, where the world was created through God. And in the New Testament, in the Evangel of St. John, it says the Word was God and God was the Word, which seems to put the word very high indeed.

Prof. Jung: Yes, but the German Wort does not mean Logos exactly. Logos is the original conception, and the Logos has a peculiar quality; it is a higher concept than nōus, the Greek word, which can be translated by "mind," but both these words designate a sort of cosmogonic principle. In Gnosticism the cosmogonic principle is the equivalent of the Logos. In the more differentiated philosophy of Philo Judaeus, who is the real originator of the Logos philosophy,<sup>11</sup> the Gospel of St. John, that same principle is the Logos, and the Logos is divine. It is God. Now the Logos surely originally had to do with the word and therefore could be so translated, but the word was considered the creative factor in Egypt. Therefore, the inscription on the temple of Ptah: "What he speaketh becomes."<sup>12</sup> I should say that peculiar exaltation of the term Logos, meaning word, comes from the idea that it was the word which expressed the spirit. But the fact was, that they were filled with spirit and then they made words; while we make words and assume that we are filled with spirit. That is just the difference. They only spoke when the spirit filled them. When they were gripped by the effervescence of the spirit, they spoke even in different tongues, even in unintelligible words, according to the account of the glossolalia in the New Testament.<sup>13</sup> And in that, the word is like matter. It is the definiteness of the divine impulse, the divine creative spirit. That inscription on the temple of Ptah shows very clearly this creative, becoming reality of the divine impulse, which is in itself beyond words and beyond bodies. It is prior to all creation, having no form; but as soon as it comes into the space of the world it takes on definiteness. It creates matter. Therefore, in the Tantric philosophy, matter is defined as the definiteness of the divine thought.

You see, ancient philosophy really started from a different reality than ours, from a very different psychology. Speech was very unwieldy then. You can see what trouble Plato had to express certain ideas which to us are now definite conceptions; he had to use parables and all sorts of means in order to express his philosophical thought. The famous parable of the cave belongs to the theory of cognition, we say nowadays, but he had to express it by that clumsy apparatus. In reading medieval philosophy, one has to struggle with an extraordinary clumsiness of language. The original German was unspeakably heavy and difficult. There is the same trouble in reading the very elegant Latin of Stoic philosophy or the New Platonists; that language was just not differentiated enough to express subtleties. Greek was in a way much subtler, but in comparison with a modern language, that also was exceedingly archaic. So they always were under the pressure of spirit, which made it a very real thing to them, and they felt the word as the visible face of the spirit. Therefore, it was to them divine.

<sup>12</sup> The Egyptian Ptah, like Jahveh, created by speaking. In the Pyramid Texts, Ptah is said to create through "heart and tongue." See Development of Religion and Thought in Ancient Egypt, ed. James H. Breasted (Philadelphia, 1912), pp. 44-47.

<sup>13</sup> "Glossolalia" is normally translated into the vernacular as "speaking in tongues"—that is, speaking in no known language but in what, without inspired interpretation, is gibberish. Jung here gives the passage a more general interpretation. See Acts 2:3-4.

There was the same feeling in old China where every scrap of written paper was carefully collected by special people in order that it should not be soiled or lost, because the hieroglyphic or the writing was sacred. A written book was magic because it was the apparition of the spirit. That was the antique point of view, but in the subsequent differentiation of speech, the original phenomenon of the spirit was more and more lost sight of, and the word was then in place of the spirit. One sees that in the development of the Christian church; the real spirit is almost extinct, and only the printed word is left. Therefore, we cling to the word of the Bible. In the first centuries the four gospels were not even considered as a revelation of God. They were supposed to be useful books of an uplifting character, good to read, but nobody thought that they were the word of God revealed by immediate divine inspiration. That was a later invention, when they were seeking an authority instead of the spirit which was lacking. Read St. Paul and you can see how the spirit works. He was still under the pressure. His words are the stammering of the spirit; but we took it as the refinement of the spirit, the word itself as spirit—a great mistake. The word is merely what is left of the spirit after the spirit has passed. So modern development led first to the descent of the spirit into mind, and from mind into words, and then the spirit was utterly gone, so that we don't know what spirit is. We must make an effort to remember what it was. But anybody who has the faintest knowledge of spirit knows that it is the culmination of life. It is even the greatest intensity of life.

Dr. Escher has just asked me about a very complicated philosophical problem, the question of the relationship between spirit and mind or intellect, which I cannot explain fully. This is exceedingly disputable ground and much depends naturally on the definition given to the phenomena. You see, I propose to call spirit such and such a thing, and mind such and such a thing, and with such a proposition we can discuss, but if "mind" can mean anything and "spirit" can mean anything, it is impossible. That is just the trouble, just what I was saying. Mind and spirit are nowadays so confused that the words are used interchangeably, as in German you use the word Geist for simply anything. It has also the connotation of esprit for instance, and one speaks of esprit de vin, Weingeist, the "spirit of alcohol." Of course, alcohol was called spiritus because it is a volatile substance detached from a liquid by distillation, it is the volatile substance which goes over into the alembic. Geist is also an expression for a psychological concept, but we have to separate these terms: otherwise, we get entangled in all the nonsense which is happening now. For example, Klages thinks the spirit is the destroyer of life, which is contradictio in adjecto, the spirit has always been the creator of life. The orgiastic madness of antiquity is prana, the breath of life. A god fills you with his prana, or his pneuma or wind, and you become an air-being, which is of course a ghost or a soul; even body becomes breath. That was the original concept.

Prof. Reichstein: Could one not say it depends upon which side the libido is at the moment? For instance, we could say that nowadays people don't need to become more airlike than they are already. When the chthonic part is more emphasized, the libido is withdrawn from the spirit side and it drops down and becomes less differentiated.

Prof. Jung: Well, it has dropped down, that is the devil. You see, we have to detach from that intellectual thing.

Prof. Reichstein: It seems to be quite necessary, because otherwise the earth would not have enough force.

Prof. Jung: Quite. That we should emphasize the body is Nietzsche's message, and it is also the message of materialism, that is granted. We should emphasize the body, for thus we give body to concepts, to words. And we should insist on the fact that they are nothing but words since the spirit is gone, that there is no life in them—they are dead things, outside life. We should return to the body in order to create spirit again; without body there is no spirit because spirit is a volatile substance of the body. The body is the alembic, the retort, in which materials are cooked, and out of that process develops the spirit, the effervescent thing that rises. Nietzsche returned to himself, isolated himself from the whole world, crept into his own retort and underwent this process. Then suddenly he discovered that he was filled with a new orgiastic enthusiasm which he called his experience of Dionysos, the god of wine. You see, that is the spirit. Dionysos is the god of prophecy, of prophetic dreams, and he is the god of the body. In the latter part of Zarathustra there is a beautiful poem where Nietzsche describes how he was digging down into himself, working into his own shaft; there you can see how intensely he experienced the going into himself, till he suddenly produced the explosion of the most original form of spirit, the Dionysian.<sup>14</sup>

Mr. Baumann: In the beginning of Faust there is a monologue where he was considering which was first, spirit, the word—or the deed, the action.<sup>15</sup> Wasn't he putting the spirit into the body there?

Prof. Jung: Faust is already modern in that Goethe felt that the word alone was not enough. But it is the only available term to translate Logos, for Logos is most certainly not action. For the antique man, however, it was action, the word was the action of the spirit.

Mr. Baumann: Wasn't the word more a command?

Prof. Jung: Later on it became a command, but at that time it was the pneuma, which means the face of God, the Angel of the Face in the Old Testament. The Sufi conception of Allah, Chidr, is the Angel of the Face. It is the visibility of God, the face of the pneuma. The angel of the word, or the god of the word, is the visibility of the word. Therefore Christ, being God's son who became flesh, is the word.

Mr. Allemann: For many people I think there is still the word of power; the mantra has spirit or energy behind it.

Prof. Jung: But reversed energy. The mantra is the word which is supposed to open the magic door and is used in order to produce magic effects. It is a piece of old memory. It once was the face of God, and for those people in whom a bit of the old spirit is still alive, it can produce magic effects; but to us it means nothing. It is a word.

Mrs. Fierz: Originally the word was not at all clear; it was dark, and therefore it carried the secret meaning.

Prof. Jung: Yes, the words of God were the words of an oracle, for instance. And the words were dark; they were not concepts but the expression of the divine power. It was not necessary to understand. One had only to accept the divine word and one had accepted God. But you see, we expect words which we understand, and then they are just words. So a mantra means a world to people to whom it means anything at all, but to us it means nothing. For we simply judge by the words, or we judge by the extraordinary aspect of symbols. We find Mithraic symbols in a grotto, and ask what they mean, or think perhaps that they are foolish or poor. We don't know what spirit has created them, nor what spirit is behind them. Those symbols were expressions of a tremendous phenomenon. In themselves they are just traces, the footprints of something that has passed. But the footprints, of course, are not the being; you see, those people really beheld the being and therefore paid little attention to the footprints. Only when the thing had passed, when people were asking if there was anything left, they said, "Ah, here are footprints," and then they made a great story about them. So our situation is exactly reversed: we are now in the age where there is nothing but words, footprints—but we can do nothing with them, they are dead. Therefore, we must turn away from them and go back to the source where the whole thing began originally. And here is a message: Zarathustra says to go back to the body, go into the body, and then everything will be right, for there the greatest intelligence is hidden. Out of that living body everything originally has come. Well, that is true. One can say nothing else.

"Ego" sayest thou, and art proud of that word. But the greater thing—in which thou art unwilling to believe—is thy body with its big sagacity; it saith not "ego," but doeth it.

Here Nietzsche or Zarathustra prepares our minds for a very important insight; namely, it is not "I" that is intelligent. When we say "I," we mean our minds and think that whatever we can know of ourselves is known. That is a very curious prejudice. Only yesterday, for instance, a relatively intelligent lady was in my consulting room—apparently she has read many books—and she told me of her peculiar neurosis. Then she said, "And the most interesting thing is that my neurosis has no cause whatever, absolutely none; it has no meaning and no reason." I said, "Then it is a present from heaven, for I never heard of a neurosis that was without cause." "Yes," she said, "it must be something like that because really there is no cause for it, I know everything about myself." Perfectly harmless and innocent! She is absolutely aware of her psychology! There is a mountain, but she has not seen it. At the end of the hour she knew that something had been done in her which she had not done. She has been done; she has lived something which she did not understand, which she did not know—and it lived her.

It is a great discovery that below or aside from one's psyche, or consciousness, or mind, is another intelligence of which one is not the maker, and upon which one depends. You see, Freud's great fear is that there may be something outside which is not "I"; to say there is a greater intelligence outside of one's own mind means that one must be crazy. Like Nietzsche. Unfortunately for Freud, Nietzsche was not the only one who had such thoughts; it was the conviction of all the thousands of years before Nietzsche, that man's intelligence was not the last word, that even his mind was the result of something behind the screen—that we are not the makers, but we are made. Your mind is not the creative god that makes a whole world jump into existence out of nothing. There is a preparation. There is, prior to consciousness, an unconscious out of which consciousness once arose, and that is an intelligence which surely exceeds our intelligence in an indefinite way.

LECTURE IV

Prof. Jung:

We have a series of questions this morning. The first is by Mrs. Baumann: "In speaking about the spirit I cannot help thinking of Germany today and the 'high wind' blowing there. You once spoke about it in the seminar and in that connection I would like to ask if the backward movement of the swastika cannot be linked up with the backward movement of the Platonic year? I mean that since the manifestation is collective and racial, the swastika symbol might be turned backwards to mark the movement into Aquarius. It might be collectively valid for the tree of mankind, instead of the sun-moving swastika."

This is a bit involved. Of course I did not mention the swastika but was there something in particular in what I said last time which prompted this question, except that I was speaking of the spirit?

Mrs. Baumann: Only in the sense that so many people are talking about the backward movement of things.

Prof. Jung: By the backward movement, do you mean the so-called regression in Germany—going back from Christianity to heathendom for instance?

Mrs. Baumann: Yes, and the swastika itself is running backward. And you were saying that the meaning had gone out of spirit, descended to the mind, and then to words.

Mrs. Leon: You said that the spirit had to go back into the body.

Prof. Jung: That is it. The main emphasis is entirely on the body, and the descent of the spirit into the sphere of the body; in those paragraphs we dealt with last time, Nietzsche says that the spirit is reduced to a mere plaything of the body. And looked at from a spiritual point of view that is terrible regression, a movement backwards quite definitely. Ask any good Christian and he will say so. Therefore, Nietzsche has been accused of every unspeakable crime; he has even been made responsible for the world war. So the idea of the backward movement is quite justified, and I am glad to enter upon your question.

Mrs. Baynes: It seems to me the picture is terribly confused by hitching up this backward movement to the constellation of Aquarius.

Prof. Jung: Now wait! We are jumping enough already. Mrs. Baumann asks first about the actual spiritual movement in Germany, and she links this movement, which is a regression, to archaic symbolism and an archaic point of view in general; and she asks whether this movement is expressed also in the swastika which is moving backwards. You know, according to Buddhism, the movement to the left is not so much a backward movement as it is a wrong movement. It is a general idea in India as well as in Tibet, that in going round the stupa or what they call the thorten (a sort of shrine, the equivalent of our cross, or those little chapels in the country with a picture of a saint), you must move round it in the way the sun goes; otherwise it is wrong. So the rotation in mandalas, expressed, say, by the swastika or a spiral or a vortex, must be in the sense of the hands on a watch; that is the way in which the light must rotate and the way you must move. If you move against it, it is evil, for you undo the regular course of things; therefore, it is associated with black magic. The way of spiritual differentiation or improvement is understood as the path of the right hand, and the opposite is the path of the left hand. Those two expressions are used in Tantrism for instance. The chakra-puja, where certain peculiar rites are practiced which are in bad repute, is called the path of the left hand, and that is also associated with magic, the left hand being the reversed sense, the way against the sun. Now curiously enough, one does not know how that originated. And those rather competent National Socialists to whom I talked in Germany did not know that their swastika was turning the wrong way. Somebody called their attention to it rather indelicately, and they suddenly said, "Dr. Jung, do explain to us why the swastika is turning the wrong way." A most embarrassing question! Sure enough, they hoped to get me into a fix. But you see, though it moves the wrong way when you look at it, if you put yourself into the National Socialist swastika, it moves the right way. The symbol is far-reaching; it has a certain psychological meaning, of whatever kind it is. So I think it really means something that the swastika is moving the wrong way.<sup>1</sup>

Mr. Allemann: The swastika is the color of the sun, so I think it also means something that the National Socialist swastika is black.

<sup>1</sup> The swastika (Sanskrit for Good Luck), related to both the wheel and the cross, has been found, inter alia, in Greece, Tibet, Peru, Israel, and among American Indians. Jung was later to write that the left-turning swastika of the Nazis indicates regression to the unconscious. 7 Oct. 1946; Letters, vol. I, p. 444.

Prof. Jung: Exactly. It ought to be golden. That is most interesting—as interesting as the fact that the Soviets, who really cannot be accused of spiritual symbolism, have chosen the five-rayed star. The five-rayed star is the pentagram, and because it is the sign of earthly man, it is the sign of evil magic. You see, David's star is six-rayed, but the Soviet star is not only five-rayed, it is also red, the color of blood, so it is an intensely evil sign. Of course, the people who chose it for the Soviet had no idea of that. We can speculate—make a fantasy about it—and say that a master of the black arts was behind the whole show there. But I don't believe in such stunts, as little as I believe that the Mahatmas have whispered in my ear. (You know, the theosophists say that inasmuch as I have said anything good, it has been whispered into my ears by the Mahatmas living in Tibet, and the rest is rubbish.)

Mrs. Baynes: Going back to the point about the clockwise and counterclockwise, you remember in The Secret of the Golden Flower, the movement is counterclockwise, but it is supposed to be good. Also the Kundalini is supposed to be counterclockwise in the beginning.

Mrs. Baynes: But you would not put it under black magic.

Prof. Jung: Well, it has that association because anything dark is of course associated with black magic. But that is not a valid statement; it is merely a fact that people associate it with black magic. And it is interesting that, if you go the wrong way round the tchorten, if you go against the sun, you have done something which is not regular, which is against the ordinances of heaven; if you want to be in a decent connection you must take the natural course: you must move with the sun.

Mrs. Adler: How is it in the horoscope? There are two movements there I think.

Prof. Jung: Yes, we have the peculiar astrological statements of the progressive movement of the sun through the signs of the zodiac, and the retrograde movement of the spring point in the zodiac. The horoscope has of course much to do with the mandala, and in mandalas also you often have the two movements at the same time; you see, that has to do with the union of pairs of opposites. I have already given you a lengthy explanation about these two movements in the horoscope. The one is the correct movement of the sun, beginning in the spring sign of the zodiac, in Aries the ram, then going on to Taurus the bull, and Gemini, etc.; and the other is the retrograde movement of the spring point (the position of the sun on the 21st of March) and that is called the precession of the equinoxes. And this movement is the basis for an entirely different calculation of time. The movement of the sun clockwise makes the year, for the sun completes its course in one year and then returns to Aries, to the spring point; but the way of the precession of the equinoxes is the opposite, against the clock, and it takes twenty-six thousand years to return to the spring point, it takes 2,150 years to make one month, and the total, twelve months, takes twenty-six thousand years. That is the Platonic year, and that is the movement of the left hand, one could say.

Now Mrs. Baumann refers to the curious astrological statement that the position of the spring equinox is characteristic of a period of time. Of course this is a hypothesis, as it is a hypothesis that the position of the sun, or another planet, the so-called rising sign (that zodiacal sign which is just rising above the horizon at the moment of birth) is characteristic for the individual born at that moment. I cannot explain how people came to such assumptions; one must just take that for granted. The whole of astrology is based upon such an assumption. And I can't help mentioning again that, peculiarly enough, astrologers have clung to this statement even since it has become obvious that, on account of the precession of the equinoxes, the horoscope does not fit the actual constellation in the heavens. For instance, if you say the sun is in Aries, and then look at the sun with a telescope, you find it is not in Aries: it is sixty degrees back of Aries, it is at the end of the Fishes. So the astrological statement that because your sun was in such and such a sign, you have therefore such and such qualities, is not based upon astronomical facts; yet the astrologer goes on talking in that style. You see, our time calculation is entirely artificial. Those are only names which have nothing to do with the actual position of the planets or the sun or the moon in certain constellations. But the calculation of the Platonic year—when we say, for instance, that the spring point is now moving out of the last degrees of the Fishes into the sign of Aquarius, the water man—is a true astronomical statement. There we have a coincidence with the actual astronomical position of the spring equinox.

It is a very curious fact that enlightened astrologers of our day say the horoscope has of course nothing to do with the position of the stars, but it has to do with the dynamics of the seasons—spring, summer, autumn, and winter. That is valid. It is understandable that animals born in spring are different from those born in the fall; that is a fact which is generally known. And if applied to man, that can have an influence upon his constitution also, mental as well as physical. But those enlightened astrologers who know that the horoscope has no longer any parallelism with the actual position of the stars, now deny the efficiency of the actual astronomical position; they say that the precession of the equinoxes has absolutely no influence on the human constitution. They deny that also because they are enlightened. You see, the whole matter is something about which one should not be enlightened; there are certain things which one understands ever so much better if one is not enlightened. Why that is so is a very great and very profound philosophical problem, and I had better not go into it. But, you see, that is what Mrs. Baumann means—that this backward movement of the swastika is in a sort of magic or sympathetic correspondence with the backward movement of the spring equinox, and this becomes particularly important in our times. We are in a time of transition, no doubt, and that is coincident with the transition of the spring equinox from the Fishes into Aquarius. According to astrological definition, that should produce a peculiar change in our human mind, which means in our attitude. So if one likes, one can parallelize the actual psychological development of man with this peculiar astronomical fact.

It is really remarkable that one sees everywhere, practically the same thing. Between Bolshevism and National Socialism there is only a very slight difference. And there is practically none between National Socialism and Fascism, just the difference of Italy and Germany, as the difference between Germany and Russia makes the difference between their two political movements. But au fond it is the same thing, so much so that enlightened National Socialists told me that this is of course the German form of Bolshevism. One sees the same movement in other countries where it has no such name. Roosevelt's New Deal is the same thing, and Lloyd George looks to Germany for his ideas about a new deal. He declared quite recently in the Manchester Guardian that he admired the Germans for their excellent ideas; his proposition for a new deal is really influenced by them. What Roosevelt is trying to produce is of course in harmony with the technical and businesslike character of America, so it takes on a sort of economic aspect, but au fond it is exactly the same thing again. These mass movements all over the world—on a small scale the Oxford Movement even—are always the same. It is a sort of collectivity on a low level. Therefore, one can really say there is a tremendous transformation going on throughout the world, and it is coincident with the approach of Aquarius.

Aquarius has always been characterized as an aerial sign, and it has to do with the wind of spring which brings the rain clouds; it is the sign of this actual time, which is the rainy season in those countries where the old Babylonian zodiac originated, in Mesopotamia for instance. At this time the wind rises, bringing the winter rains from the sea. Later on comes the spring and the first evidence, the inundation, would be Pisces, and then comes Aries, the first fertility, the first shoots—the pushing Ram is the push of the first green leaves. Now Aquarius, being a wind sign, is of course a pneumatic sign, a sign of spiritual movement, of atmospheres and atmospheric disturbances. Moreover, modern astrology has associated the planet Uranus with Aquarius, and Uranus is the planet of unforeseen incidents or accidents, a most electric planet, causing thunderstorms and irregular and unforeseen events.

Now, in choosing the black swastika turning to the left, the Germans have surely expressed the backward movement in many ways. First of all, the swastika is a pagan sun symbol in spite of the fact that it is found in early Christianity, in the catacombs for instance—though probably it was in that case simply left over from pagan times. It is found all over the earth; it is an exceedingly archaic sun symbol. Then secondly, its backward movement, and thirdly the black color, the color of evil. Those are regressions into archaism, into the path of the left hand, which is the dark unconscious side. So one could say the sun is now transformed into a counter-sun, a sun which is not above but below, which is not bright but dark, which does not go clockwise but counter-clockwise. It is a revolution against the old trend of things, and therefore progress is arrested: there is a regression. People are asking, what about the German universities, what about the further progress of science, and the further progress of justice, of equality, of democratic rights? Everything has become questionable. International commerce, for instance, and all the laws to provide decent international dealings have now gone to the wind. Of course, you can explain the German inflation through the extreme misery of those people after the war, but you cannot explain why America has gone off the gold standard; that was a crime, highway robbery, just as black as the swastika.

Mrs. Sigg: I think one could have a bit more optimistic ideas about it. The flag we had in Prussia was black and white, and the first Reich was black, white, and red; so there is now less black in the flag at any rate, and also it has a more differentiated shape.

Prof. Jung: Well, we are not judges; we simply make statements. You know that there is nothing so evil that something good could not come out of it. We can only look at things as they are just now, the way they look from the outside. If one could be inside Mr. Roosevelt's mind, I am quite certain it would not look like that; he would think a great deal of his New Deal, and Mr. Lloyd George also, no doubt. One cannot help admitting that Fascism has done any amount of good for Italy; it is a different country. And so there are plenty of people, foreigners (the Germans themselves are inclined to be prejudiced), who have seen and praised what has happened in Germany, and even in Russia, as a higher tendency. So it is exceedingly difficult to judge. From one aspect things are positive, and from another, quite negative.

Mrs. Sigg: Il faut reculer pour mieux sauter.<sup>2</sup>

Prof. Jung: It depends upon whether we give credit to the vitality of the European race or not. There were certain reculements in history where no better jump followed, the Romans did not jump any higher after Rome had gone down. And think of Egypt, Babylonia, Assyria—all the great empires! But as long as there is vitality left in a race, the reculer is surely pour mieux sauter.

Dr. Escher: If one is in the Southern Hemisphere, the sun is going against the watch hand; it is then going the opposite way.

Prof. Jung: Yes, south of the equator, but from our point of view it always goes clockwise. We must not be too enlightened about these matters. This going clockwise is relative, of course. If you put yourself on the South Pole, or at Cape Town, it moves the other way naturally. Or if you turn your back to the sun, it is going the wrong way too. You see, that whole thing has been invented north of the equator; these statements are only true within the sphere in which they are made.

Now we come to the second question by Mrs. Baynes: "Is it possible to define the connection between spirit and (a) the archetypes, (b) the collective unconscious, (c) the self? Or, must we think of spirit as a psychological variable which we can recognize by its effects upon us, but which baffles all attempts to attach it to any of the phenomena we can observe in the psyche?"

This question touches upon a very ticklish problem, one quite difficult to elucidate; it is very much a matter of definition, you know. We have a certain idea of spirit which is chiefly traditional; originally spirit, pneuma, meant wind, or breath, therefore something semi-substantial. This is quite obviously an archaic point of view, however. Within the sphere of religious dogma the old idea of the spirit or pneuma can easily be applied. One can imagine that God's grace is something semi-substantial, like the fire that came from heaven in the miracle of Pentecost. But when it comes to a psychological understanding of the spirit one naturally must make an end of these ideas and then one is confronted with the necessity for a decent definition of that psychological phenomenon called spirit. The German word for spirit is Geist, which as I told you last week originally meant a sort of effervescence, a welling up. Probably the word geyser has to do with it, because in the etymology of that word, the root would be found in the Gothic word usgeisjou which means an effervescence or a welling up, exactly like the Swiss word uf-geiste. This latter means very much what énergé means in French; when one is énergé, one is irritated beyond measure, so that at any moment an explosion can take place. People who are filled with spirit are excited—they gesticulate and talk a lot. After the miracle of Pentecost, the disciples were said to have been as if drunk with sweet wine.

So the word Geist describes more definitely a psychological condition than the word spiritus, “wind, breath”; and the Greek word pneuma meaning wind, which in the later religious rites came to mean spirit; then the Latin word for mind and spirit, animus, is a cousin or a replica of the Greek word animos, meaning wind tout bonnement. Now these words are far more objective, they are sort of objective definitions or abstractions of a psychological condition; while the German Geist, being more primitive, remains stuck in the psychological Ur-phänomen, and describes an emotional condition. True to this history of the concept, then, we must assume that the phenomenon of spirit or Geist is a peculiar experience which has at the same time intellectual or mental contents, and emotions—it is an intense awareness coupled with emotion. For instance, an important revelation, an inspiration (which has to do with breathing into) would be Geist, so the real meaning would be an illumination, an enlightenment, accompanied by a more or less vehement outburst of emotions. Now, that is clearly a sort of mystical experience, and all the other forms of Geist are more or less derivatives from such a condition.

This concept has finally degenerated, however, into what one would call “mind” or “intellect” which is no longer a mystical experience. It is now a function of man. When man experiences his own function as an objective event, the word Geist would be used: inspiration or spirit. The same thing used as a function would be called “mind” or “intellect”; it would no longer be spirit. Spirit is an objective spontaneous event; it is nothing one can make. It is something which has an overpowering influence, so one should reserve the word Geist for those moments when we are in a sort of effervescence, a heightened or exalted condition. Taking Geist as a designation or term for such a condition, then, it must be a matter of a thought, say, or an idea, which is of a greater intensity for the time being than one’s subjective consciousness. It must be an autonomous content which catches hold of one. This coincides with the use of the word spirit in certain cases. One says, for instance, "It is not done in the spirit of your late father. Es ist nicht im Geist deiner Eltern." Or, "It is not in the spirit of such and such a political or religious movement." That means that one is guided by the superior principle or thought, of one's father, or the church, or the Pope, or the Christian idea, or the political idea. Der Geist des Nationalsozialismus means the general attitude caused by certain central ideas, slogans, or whatever they may be—a general idea which has the effect of a leading principle. One can use here a term from psychology: eine führende Obervorstellung.<sup>3</sup> That is also Geist, but it is always connected with the idea of a sort of super-imposed or superior principle which has a guiding effect, or the effect of forcing one to something.

Now, if you take Geist in that sense, of course you can link it up easily with archetypes: the archetypal idea can be the leading force, the superior psychological fact, or content, which forces you to a certain way of acting. It is also the collective unconscious, which is then practically the same as the archetype; for when an archetype has forced you to act in a certain way, you are of course under the domination or the influence of the collective unconscious. And it is also the self, because the self works through the archetypes and the collective unconscious, the self being at the same time a most archaic factor and the goal. You see, that has very much to do with the peculiar timelessness of the collective unconscious, where the oldest thing is the most recent thing, or the future—or it is in no time at all. The collective unconscious is the foundation of life, the eternal truth of life, the eternal basis and the eternal goal. It is the endless sea from which life originates and into which life flows back, and it remains forever the same. That is, of course, expressed in terms of philosophic speculation. We have no means to prove such a thing, but that is the way the collective unconscious appears to us. Thus, we can say the connection of the spirit with the archetypes, with the collective unconscious, and with the self, is perfectly clear and evident if we understand spirit as a sort of attitude characterized by the fact that one is, as a subject, an ego, under the domination of a leading idea.

Mr. Allemann: Is not spirit rather the energy which is behind the whole thing?

Prof. Jung: It is the emotional power.

Mr. Allemann: It is not an idea in itself, then, but the power behind it?

<sup>3</sup> "A guiding idea or overview."

Prof. Jung: Exactly. Therefore, I said it must be an idea and emotional at the same time; otherwise, it has no power.

Mr. Allemann: Then one should not say "spirit"?

Prof. Jung: But when people talk of Geist, that word also produces nothing; it is perfectly powerless!

Prof. Reichstein: Is not the ghost the most primitive idea of spirit?

Prof. Jung: Yes, and a ghost is also a derivative of the wind idea.

Prof. Reichstein: The personal ghost is more concrete while the wind is more abstract already.

Prof. Jung: That would be like the primitive idea: the last thing which leaves the body is the soul, and the last sign of life being the last breath, that breath carries the soul out into space where it becomes a ghost. And the ghost, they explained to me, is nothing but a puff of wind; one cannot see ghosts but one feels them, and the arch-ghost is a deity of the night without shape, the maker of fear. They described it very dramatically as a sudden puff of wind which makes one so afraid that one dies of fear. You know, it is a peculiar fact that in a spiritualistic séance, one very often notices, just before something happens, a cool draught of wind, together with a smell of ozone.

We come now to question No. 3, by Miss Hannah: "In connection with what you said last time about Logos and the difference between intellect and spirit, I should like to know how you understand the word Logos used as the Logos principle?"

You are asking for a definition of the concept of the Logos, and there I must say what I have already said: it is not a scientific concept, but an intuitive concept: you must allow for that. There are certain psychological concepts which are based upon the logic of facts, the fact of the introverted type for instance, or the libido concept, and they are in a way effective. You can make them evident. Whereas an intuitive concept is an attempt at a concept; it is a provisional formulation. Sometimes it is a mere symbol for something you don't know. Just as an intuitive type doesn't create a fact—he creates the ghost of a fact. Now, of course, if one happens to be an intuitive, one likes to handle the results of one's own intuition as facts. For instance, with the telescope of your intuition you gaze on the top of a mountain, and there you see a little stone, and then you assume that you have been on the top of that mountain. And curiously enough, you leave a trace—a tin can—so although you have not been there, you have spoiled the show for the poor sensation type who is actually climbing up. Nobody had been there: you have just fired the tin can up there with your telescope. I can tell you other stories about intuitives; that is not the worst by a long shot. Mind you that is no caricature; I am simply telling a parapsychological fact. Any intuition is an icicle which is shot without noticing that it causes, perhaps, intense pain in the stomach of the victim. An intuition is by no means nothing, but it is not the fact which many people assume it to be; they say they know all about something but they have only glanced at it. The opinion may be right; if you are optimistic the chances are about fifty-fifty, but one is often 50 percent mistaken. An intuition amounts to nothing if it has no positive results, and it has not always positive results. One thing is certain; if you have an intuition about a thing, you have not been there. You still have to make the way.

So an intuitive concept is just a shot at something which we cannot grasp or formulate otherwise than by such a lucky shot; it is like trying to hit the famous silver thread suspended in a cloud. You don't see it in the cloud, but you aim at it and you might cut the thread by your arrow. That is intuition. Now, an intuitive concept is necessary, it is unavoidable; but it is not a welcome thing really. It is always embarrassing because it is a trap for yourself and for your intellect; you are easily trapped thereby. Somebody will come along most certainly and ask, "What did you mean exactly by that thought?" You see, you have engaged yourself, you talked your mouthful about it; you said Logos and Eros and everybody thought you knew what you were talking about. And then there you are! You can only stammer because you don't know. So Logos can only be described with the aid of an apologetic smile—that is the only thing you can do. Logos, if you are pleased and benevolent, might be such and such a thing.

For instance, give me a definition of Eros. One has a hunch but one is in the same hole. So one asks oneself, "What have I to say about Logos? The nearest I can get is, that it is a certain peculiar quality in a man's being which leads him to discriminate, to reason, to judge, to divide, to understand in a particular way." And one cannot understand all this without also thinking of its antithesis, the equally intuitive concept of Eros, which would be, then, a principle of relatedness, seeing things together, gathering things together, establishing relations between things—not judging things, not looking at them properly, but rather attracting or repelling them. That is Eros. You see, it has neither legs nor feet nor hands nor a head nor anything; it is a helpless thing. It is an intuitive point of view which cannot be brought down to earth. It is a bird on the wing, a pigeon on the roof; and your scientific or intellectual concept is the sparrow in the hand. The pigeon on the roof can fly away any time; nevertheless, the pigeon is a reality. So there is an indefinable something about man which in this or another way, can possibly be grasped. Logos is an attempt at a concept and it characterizes a certain quality which seems to be a general quality of man.

Logos also contains the idea of the word; legein means to talk, to speak. It is another characteristic of man that he insists upon giving voice to an idea, designating it, giving a name, making a concept, expressing it, while woman, characterized more by Eros, can leave things in suspenso; they have not necessarily to be said. A man says, "Why the devil don't you say so?" but a woman doesn't need to say so, and usually she doesn't. Or she says something else, and a man is always convinced that she has said just the thing she should not have said, for to his mind she does not designate, does not put her finger on it, doesn't make the word. Therefore, men's ideas about women—about their talk, you know: gossip and afternoon tea, that intricate talk, the indirect vague way of women. If he carefully follows up such a conversation, however, he sees that she is like a spider weaving a web, relating things by secret threads, and some fly suddenly flies into the net and wonders how the devil it got there. The talk of women, being roundabout, doesn't consist of words but of spider webs, and they have a purpose different from that of a man. He means, "This is a chair, damn you, and it is not a footstool." This is interesting to him; he establishes this particular distinguishing factor. But it is not interesting to a woman: if this is not a chair it is a footstool and one can sit on a footstool if there is no chair. As my uncle used to say, "If man had not invented a spoon by which to stir the soup, you women would still go on stirring the soup with a stick." To a woman it doesn't matter so much. It only matters inasmuch as a difference must be covered up or related; a bridge must be made in between, and that is the weaving of plots.

The natural mind of a woman consists chiefly in weaving plots. That is no joke, but a fact. It is not a libel against women. It is just so: in their natural mind they establish spider webs, threads leading from here to there which connect them up. Eventually a woman gets herself in it as well; it is a very serious business. Many a woman who has woven a plot was the fly in the spider's web. They are natural spiders, because they can thus find out about connections. You see, that is Eros. But such a description should be poetic, really, in order to be convincing. An intuitive concept can be excellently described by a poet but not by a scientist. He is almost too masculine, in a way, to give a name to it. Therefore a man, in order to be definite, very often cuts a thing away from life; he does not understand its living function. Only very late in life does he arrive at an understanding of natural groupings or natural formation. For instance, old Linnaeus made a botanical system—so many petals, so many parts and divisions and so on—classifying everything according to a rigid, almost arithmetical system.<sup>4</sup> But look at the way modern botanists now assemble plants naturally in families: they observe plant life in natural symbiotic groups. It is topographical. A plant is in a living symbiosis with the rock upon which it grows, and with other plants, and with animals. But that was arrived at very late; first of all, science insisted upon just making straight lines through nature by arithmetical laws. That is the designating character of the Logos.

Had it entered woman's sphere at all, if she had been called upon to produce a system of plants, she would naturally have made a huge plot about them: how this kind of flower was intriguing against another one and so on. It would have been a romance. They would have married, or they would have made most wonderful bastards together, such and such a bastard coming from such and such a lady flower. There would have been natural families quite certainly from the beginning. The genetic point of view would have been considered, which man only discovered very late, for the genealogical instinct of woman is tremendous—who is the grandson of whom, who is the great grandaunt of this one. That is an important item of female conversation, and it is another application of the same principle. Of course, not when women with great minds are gathered together!—but ordinary women's conversation. They are always informed about an entirely different world from man's world; man's world is strange to that kind of mind, as a woman's world is strange to a man. He simply does not see things under that aspect. Therefore, Anatole France is quite right when he says that when men have worked things up to a fix, they must call in an intelligent woman, a saint, to solve the riddle, to untie the Gordian knot; you can read this in L'Isle des Penguins, a very instructive book.<sup>5</sup>

The Logos, then, is an intuitive concept that covers tentatively a large field of observational experience which cannot be summed up in any known form; with no forms in which to catch it, it is the nearest we can get to it. If anybody else has a better idea, I am only too glad to accept it, but I know nothing better. One has to go very warily with such concepts. I should advise you to use these terms as little as possible, because they are always a trap. Of course occasionally, for the sake of brevity, one has to use them and provided you know what I mean by it, then I have said something in a few words. But you must know what kind of experience is behind it. Well, we have spent nearly all our time over it, but we rather needed to clarify these concepts. The next verse is:

What the sense feeleth, what the spirit discerneth, hath never its end in itself. But sense and spirit would fain persuade thee that they are the end of all things: so vain are they.

To what does that refer?

Mrs. Baumann: In this translation, Sinn is called "mind." Is that right?

Prof. Jung: Well, unfortunately it means sense too, and the word sense surely is not identical with mind. It is definitely what we call sense. And Sinn can also be translated by "meaning"; Wilhelm translates Tao by Sinn for instance, while others call Tao "meaning."<sup>6</sup> Sinn often means Gemüt, and Gemütlichkeit is most definitely an emotional feeling which by a peculiar lack of differentiation is mixed up with sensation, Empfindung, so the sense quality comes in there too. That is due to the fact that in the Germanic mind the functions of feeling and sensation are not properly differentiated yet; one sees it all over the place, being everywhere obvious. Gemüt or Gemütlichkeit is an unfathomable soup of sensation and feelings and emotions. And Gemütlichkeit is pregnant with all sorts of objects and associations; it smells of beer and tobacco and blood-and-liver sausages and sauerkraut. There are people sitting around a stove in a warm room with a low smoke-blackened ceiling, and there is a coffeepot, and they drink and talk slowly, and it is evening and very nice and comfortable. All these things belong and must be mentioned in order to know what Gemütlichkeit means. It is a wonderfully primitive concept. There is no word in the world so pregnant as Gemüt. It is amazing what happens when you say that word. It is as comprehensive as a mantra; you draw in realities. When you say "sense," God! that is poor; when you say "mind," the meaning is too definite; when you say "meaning," you ask what meaning, you draw nothing in; but if a German says Gemüt or Gemütlichkeit, he does not need to ask what or where or who.<sup>7</sup>

Mr. Allemann: Would it be "homely" or "homelike" in English?

Prof. Jung: Well, that is not the same by far. They just don't possess such a word. It is still primitive. I am sure there are such words in Russian, or any other primitive languages, words that describe plastic situations. So the Germans still have words of power: they produce. For instance, when men come together and it is not particularly interesting and there is no particular point in it and something ought to be done about the situation, they say: wir wollen gemütlich sein. There it is. Somebody speaks the mantra and he has created something. So, as I say, Sinn has an emotional aspect and then it is a sort of Gemüt; it has a sensation aspect and then it is Sinnlichkeit; and it has an intellectual aspect which is meaning.

<sup>6</sup> Richard Wilhelm's introducing Jung to I Ching, or The Book of Changes, proved to be crucial for Jung's work. See MDR, appendix IV. For Wilhelm on Tao as Sinn see above, 31 Oct. 1934, n. 8. However, the opening lines of the Tao Te King say that the true Tao cannot be named.

<sup>7</sup> Empfindung is usually translated as "sensation," "perception," or even "sentiment"; Gemüt, as "feeling," "heart."

Mrs. Baynes: It seems to me, if it were translated "What the sense perceives," "perceives" would take care of both feeling and intellect.

Prof. Jung: Yes, that would be better.

Dr. Schlegel: I think in the second sentence, Sinn and Gemüt have another meaning than in the first one. They are objective, whilst in the first sentence there is a subjective meaning.

Prof. Jung: But it says afterwards: "Instruments and playthings are mind (or sense) and spirit," and it is obvious that he means two mental factors. The word spirit or Geist is here about the same as "mind"; "and mind feeleth" so it can be intuitive; or it can be Gemüt; or you can say "sense" if you like. But the important thing here is in how far they persuade us that they are the "end of all things" or ends in themselves. Now are they ends in themselves? Or in how far do they try to convince us that they are? That is the point and that is the object of his criticism.

Mrs. Fierz: They lead to a certain oneness; they can be taken together again and again, until you have the feeling that you have reached a certain unity. That is not quite true, but the materialistic mind at least thinks it can lead to oneness.

Prof. Jung: You mean the materialistic mind thought of it as one principle.

Mrs. Fierz: Yes, the monistic idea.

Miss Wolff: In a measure, the only purpose in people's attitude is to recognize, to reach the meaning. Then that is a purpose of life.

Prof. Jung: Well, I would say that either awareness, or sense, or mind, or intellect, or spirit in a metaphysical sense—always try to persuade us that, by their results or their statements, the ultimate truth could be established—and that that would be the meaning of life altogether. For instance, the scientific intellect makes it a purpose of its existence to establish a truth, as if that were the real goal of life; and as mentality could be made the goal of life, so another function can make another goal, create another meaning of life, and try to persuade us that that is the only thing. You see, when functions are differentiated in a one-sided way, when you are always living on one function, then that function gets the better of you and insists that the whole meaning of life is nothing but that. But if you know that you are not identical with a function—if you are the subject of your functions, not the object—then you can say, my goal is so and so, and the function is subservient. That is what Nietzsche wants to bring about. Naturally, if you are identical with one function, that function tries to persuade you that its data, its realities, are the meaning of your life. Therefore, you should see that you are the master of your functions, that you are the subject of your functions, and not the object.

LECTURE V

Prof. Jung:

Here is a question which is not exactly a question. An anonymous writer who signs herself Mrs. Spider-web has sent me this contribution: "Prof. Superman's suggestion that the black swastika is the earth turning away from the sun connects with the four-square aspect of the earth (since the swastika is square) and with the Chinese I Ching discussion in which you described the Chinese square as having motion—a vortex. As the earth is also body, the swastika is also man, which also links up with Aquarius, the Water-carrier. I am also tempted to mention Pegasus, the square constellation, which has to do with inspiration and which would connect with the golden sun swastika. Therefore the swastika symbol contains all the elements with which Zarathustra is dealing."

That there is a connection is undeniable: there is the synchronous connection, and then that Pegasus business is a most interesting allusion. Mrs. Spider-web must know about the maps of the sky. It is true that above Aquarius is the square constellation of Pegasus, as I mentioned in a former Seminar. That it would connect with the golden sun swastika, I don't see. If the writer had elaborated a bit on these allusions, it would help us to understand it better. There are too many jumps in it. It contains a lot of good intuitions, but a bit more meat would be desirable.

We are still in the chapter, "The Despisers of the Body." We got stuck in that paragraph, "Instruments and playthings are sense and spirit." There we had some difficulty with the German word Sinn. In summing up, I would say that this German concept of Sinn in connection with spirit is a sort of antithesis, Sinn and Geist; and one could use here the word Gemüt to express the meaning of Sinn. Also one could say the emotional psyche and the spirit, Seele und Geist, obviously express a totality. Now these are, he says, tools and playthings, which would mean that they are not things in themselves but rather applications or functions or epiphenomena or appendixes, because "behind them there is still the self." In other words, they are phenomena or manifestations of an underlying entity, which would mean an absolute definite reality, and that would be found in the self.

In the concept of the self we enter the sphere of our psychology which also has arrived at the conclusion that the total psychological being of man consists not only of consciousness, but in addition, of the unconscious. Obviously the ego, the personification of the center of consciousness, cannot be the whole of our psychical existence: the unconscious is needed to make a total. And if the unconscious is added to the conscious, then the central being, or the resultant of the two, would be the alter ego. For when one discovers the unconscious one discovers oneself too, but under an entirely different aspect; one discovers another self within oneself. This causes, as you know, a tremendous conflict, because we are not at one with our unconscious, that alter ego which is also designated as the shadow; as a rule, one has the greatest trouble to accept the shadow, the fact of one's own negation. For that other one in us is so utterly different from the conscious ego that one can say it amounts to a negation of the ego, particularly when one is in doubt which of the two ought to be; the shadow is so strong that you can be honestly in doubt as to what you really are.<sup>1</sup>

For instance, to have the fantasy of killing your enemy is sufficient for certain people to assume that they are potential murderers, to believe themselves wholly wrong, children of the devil; and then they get depressed, as if the possession of something against their grain would mean that they were nothing but bad. Such people are inclined to think that a man who kills another man, or who lies or steals, is entirely black, with nothing good in him; and naturally they are utterly intolerant of the weaknesses of other people because they cannot stand their own. It is one of the foremost tasks of analysis to bring these two sides together, to make it palatable to people that they are not only a resplendent ego which is always in a most suitable condition, newly washed and fit for the drawing room, but that they have also another side which is not acceptable and which cannot possibly be shown in public. Such a fact does not mean that the whole mixture is spoiled; it only means that the cake contains not only sugar but some salt also, and that the substance of which one is generally composed has its flaws. It is not quite pure.

Now, since the whole of the human being is something different from the conscious ego, it deserves another name, particularly because, when you assimilate the unconscious, you feel a certain objectivity about yourself. As a matter of fact, you cannot assimilate yourself, you cannot live with yourself, unless you understand yourself as a sort of givenness, a datum; you are an objective fact. If you assume that you are only the conscious ego, then it is as if you had wanted to bring about certain events, or had done certain things intentionally; but you cannot deny that it also looks as if they had just happened to you, as if you had encountered them, or perhaps as if you had been overcome by something strange and objective. So if you can assimilate your shadow, you then appear to yourself not only subjective but as something objective as well. You see, in assimilating the unconscious, you increase the circumference of your being to an unknown extent; moreover, you are including something in the totality of yourself which is not under your control: you can only control what is in consciousness.

It is as if you were ruler of a land which is only partially known to yourself, king of a country with an unknown number of inhabitants. You don't know who they are or what their condition may be; time and again you make the discovery that you have subjects in your country of whose existence you had no idea. Therefore, you cannot assume the responsibility; you can only say, "I find myself as the ruler of a country which has unknown borders and unknown inhabitants, possessing qualities of which I am not entirely aware." Then you are at once out of your subjectivity, and are confronted with a situation in which you are a sort of prisoner; you are confronted with unknown possibilities, because those many uncontrollable factors at any time may influence all your actions or decisions. So you are a funny kind of king in that country, a king who is not really a king, who is dependent upon so many known quantities and conditions that he often cannot carry through his own intentions. Therefore, it is better not to speak of being a king at all, and be only one of the inhabitants who has just a corner of that territory in which to rule. And the greater your experience, the more you see that your corner is infinitely small in comparison with the vast extent of the unknown against you. You get the entirely new idea that the Self is obviously something exceedingly influential and very strange and that you are just a part of it; you don't know how infinitesimal a part—or perhaps you are a considerable part. But at all events, you have to assume the attitude of somebody who has established his little kingdom in a continent of unknown extension, and beyond the indistinct borderline of your conscious kingdom is the absolutely unknown. Now, if you assume that this whole continent in which your little kingdom is to be found is ruled by a central power, then that central power would be your own king also; you would be a subject of that unknown grand power. And that would be the self, about as we think of it in psychology.

Of course I knew that Nietzsche had such a concept because I read Zarathustra for the first time when I was only twenty-three, and then later, in the winter of 1914-15, I studied it very carefully and made a lot of annotations. I was already interested in the concept of the self, but I was not clear how I should understand it. I made my marks, however, when I came across these passages, and they seemed very important to me. Yet I could not make use of it because one misses in Zarathustra the concept of the unconscious; there is only the conscious. Gemüt and Geist would be contents or qualities of consciousness. Therefore, there was the possibility—which I saw even then in Zarathustra—of the mistake which Nietzsche actually makes; namely, he identifies the ego with the self and therefore with the Superman. His ego simply merges into the Superman, as we have seen. That would be an incarnation of the self. But the self is much too big; you cannot possibly identify with it without incurring the risk of a fatal inflation. Therefore, the fatal end of the whole story—the stone that is thrown high falls back upon oneself. Such an identification can only lead to an explosion.

The concept of the self continued to recommend itself to me nevertheless. I thought Nietzsche meant a sort of thing-in-itself behind the psychological phenomenon. That is obviously expressed in the passage, "The self seeketh with the eyes of the senses, it hearkeneth also with the ears of the spirit." The self uses our mental and psychical phenomena as a sort of means of conveyance; that is, our psyche is used as a means of expression of the self or by the self. I saw then also that he was producing a concept of the self which was like the Eastern concept; it is an Atman idea. I don't know whether Nietzsche was influenced by anything Indian that he read, but I rather doubt it; it looks to me as if it were a very original invention. Naturally, the fact that there is a collective unconscious in which all these concepts are contained and from which the East has taken them, is a reason why one finds many Eastern parallels in Meister Eckhart's writings also, and even in Kant. Now, I have brought you today an Eastern text which shows this parallel beautifully; it is from the English translation of the Talavakara Upanishad, one of the series of the Sacred Books of the East.<sup>2</sup> I will read the first Khanda:

The pupil asks: "At whose wish does the mind sent forth proceed on its errand? At whose command does the first breath go forth? At whose wish do we utter this speech? What God directs the eye or the ear?"

The teacher replied: "It is the ear of the ear, the mind of the mind, the speech of speech, the breath of breath, and the eye of the eye. When freed (from the senses) the wise, on departing from this world, become immortal.

The eye does not go thither, nor speech, nor mind. We do not know, we do not understand, how any one can teach it.

It is different from the known, it is also above the unknown, thus we have heard from those of old who taught us this.

That which is not expressed by speech and by which speech is expressed, that alone know as Brahman, not that which people here adore.

That which does not think by mind, and by which, they say, mind is thought, that alone know as Brahman, not that which people here adore.

That which does not see by the eye, and by which one sees (the work of) the eyes, that alone know as Brahman, not that which people here adore.

That which does not hear by the ear, and by which the ear is heard, that alone know as Brahman, not that which people here adore.

That which does not breathe by breath, and by which breath is drawn, that alone know as Brahman, not that which people here adore."

Then there is a little paragraph in the second Khanda:

He by whom it (Brahman) is not thought, by him it is thought; he by whom it is thought, knows it not. It is not understood by those who understand it, it is understood by those who do not understand it.

This way of putting it is, of course, specifically Eastern; it is most descriptive, most plastic. You see, that which is behind and uses the ears and the eyes and the mind is Brahman, the self, the unutterable primordial substance of existence; and those who understand it do not understand it, but those who do not understand it, who cannot think it, understand it. If you desist from any attempt to understand it, therefore, you are about right, because that thing is utterly unthinkable. You cannot conceive of a thing in which you are contained; you can only conceive of the thing you are or of a thing that is like you, but not of the thing which is greater than you and which contains you. It is utterly futile even to attempt to describe that which is the sum total of conscious and unconscious; it is incomprehensible, beyond the possibilities of our thought. We only can suggest it by antinomies; it exists and does not exist, for instance. This Indian text is entirely to the point, therefore; it very clearly shows that this is a borderline concept beyond which there is no possibility for us.

You see, the concept of the self is a true symbol. We use a symbol to express something which cannot be expressed by any other means; the moment you have a better expression it is no longer a symbol. A symbol immediately collapses when you can see behind it. For why should you be complicated, why should you use allusion, when you can say it in a more simple way?<sup>3</sup> Of course, the idea of the self can be thought, inasmuch as it is a manifestation, a phenomenon—you can make a drawing of it if you like. The chakras, for instance, are stages of the self, the self in its different manifestations. Or take a very complete mandala, the Tibetan mandala of the four-square stupa, a vajra mandala; that is absolutely abstract. It is a symbol, yet you can talk about it, you can explain it. But you never can explain what the self is, because the self in itself is unthinkable. Now, that is not so here; to Nietzsche it is far more definite. He handles it as if it were explainable, and he identifies it with the body:

Ever hearkeneth the Self, and seeketh; it compareth, mastereth, conquereth, and destroyeth. It ruleth, and is also the ego's ruler.

Here you have it; it is the thing in which the "I" is contained, to which the "I" is subject.

Behind thy thoughts and feelings, my brother, there is a mighty lord, an unknown sage—it is called Self; it dwelleth in thy body, it is thy body.

And here he explains it and here he falls down because you cannot say it is this or that, it is always néti-néti. (The Indian formula which is usually translated, “neither this nor that.”) But he knows it is the body and that is the mistake; if he identifies the body with the self, he brings the self into the body or the body up into the self, and that produces an inflation of the body. It is a most curious fact that Nietzsche, an intuitive, should overestimate the body to such an extent. Of course, the body is extraordinarily important but that is an overrating. And it is quite interesting that he calls it a “mighty lord,” for that word is taken literally, one could say, from the texts of the Upanishads and the Tantric philosophy. In the system of chakras, the lord appears when consciousness is developed as far as anahata. There, the two principles of the body are divided, the prana and the spirit, the heart containing the fire of manipura from below, and the lungs the ethereal thin substance from above. And there the understanding of the self appears as the reconciling principle, the mighty lord, called in this chakra the Ishvara; in anahata the Ishvara first becomes visible as the thumbing in the center of the triangle, the lord, “an unknown sage.”

That the self is understood to be an old sage is also an Eastern idea. There is a Chinese text for example, handed down in Japanese philosophical literature, which says, “If thou thinketh thou art alone and canst do what thou pleaseth, thou art forgetting the old sage that dwelleth in thy heart and knoweth of all thou dost.”<sup>4</sup> That is the self that dwells in the anahata chakra, the heart center, and it would of course be the archetype of the old wise man. For to one who has attained only to anahata,<sup>5</sup> the archetype of the wise old man still covers the symbol of the self. It is as if the self were contained in him, as on a certain level the anima contains all the subsequent figures, like the wise old man and the self. Then naturally the anima is “She-that-must-be-obeyed," as Rider Haggard put it quite blindly. And that figure, "She-that-must-be-obeyed," she that represents the wisdom of the past, that understands all the secret arts and is practically immortal, would also contain the sorcerer; and inasmuch as she represents the almost divine principle, she contains the self. All these figures of the unconscious are as if shining through the figure which one actually perceives. Sometimes the anima has an almost hermaphroditic aspect; there is an archetype of the hermaphrodite in between the anima and the wise old man, which simply comes from the fact that the anima contains also a masculine principle. It is as if the anima had an animus—one could put it like that—but the animus is spirit. It is the wise old man. If one is at the stage where it is possible to realize something beyond the anima, then the feminine aspect of the unconscious more or less fades away and instead there is that masculine animus aspect: the wise old man who is now practically divine because one is a step nearer to the apparition of the self.

<sup>4</sup> The Chinese source was Wang Yang-ming, who said, “In every heart there dwells a sejin (sage). Only, we do not believe it firmly enough, and therefore the whole has remained buried” (CW 6, par. 370). Jung is citing an article by Tetsujiro, “Die japanische Philosophie,” in Allgemeine Geschichte der Philosophie, ed. W. Wundt et al. (Berlin and Leipzig, 2nd edn., 1912), p. 85. In turn, Wang’s principal teachings are available in English translation as Instructions for Practical Living and Other Neo-Confucian Writings, tr. Wing-tsit Chan, in Records of Civilization: Sources and Studies, no. 68 (New York and London, 1963).

<sup>5</sup> In Kundalini Yoga, anahata is the heart chakra or lotus, which represents a stage in which one is lifted above the material level. As Jung puts it elsewhere, “But in anahata a new thing comes up, the possibility of lifting himself above the emotional happenings and beholding them. He discovers the purusha (self) in his heart” (“Notes on the Kundalini Seminar,” 19 Oct. 1932, p. 174, unpublished typescript).

You see, the anima can appear in the anahata chakra, because in the heart region, where you become conscious of feeling, you begin to discriminate and to judge. Then you know what is your own and what belongs to somebody else; you not only recognize the difference in yourself, but also the difference between yourself and other people. So you have a chance on that level to realize the anima, and then through the anima one gets the first inkling of the Ishvara. Then the next center, visuddha, which is in the throat, is the Logos center. It says in the Tantric texts that those who attain to that level are given the power of the word, and that is the realm of the wise old man. And in visuddha you have the apparition of the white elephant, the great divine power which is also contained in muladhara, the equivalent of the earth—namely, a sort of wisdom which keeps the earth in suspenso, which balances your reality so that you can be honestly in doubt whether this or that is reality, or merely a veil. Then, of course, the next thing is ajna, where you have a more or less clear vision of the self. But the self only really appears in sahasrara, the thousand petalled lotus, that is the symbol of the self.

It is as if you were coming up from below, like the primordial Pueblo Indians who came up through all those caves, climbing up from the darkest cave to the topmost one where it was still dark, until they at last came out on the surface of the earth. That would be anahata, in the diaphragm region. The word diaphragm comes from the Greek word phren, which means mind. At this level consciousness begins; there is discrimination. But below is only participation, manipura; and the still lower caves correspond to svadhisthana and muladhara. Then above the diaphragm you rise into the kingdom of the air, where the light of the self begins to appear. That is also according to the famous text in the Upanishads about Yajnavalkya, the sage at the king's court. They have a long talk and the king asks him, "By what light do human beings go out, do their work and return?" And the sage answers: "By the light of the sun." Then the king asks, "But when the sun is extinguished, by what light will human beings go out and do their work and return?" "By the light of the moon." So it goes on; when the moon is extinguished, they will go out by the light of the stars, and then by the light of the fire, and when even the fire is extinguished, "by what light can they then do their work and still live?" And the sage replies, "By the light of the self"—the ultimate light.<sup>6</sup>

Now, all this is lacking in Nietzsche, which indicates that he had no particular knowledge of Eastern philosophy; if he had, he could not possibly have identified the self with the body. Of course, one has to link the body to the self, because the distinct body is the distinct appearance of the self in three dimensional space, yet it is of course again a function like the mind. You cannot say that the mind is a function of the self without admitting that the body is also a function of the self. Otherwise of course, you make the mind a function of the body, and then the psychical principle would be a sort of epiphenomenon of the chemistry of the body. We are now sufficiently informed of the hypothetical nature of matter, however, to know that it is practically the same whether we say that the body is a function of a psychical function, or that the psychical function is no function at all but only an epiphenomenon of the body, a secondary phenomenon—the body being the primary phenomenon. But the body is, of course, also a concretization, or a function, of that unknown thing which produces the psyche as well as the body; the difference we make between the psyche and the body is artificial. It is done for the sake of a better understanding. In reality, there is nothing but a living body. That is the fact; and psyche is as much a living body as body is living psyche: it is just the same. Formerly, when one said "body" one assumed that one had expressed something; nowadays we know that this is only a word. Zarathustra continues.

There is more sagacity in thy body than in thy best wisdom. And who then knoweth why the body requireth just thy best wisdom?

Thy Self laugheth at thine ego, and its proud prancings. "What are these prancings and flights of thought unto me?" it saith to itself. "A by-way to my purpose. I am the leading-string of the ego, and the prompter of its notions.

The Self saith unto the ego: "Feel pain!" And thereupon it suffereth, and thinketh how it may put an end thereto—and for that very purpose it is meant to think.

The Self saith unto the ego: "Feel pleasure!" Thereupon it rejoiceth, and thinketh how it may oftentimes rejoice—and for that very purpose it is meant to think.

To the despisers of the body will I speak a word. That they despise is caused by their esteem. What is it that created esteeming and despising and worth and will?

The creating Self created for itself esteeming and despising, it created for itself joy and woe. The creating body created for itself spirit, as a hand to its will.

What he says about the self here is absolutely to the point; the self even creates esteem and contempt for itself. That is an understanding which is typical of the East; it is not Western. But it is typically Nietzsche, and there Nietzsche is very great; he draws from very deep sources. In the East they knew it long ago; so to them the love of God and the hatred of God are essentially the same. And rightly so, for if it only matters that you are concerned with a thing, then it does not matter whether you are concerned by hatred or by love. Therefore, they have the saying that if a man loves God he needs seven incarnations in order to reach him, but when he hates him he only needs three. As a rule we are really far more concerned when we hate than when we love, and in that Eastern saying one recognizes this kind of psychology. So it does not matter to the self whether you love or despise; it is only important that you are concerned.

But here again Nietzsche makes the one-sided identification of the self with the body, and of course that is not satisfactory; he endows the body with a creative faculty or a meaningful faculty, which, even with a tremendous effort of imagination, cannot be put into it. For we know too well that the body is a biological function, having seen how it behaves in experimental biology. It is really not the body which restores damaged tissues; it is a peculiar vital principle which does the job, and it should not be put down to the chemistry of the body. For instance, you cannot explain by the particular chemical constituents of a body how it can produce tissue which is entirely strange to the tissue from which it is taken; yet that is the case. A very interesting experiment has been made on the eye of a salamander, for example. The lens of the eye was extracted, and it was then substituted for by the growth of a new one. But the ectoderm, the embryonic tissue from which the lens was taken, is entirely different from the mesoderm, the tissue of the iris from which the new lens—one could call it the artificial lens—was produced. So one particular tissue of the body can be used by a living principle in the body to produce something of an entirely different tissue. You see, we have learned that the tissues of the body are so differentiated that from the cells of a gland, no other tissue than gland tissue can be made, that it can multiply but will never become muscle tissue, for instance. Yet there in life we find that it is possible, and it cannot be explained by the inherent qualities of the tissue. Therefore, the idea of a sort of neovitalism is introduced, which is still a matter of discussion; one must imagine a kind of living principle which has the faculty of using the tissues of the body as it sees fit, not dependent upon the quality of the particular tissue. Of course, these things were quite unknown in Nietzsche's time, and even if they had been known, he probably would not have read that kind of literature. So he overrates the body. But he finds it necessary to say "creative" body, and in that one sees a concession to a creative principle.

Even in your folly and despising ye each serve your Self, ye despisers of the body. I tell you, your very Self wanteth to die, and turneth away from life.

No longer can your Self do that which it desireth most:—create beyond itself. That is what it desireth most; that is all its fervour.

But it is now too late to do so:—so your Self wisheth to succumb, ye despisers of the body.

What is the meaning of this passage?

Prof. Reichstein: I think the principal meaning is that the goal of life is death, but perhaps some of Nietzsche's personal psychology is intermingled. The sentence before suggests very much the scene with the rope-dancer and the buffoon, and in just this passage there must be a lot of personal psychology.

Prof. Jung: Quite so.

Miss Wolff: I thought it was probably also a historical problem of his epoch. Before this, the body was not really discovered; it was the unknown thing, and therefore it stands on the side of the self as the unknown part of the psyche. So of course the body gets too much weight, because it is a change which must first be assimilated. And then it is also a symbol.

Prof. Jung: Because it has been unknown and therefore contaminated with the unconscious?

Miss Wolff: On the side of the unconscious and therefore it gets the importance.

Prof. Jung: Yes, a sort of symbolic importance. But why should it be death? "So your self desireth to succumb" means death.

Miss Hannah: If the ego won't live as the self wants it to, live its life completely, then the self usually does seem to want to die. I mean, if it cannot get an individual to accept the individual problem or task, it is then as if it wills death—as if by killing, it would get a chance to try again.

Prof. Jung: But can you explain it?

Miss Hannah: I think it is just sick of the way he went, fed up.

Prof. Jung: Would there not be another way?

Mrs. Baumann: Accepting life means also accepting death in the ordinary course of things.

Prof. Jung: Well, it has not quite that meaning here. He says. "For ye can no longer create beyond yourselves." That is something new, it belongs to the epoch. "But it is now too late to do so, so your self wisheth to succumb." You see, he obviously assumes that in another time the self did not desire to perish, but desired to live; it is just now that he "wisheth to succumb."

Mrs. Fierz: Is that not also an Indian aspect—the creation and then the undoing of creation?

Prof. Jung: That is very much what Mrs. Baumann alluded to, but according to my idea it is a bit too academic or philosophical. Nietzsche is far more concerned with the actual time than with the general aspect of the world that lives and dies—after birth, death, and then birth again. That is characteristic of Upanishad philosophy and later on you find it in Nietzsche too, in his idea of the eternal return of things. But here he speaks of a definite time; it is now that the self desires to die.

Miss Wolff: It must be a Christian idea. In Christianity, one is supposed to go beyond one's actual condition in order to reach again the primordial condition where one was like God.

Prof. Jung: Yes, that is the cause. The scornors or despisers of the body would be the late Christian point of view, according to which one must despise the body because it is awkward and always teaches a different truth from that of the spirit; the body must be repressed or controlled, pressed into certain forms, and one must not listen to its teaching. Therefore, the persecution of the body in the church, the glorification of the spirit through the mortification of the body. When a saint was rotting away in his lifetime, stinking with putrefaction, and when the hermits and the fakirs went into the desert and dried up with thirst, it was a sign of the glory of God. And in the New Testament we have that famous passage where Christ speaks of those who have castrated themselves for the kingdom of heaven.<sup>7</sup> He probably alludes to the Galloi, the priests of Astarte, who used to castrate themselves officially; those not very savory symbols were carried at the head of a special parade. The fact of the castrated Galloi was public knowledge all over the near East. Fortunately enough, we know nothing of Christians who have castrated themselves for the kingdom of heaven, but Christ must have been referring to some well-known fact. It would have been a most hellish sin among the Jews, so we cannot assume that he refers to them; and there were no Christians then, but only his disciples. However, we know that later on Origen did castrate himself for the kingdom of heaven, and probably such a case occasionally happened. It was the general Christian idea that the world was vain and would perish like Christ and that the kingdom to come was the desirable thing. We only live for a short time here and must prepare for the eternal mansions.

That the body should have no meaning is, of course, a contradiction of the Semitic temperament which believes in the glorification of the world; it is a prophetic impulse to create, not a kingdom of heaven, but a kingdom on earth where peace and justice reign. The Jew has the temperament of the reformer who really wants to produce something in this world; when the Semites spoke of a kingdom of perfection, they meant it to be here, the glory of this earth, and of course that excludes the mutilation of the body. Nothing must be mutilated. The whole world must come to a state where the lepers will be healed and the lion will lie down with the lamb; that is all prophesied in Isaiah, a state of paradise. As the Cabalists, for instance, have the idea that after the sin of the first parents, God removed paradise into the future, which means that paradise is to come; it is to be produced upon this earth. But Christ's words are in flagrant contradiction with this teaching. His kingdom is not of this earth. It is a spiritual, transcendental kingdom in the future, and he says it is nowhere else than within ourselves; the emphasis is on the spiritual side. The body will be curtailed. That continued to be the case throughout the Middle Ages, but finally the body has asserted itself. The first attempt was the Renaissance, where it appeared quite visibly; one sees it in the art of those centuries. Look at the so-called primitives—the primitives in paint—with those peculiar heads and miserable mutilated bodies, starved and diseased, leprous. Then one century later the flesh was blossoming in a marvelous way, in the cinquecento, the life of the earth was glorified. Of course, it led right away into the great Reformation. Because the body had made that attempt to break through, the severe moral restrictions in early Protestantism followed. So the experiment proved pretty doubtful, but slowly it grew again, and in materialism we have the full triumph of matter.

Nietzsche in that respect is a sort of materialistic prophet, but he saves some spiritual substance. It is not exactly the body he seeks but the Superman, the man who is even beyond the actual body, a new creation that is not this coarse body, a new being in whom, perhaps, the body will be completely subject to the will. You see, that is again a sort of spiritual principle. He is a prophet of the will, even a will beyond oneself, and that is a kind of transcendentalism; he does not get away from it altogether. But here it is quite clear that he means by the scorn-ers of the body those that despise the principle of the body and believe in the principle of the spirit exclusively; and he says that the self of those people desires to die. The reason is that when we deny an important part of ourselves the right to existence, when something is continuously, for many years, repressed and macerated, then that thing always takes its revenge in the form of a suicidal wish. For, every form of split in ourselves after a while becomes personified.

For instance, if you find in a certain respect you are stupid, you hate it and try to avoid all those occasions where the stupidity could come to the foreground, because you know you will make a stupid ass of yourself. And if it appears in spite of yourself, you say, "Excuse me, there my stupid ass came out again. I am an ass in a certain respect and it has gotten the better of me." That is personification. Then you have a stable in which you keep your ass, but you live upstairs and are a respectable gentleman. We have done that with the body; we put it into the stable, feeding it very poorly—at least we say so. But by mistake, in a marvelous way, it has been fed time and again. If anybody catches you in the act, when you are down in the stable with fodder for the ass, you say, "I beg your pardon. I have such a weakness. I am sorry and I will repent." And then you go to church and fast and repent that you have fed the ass. Now, that of course is not proper; it is not very helpful to the mental and physical development of the ass. But the lower self is happily enough a greedy animal which you cannot always hinder from feeding; if it is not done legitimately, then illegitimately. So mankind has helped himself through a great deal of unconsciousness. Perhaps you left the stable door open and out walked the ass in the night and ate the cabbages in your neighbor's garden, and then it was discovered and you had to pay the damage. Or it was not discovered and you were glad to find the ass very full.

But we soon made the mistake of developing consciousness to such an extent that we began to have a psychological criterion. We developed insight, and then we could not deny that we had left the stable door open and had not fastened the ass securely; we had to say it was our ass that had eaten the neighbor's cabbages. So we cannot say it is no problem, and that we can do entirely without. But there are still plenty of fatherly men—when they are parsons they have their little girls whom they are confirming, and they say afterwards, by the marvelous grace of God the ass has eaten. Ten thousand things have happened which apparently never happened; they are blissfully unconscious about what has been done for the ass. The more we pay attention to our psyche, however, the more we are aware of the things that happen, and we know unfortunately for what purpose they were done. So the body becomes a moral problem with us. What about the ass in the stable? It is no real way to leave the stable door open. That cannot work in the future; we must buy a meadow where we can feed the ass in a legitimate way. It must be acknowledged that there is such a thing. For if we don't acknowledge it, then with an increasing amount of morality, of consciousness, we find very efficient means of locking the stable door, and then the ass dies, naturally. If we don't let him live, he prefers to die. And then we develop a suicidal wish.

Of course, with our power to keep things locked up and concealed we don't realize that it is a suicidal wish. It may begin with an upset of the stomach, or continuous constipation, or you are terribly tired, or cannot walk. Probably it is already a lack of will to live, the beginning of the suicidal wish; most of the neuroses have that character. In agoraphobia, you don't dare to cross the street, or you may be afraid of a big crowd of people, or afraid of being fenced in: that is all the suicidal tendency. It means that your will to live only goes so far. It does not risk itself in crowds, in the open spaces of life. You are already partially lame and you seek a situation in which you can fall down, a threshold over which you can stumble, or a car that will run over you; people have little accidents which are simply preparatory for a great catastrophe, where they get into an avalanche or something of the sort. And nobody has ever known, because we can quite easily hide things from our own consciousness and from the consciousness of other people.

Now, Nietzsche explains that it is the self, really, that doesn't want to live, because one thus deprives the self of its own experiment. Let us assume for the sake of argument that there is such a thing as the self, that living potentiality which accounts for the existence of our spirit as well as our body—both being essentially the same. Sure enough, our ego-will is not identical with the self-will; our self-will does not want what the ego wants. Why has the self created the body? I don't know why we are not wind; we might be forms made of air and beyond sex or appetites or digestion and such nuisances, but it is a fact that we have bodies which have been created by the self, so we must assume that the self really means us to live in the body, to live that experiment, live our lives. And the ego should not choose whether we are to live this or that; we must have a different criterion. I don't doubt that certain things are meant not to be lived, but we must find out what they are. Contradictory taboos and laws are not given by the ego, nor by an assembly of egos, nor by the church or the whole state; those are only police regulations—including our morality, which is also a police regulation. But there is one law which is much more severe and much more accurate than any other, and that is the law of the self.

So you must inquire what experiment the self wants to make. Everything that disturbs that experiment must be avoided and everything that helps must be lived, and you will see the consequences on the spot. If you do something which disturbs the experiment you will be punished, much more severely than in a police court. And if you do something which rather serves your experiment, you will have the blessing of heaven and the angels will come to dance with you. You are helped along. You have ungodly health, and you develop powers which you have not had before because you have obeyed, not the ego, but that will of the self. Mind you, it is not the ego that wants to make that experiment. Often the ego says, "For God's sake I only hope that this thing is not coming to me!" If you have a fundamental dread somewhere, you can be sure just that is the experiment of the self. You see, the body is meant to live; it has to be served, and your self has a very particular purpose with it, presumably. Of course, nobody can say what the individual experiment is; for one it is this and for another that, and it is for nobody alike. It is an entirely individual question. Inasmuch as we are individuals our experiment is individual, and the point of life is that this particular individual should fulfill itself. For it makes no point in life to create a crowd of beings who try not to be themselves. It is just as if a potter had created a hundred vessels which didn't want to be vessels and always tried to be something else. But why have you been created a vessel? Obviously you must be a vessel since you are created as a vessel, and every vessel must be what it is and function like a vessel.

Now, if the experiment is denied to the self, the self is fed up after a while and says, "Well, the experiment is not worthwhile, I prefer to disappear." As its purpose has been thwarted or starved, so you will be starved of life; your libido just steals away and leaves you high and dry, and you remain like that young dreamer I am dealing with in my Polytechnikum lecture;<sup>8</sup> you are left as a mere wall decoration, two dimensional, flat, casting no shadow. Then you are a mere husk of yourself; the real life has gone because the experiment has been denied to the self. And then it is just as Nietzsche says, the self wants to perish—no use to continue that experiment. That is one thought in this passage, but there is also the thought alluded to by Mrs. Baumann, Mrs. Fierz, and Professor Reichstein, namely, that it belongs to the nature of life, to the nature of the experiment, that it is carried through into death. Of course, from a certain point of view that is perfect nonsense. One can ask, what is the use of an experiment which is made for the purpose of destroying itself? But the nonsense is in the way in which we look at it. It is obvious that an experiment is meant to come to an end; otherwise, it is no experiment, but a static condition. An experiment only makes sense when there is an end in sight. You see, an experiment does not make itself, but is made; the self, that potentiality, makes the experiment, and the potentiality does not come to the end by having made it. According to Eastern philosophy, the experiment can be repeated innumerable times—all the more the more it has failed. But the ambition of the East is to reach such a condition that the experiment does not need a repetition—that it is final, all questions answered.

Well, there is something in favor of the idea that there is a vital potentiality which makes one experiment after another; and inasmuch as such a potentiality exists to make the experiment, it must see that it comes to an end. Looked at from that standpoint, it does not seem to be a mere running down, a mere collapse; it is really a meaningful carrying through of an experiment, and the end yields the result. The end is the thing you are looking for. You undergo the whole thing in order to reach that conclusion. The experiment is not made in order to let something run down. It is a question and you look for an answer. That you look for the end and do not resist the end, that you live with the certainty of the end, is obviously the way life wants to be lived. Then it is properly lived, because you are accepting the conclusion at the end of the experiment; and that is right, it is healthy. If you live with continuous resistances against what might come to you, of course you are simply resisting the execution of your own experiment. So the idea that death is a goal, that it is the inevitable conclusion of your experiment, also comes in here. And it fits in with Nietzsche's profound optimism that you must say "Yes" to the eternal return of things. He puts it that way: he says you must have the courage to repeat; you must love life to such an extent that you can even say, "Once more!"

To succumb—so wisheth your Self; and therefore have ye become despisers of the body. For ye can no longer create beyond yourselves.

And therefore are ye now angry with life and with the earth. And unconscious envy is in the sidelong look of your contempt.

Here a bit of the unconscious comes in. You see Nietzsche au fond already knew of the unconscious; he was aware of the shadow, and that is of course the deepest reason for what he is.

Mrs. Zimno: I want to know how the self can possibly perish; I should think it would be something between the ego and the self.

Prof. Jung: Oh, it is not meant that the self would perish. That is seen from consciousness. But if the self cannot carry through the experiment, then it kills the body.

Mrs. Zimno: I thought if one was in contact with the self, that was the creative side.

Prof. Jung: Ah yes, you see the mistake he makes is that he identifies the self with the body. And here the self wants to destroy the body. That is the tragedy of the rope-dancer and the buffoon at the beginning of Zarathustra; the rope-dancer, Nietzsche the man, is overrun, cast away: he is no good. That Nietzsche identifies the self with the body is of course illogical, for you then come necessarily to the conclusion that if the body died, therefore the self wants to die. That is his conclusion. But if you take the self in the way I propose, it is of course somewhat different. I don't identify the self with the body. Then the body is just one of the experiments in the visibility of the self,<sup>9</sup> and then you can say, "If that thing won't function, it will be cast away; it is no good.” You can see how these things really happen in human life. A man who does not obey when he hears the message—and it also can be a woman, you know—always reminds me of what a wild elephant once did. On banana plantations they have little houses, erected on poles against ants and rats and other vermin, where they store their bananas. And in such a little storehouse an old negro woman was asleep on top of the bananas, when a wild elephant broke into the plantation. Of course, he smelt the ripe bananas in the hut, so he tore open the roof and pushed his trunk in and he simply took that old woman and threw her away, and then ate the whole bunch of bananas inside. She fell shrieking into the branches of a tree but was not killed. That is what life does. Life wants to get at its result and if you don’t chime in, then you are cast out like nothing at all, as if you never had been. And then the experiment is made again.

<sup>9</sup> For Jung the self is represented as both spirit and body. The alchemist, in creating the philosopher's stone, is making a visible, palpable form of the self. See CW 14, par. 649.

LECTURE VI

27 February 1935

Prof. Jung:

We have a series of questions here, aroused apparently by our discussion about the concept of the self last week. Sure enough, this idea of the self is most mysterious. It is a symbolic concept: one cannot say what it is; one can indicate what one understands by the concept but what it is in itself one can never say. It covers a fact of which there is only a partial awareness and which is only partially thinkable. The partial awareness of the self is consciousness; the ego consciousness is that part of the self which is elucidated and which is immediately accessible to our reasoning and judgment. But the unconscious is merely noumenal and we have no immediate access to it. It is as indirectly accessible as, for instance, matter, or nature as a whole. We need microscopes and most complicated physical and chemical apparatuses in order to disclose the nature of things, in order to penetrate the secret of the transcendent object. Our sureness about material and physical phenomena is a mere illusion; we touch the surface of things but we know nothing about the inside. Naturally, science has discovered a number of methods that allow us to penetrate the secret to a certain extent; but the ultimate object is transcendent. It is beyond our grasp, simply because the nature by which we grasp, by which we attempt to understand consciousness or the psyche, is different from the object. Now, that is a hypothesis. Perhaps it is not so. But if the transcendent object were equal to the psyche, then of course we would have an absolute understanding though we would never know it. And why would we never know it?

Mrs. Baumann: Because we would be identical with it.

Prof. Jung: Of course. So we never could say whether the transcendent object really consisted of psyche or not. Since we know that we are our understanding, since the cognitional process is psyche and what we find is psyche, we naturally are unable to grasp it. We simply project; we assume that what we perceive is psyche, yet that is no proof that it is so in reality. The material object might in itself be something different from what we call “psyche”; since we never get out of the psyche there is no chance that we ever will get any security in our judgment about the transcendental object. No wonder, therefore, that the discussion of the concept of the self, which covers partly our consciousness and partly what is beyond our consciousness, arouses many questions. Now, here is a question by Mrs. Strong, “In the discussion of last time when you pointed out the superiority of the self-will to the Ego-will, you seemed to assign a negative value to the ego-consciousness in its relation to the totality of the individual. But would it be true that at times the Ego makes a very positive contribution to the creating self—even acting as a check or conditioning factor on the form of the creation?”

I am sorry if I gave you the impression that I underrated consciousness or that I made any attempt to emphasize its inferiority; I thought I had indicated that consciousness is, on the contrary, absolutely indispensable to the self because it is the organ of awareness of the self. The question shows how careful one should be in discussing such very intricate philosophical matters. When I said the ego consciousness was a very narrow area in comparison with the great indefinite area of the unconscious, that did not mean that I belittled its value or importance. The ego consciousness is a smaller circle contained in a bigger one, but that is not an undervaluation or depreciation of consciousness, for that very small circle may be of an extreme importance, even of sublime importance, in comparison with the vast expanse of the unconscious psyche. If the unconscious psyche is deprived of acute consciousness, that would only be obtainable in what we call ego consciousness. You see, my idea is that whatever we can make out about the unconscious—whether it is personal or impersonal or super-personal—it is all the same in that it seems to be very weak. If there is any consciousness at all, it is blurred and dim. That would explain why nature felt the need of the acute consciousness; it was a tremendous achievement of nature to have produced it. If we want to pat nature on the back for anything, it would be for producing consciousness. It was awfully nice of nature, really an achievement!

For only since the dawn of consciousness has there been a world; before, there was nothing, because nobody knew that there was something. We can assume that God knew of creation, but that is a mere assumption. Only since we have attained consciousness are we sure that there is a world—at least I know, and every one of you knows, that there is a world. Since that moment, a world exists, because it has known that it existed. You see, if the world can be criticized from a philosophical point of view, if there is a need in man to look at the total phenomenon of the world, then he must make such speculations. He will begin to philosophize, and he will inevitably ask the question, "Why should there be consciousness?" And he must come to the conclusion that nobody would have had the need of producing consciousness if he had not felt pretty blurred and obscured. Nobody would turn on a light in this room now because it is daylight; only if it were dark would one produce an illumination. It is like old Diogenes who went with a lantern over the marketplace in Athens in the daytime; people were astonished, but he had made that light in the daytime in order to seek men, because there were no men in Athens.<sup>1</sup> So if nature produces consciousness, we must assume that it was on account of the need for light, and that it was most probably quite dark before.

That can be put a bit nearer to common sense by picturing the primitive man as being in rather a quandary over that general darkness. They stumbled very often and felt the need to kindle a fire in the night. They needed to have a certain amount of consciousness, because they found out that the people who had it were better off than those who had none. So it became more or less fashionable and the fashion increased till now we have the general fashion of wearing consciousness: there is a general need of consciousness because it is too dark without. And so the creator was in need of light or acute awareness and therefore made a being who has consciousness and is aware of three-dimensional things which also have the quality of time. Now, if that is the case, if the only light of the world which we know of is our awareness of the world, then we can say human consciousness is metaphysically of an enormous importance. It is the only seeing eye of the deity. Therefore, in every Catholic church and even in Protestant churches, the deity is represented as the radiating eye in the center of a triangle, the mirroring image of human consciousness. By that we declare God as an eye, and that our consciousness is that eye; in other words, God has made man so that he might see in the darkness.

I don't want to go into metaphysical speculations—I only do so because they belong to our psychology; it is a psychological fact that man speculates in this way, that our consciousness functions in this way. In every individual it is the same; we have a large indefinite unconsciousness and only a part of it is definite; whether it is central, we don't know; presumably not. Perhaps it has the same relation to the center as our earth has to the sun. The center of our solar system is the sun, and our center, our world, is revolving round the sun; we are the children of the earth, and so our consciousness is eccentric relative to the center, as the earth is eccentric relative to the sun. That is possible, our consciousness may also be like a planet revolving round a central invisible sun, namely, round the presumable center of the unconscious, which is called the self because that is the center of the unconscious and the conscious.

<sup>1</sup> The legend usually has it that Diogenes was looking for an honest man, but Jung follows Diogenes Laertius: "He lit a lamp in broad daylight and said as he went about, 'I am looking for a man.' " Lives of the Philosophers, vol. II, tr. R. D. Hicks (The Loeb Classical Library), p. 41.

So the contribution of the ego consciousness is absolutely unique, yet it is of course restricted; under certain aspects the ego is not at all powerful. Only as far as the affairs of three-dimensional space go, and in as far as time is concerned, is the ego on top of things. But wherever anything reaches beyond such limited conditions as space and time, the collective unconscious is probably of much greater importance. And there the self also is of a greater importance. It is characteristic that the more you are identical with consciousness, the more you try to neglect the self, the more you resist it, the more you feel it even as a hostile power—while in reality it is the center of your very life. You see, detached consciousness—detached in a wrong way I mean, when you identify with your consciousness—always tries to turn on a sort of strong electric light and shut out the light of the sun. But only a fool would shut out the light of the sun, because it would be most unhealthy to live by an electric power, by a compensatory artificial sun.

Mrs. Baumann: You said last time that man should make an experiment of life. I see a certain contradiction in the idea of the “provisional life.”

Prof. Jung: Of course, there is a very strong contradiction. First, we must understand what I designate as provisional life. I mean by that, that one lives under a certain assumption. The typical case is the filis à papa, the young man whose father has the necessary amount of capital so the boy lives under a sort of silent assumption that father will pay for everything. He does not need to work or be responsible because he has the necessary bank account. So he can live—God knows what—all sorts of things which he never would dream of living if he knew that he had to pay for the whole thing out of his own pocket. He lives in a sort of dream. Now of course, such a young man is not making the experiment of his life, but the experiment of a life, any life, a sort of imagination. He imagines that he is a hell of a fellow. He speculates on the Exchange and of course falls down, but he can easily do it because he always lives on his father's money. Or he might imagine that he is a great sportsman or an artist, and again he wastes years and money on an assumption. So he never arrives really at himself; he never begins to live as if he had no money. Now, take something away from him, or make him conscious of the fact that money prevents him from living his own life, and instantly he will be forced into his own life, into what he would do if he had to depend upon himself alone. Then he would choose the type of life which you might call his own experiment. But that is not yet the experiment of life; it is only his experiment of life as far as his consciousness reaches. You know, our consciousness, being a restricted affair, suffers from all sorts of weaknesses, illusions, and such things, so we can really imagine that something is our task, or that a certain way is ours, when in reality it is not. It may be a sort of error due to inheritance or milieu for instance. Then in the course of life you have to find out whether the way you have chosen is backed up by the unconscious or not. For very often you have the experience that even if you live according to your best conviction, you still find yourself checked or interfered with by your unconscious. Then you know that your line is not exactly the line of the self, and you have to correct it so that your way fits in with the way of the self. This falling in line with the self is such an important psychological experience that it has a most significant name. What would that be?

Mrs. Zinno: Tao.

Mr. Baumann: Could we not call it individuation?

Prof. Jung: Yes, they are synonymous. Now we will go on to Miss Hannah's question. "Is the death of the body always willed by the self? Or can it occur from a cause outside the solar system (so to speak) of the self and the body? For instance, you have often said the 'ice projectile' can kill." (That is the icicle shot out by the medicine man.) "Would you say it would only be effective where the self already willed the destruction of that body, or could the self's own purpose be defeated by an outside cause?"

That is a question which is well out of my reach. I am not the self. I am not initiated into the secrets of the divine will, you know. That question is too metaphysical to be answered. But, of course, we have certain significant experiences; one often gets the impression, for instance, that people die at the right time, that it was logical that they should die then: they were at the end of their rope. Or one can say that their self agreed that it was for many reasons the moment. An important reason may be that the body is no longer fit to stand a great change, and then the individual is just lifted out of his body as the old negro woman was lifted off the heap of bananas. Then it makes no sense to live on, because one is really overdue; the time has changed, conditions have changed and one's work, or one's functional importance, has become superfluous. Such people easily die. It seems as if circumstances, often in a miraculous way, arranged themselves to place a trap for them. But that is only a matter for conjecture; it is hypothetical, a speculation. These things are just beyond our knowledge. You can sometimes see in people's horoscopes that a certain negative position of their stars is very conspicuous, and makes it probable that at such a moment they would die; or perhaps a dream from long ago fulfils itself by death. Such things hint at a secret attempt by the self to finish man when he is no good any longer for the purpose of the self. But I cannot give you any definite answer.

Miss Wolff: Was not the question rather whether there were causes extraneous to the self that could cause death? Could you not take for example certain cases of suicide or accident which an outsider would say might have been avoided if that person had known more—if he had not had a depression or if he had listened to his dreams? Could one not say that death occurs because that person is associated with the ego side? An immediate cause of death would look to me as coming from the ego complex.

Prof. Jung: Well, we could also ask the question, how is the ego complex able to kill a person? It is not strong enough; it has not those sources of power which the self possesses. And concerning extra-mundane or extra-solar causes of death, how do you know about their nature? It is merely speculation. I admit that there are cases where the attitude of the ego is: Now if that is going to continue, something awful will happen! But that is where the self finally gets sick of that fool, the ego—the case of the old negro woman sitting upon the bananas.

Miss Kaufmann: There is a beautiful book dealing with this, The Bridge of San Luis Rey.<sup>2</sup>

Prof. Jung: Yes, when the bridge fell, the people on it were all at the end of their rope; that was very convincing from a psychological point of view. Now we have here this mystical diagram made by Mrs. Baynes. Will you be kind enough to explain it?

E = Ego = cent of partial psyche.
 S = Self or cent of total psyche.
 C = Consciousness Arch = Archetypes.

 o Phenomenal world.

Mrs. Baynes: I was just trying to sum up in diagrammatic form what I thought you meant about the self. And the question I wanted to ask is, "Would it be correct to say the self is composed of two factors, the psychological factor that is the combination of consciousness and the archetypes, and a metaphysical factor which I have written down there as Brahman?" Of course, I could not show in my diagram that Brahman comes into the whole business. Would that be correct?

Prof. Jung: Well, that belongs to this whole discussion about the concept of the self. It is a very difficult problem; probably I have to repeat the whole story. You know, the self is a borderline concept, which I call a symbol because it expresses something which we cannot express otherwise, because we simply don't understand it. The idea of the self is really unknown ground. The psychological definition is that the self is the totality of consciousness and unconsciousness, and that sounds pretty definite: we seem to know what consciousness is and to have a fairly clear idea about the unconscious. But to say we know the unconscious is going much too far; we only know of it. The unconscious has an extension that can reach anywhere; we have absolutely no means of establishing a definite frontier. As we cannot say where the world ends, so we cannot say where the unconscious ends, or whether it ends anywhere. A concept that contains a definite factor like consciousness and an indefinite factor like unconsciousness is not scientific; moreover, it is metaphysical in its nature per definitionem: it overreaches itself. Therefore, I call it a symbol.

A symbol to me is not a sign for something of which I know, like the winged wheel on the cap of a railway employee, or the Freudian symbols, or the Freemason's so-called symbolism—those are simply signs for something we know very well. A symbol is an expression for a thing of which I only know that it does exist. I don't know it.<sup>3</sup> So the self is a living symbol because it designates something which we know exists; we know there is a totality of consciousness and unconsciousness because we are the living examples of it. The self expresses our acknowledgment of a thing that is actually in existence, but of which we don't know enough. It overreaches us, it is bigger than we are. Therefore, I call it the concept of the self; it is the best expression I know. Formerly, there have been other expressions. The self has been expressed by the figure of Christ, for instance; in medieval philosophy it was the lapis philosophorum, or it was the womb, or the gold, or the Tinctura magna, the quinta essentia. And the Grail was a symbol of the self, and the cross. On more primitive stages the king was the symbol of the self, because he was always of divine nature at the same time. Or certain gods. Since the beginning of history, the self has nearly always been represented by the god-man. Then of course, on lower primitive levels it is a fetish, an object that is inhabited by the divine breath, or my mana, or by extraordinary magic effect.

This concept is, as I say, an acknowledgment of the experience of a being that is bigger than we are; we cannot comprehend it. In German that would be called ein Erlebnis, an experience. Such an experience is not scientific because it is not intellectual; it is an utterly irrational fact. Psychology is a peculiar science in that the function of cognition is there identical with the object of cognition, for the object of cognition is the psyche, and cognition is a part of the psyche. So one uses the same system to recognize the system. In any other science, you are in a much more favorable position, because one had the limitation of the object. In mineralogy, for example, the minerals are the object of cognition, because one defines them as being different. If one goes further, if one gets into the interior of the atom, then one falls into doubts, for then there is no difference between the object and the psyche. But mineralogy does not need to go into the detail of the psyche; it is sufficient to know about the uses and application of minerals. The subject matter of mineralogy is different from the psyche and therefore one doesn't need to worry: one can use one's mind in order to understand minerals, which are quite different. But how would it be if one had to use minerals in order to understand minerals? Then the method of cognition would be the object of cognition at the same time, and one cannot see how that would be possible. Therefore, people have asked, "Is it really possible that there is such a thing as psychology?"—and that is really a legitimate question.

Now, by a certain limitation, just as by not going into the question of the interior of the atom mineralogy is possible, so in psychology, provided I look at certain psychological processes under a certain aspect, I can then pass a judgment—I can really say something about the psyche or physical processes. But I must mention my premises, the standpoint from which I am talking. Inasmuch as I don't go in for the inner structure of the atom I can deal with mineralogy, and inasmuch as I don't enter upon the being of the psyche I can make sense of psychology. But if I enter upon the actual being of the psyche, I must acknowledge the psyche is an irrational experience. So in such subtle concepts as the self you have both sides; on the one side it is a psychological concept which you can define perfectly neatly, and even use in a scientific way; but on the other side, you must acknowledge the irrational fact of the psyche which is an experience, a state of being. It is like trying to make a science of elephants, say. You can write a chapter in zoology about elephants, but to be actually under the feet of an elephant is quite different. In the one case you are sitting in your study writing, and in the other you are in a damned unfortunate situation. That is so with the self. You talk about it in a perfectly friendly, scholarly way. Nobody is hurt. It is all nice and warm and afterwards you are going to eat your dinner. But if it should be an experience, well, you are just under the elephant. Not always though.

So these things have to be considered in making such a scheme as this one of Mrs. Baynes. And I have another diagram here by Mrs. Baumann which also belongs to the nature of the self as an experience. We need such speculation and formulas as soon as we discuss the concept of the self. Inasmuch as the self is a scientific concept, of course circles and Brahman and such things are not needed; for the scientific concept of the self comes to an end with the statement that it is the sum total of consciousness and unconsciousness, and then everybody shakes hands and goes home and sleeps. And that is right, that is as it should be. But if anybody asks, "How far does the unconscious reach? What is the unconscious?"—then you are in pitch, you are stuck, and then you must confess that here the elephants begin, and they are real.

Miss Kaufmann: I think there is the same difficulty with philosophy.

Prof. Jung: Yes, it is the eternal trouble with philosophy that the world is man's experience, and then they go and talk about it. It is much safer to talk and therefore they prefer it. Well now, as soon as you deal with the self as an experience, the whole thing changes and wild things come up, because you are then confronted with mountains of obscurity; it is just like being actually in the jungle in the midst of an excited herd of elephants. So you try all sorts of things to conjure up the danger and to express what you see. Since the earliest times—I am thinking of old Pythagoras, for instance—those people who took the existence of the world and the psyche to heart, made such diagrams: circles and squares and triangles. They invented the queerest ciphers in order to express that peculiar experience. And always again, consciousness overlapped and would not accept it, said it was all bunk, nonsense, and made up a conscious philosophy or conscious science which was just talk and useful rules-of-thumb. For instance, philosophy inasmuch as it is talk is a useful rule-of-thumb: how to become a professor. And science or scientific investigation is a way to invent or discover useful new rules-of-thumb for practical purposes, either how to become a professor or how to become practical and helpful to people, as in medicine, say. There are all sorts of applications for either objective or subjective rules-of-thumb; you can even divide learned people according to this scheme. On the one side are the subjective ones whose rule-of-thumb is how to become famous, how to say something which makes people sit up and cock their ears and exclaim, "How wonderful!"—and on the other side are those who really produce something of value. But that is all science, a world of words, a two-dimensional world. Beyond that is a world where you actually experience that the world exists, that you are the psyche—the psyche becomes your existence.

Now, in making such a chart you denote the self as an experience and that brings in a lot of things which are exceedingly questionable; you feel that they exist, but you cannot grasp them. So no end of such things will be produced. Then science becomes the desperate attempt of man to designate the root of things, the things which are not just in the head, but forces intérieures perhaps from below the earth. There is a Latin text which says these roots are below the earth, meaning that they are in the unconscious. So when you follow up the life of the living self, it leads you into an experience which is below and above, or before and beyond, our day. I am sorry if this is too damned obscure, but we all get obscure as soon as we talk of the experience of life, because anything that is, is always beyond; if it were not, we would be gods. Life is beyond, our world is beyond, our whole being is beyond-ourselves. Experience it and you begin to make these desperate attempts. (I call them desperate attempts, and the club that is preoccupied with such things is a club of desperados.) You necessarily get desperate when you touch upon the thing that is greater than yourself. Mrs. Baynes' system as far as I get it, is correct, I should say this is a fair.

Mrs. Baynes: A fairly desperate attempt!

Prof. Jung: But I would not give the ego that central position. I would change those two points around, I would call this central point the self, an indivisible point, and I would put the ego on the outer circle, as a sort of planet revolving round the self, in order to remain in tune with the harmony of the spheres which you begin to hear as soon as you get below the water. If you cock your ears you will hear it; and then you will put the self in the center, and the ego would be on the larger circle. You see, the ego in the three-dimensional sphere necessarily seems greater than the self, because the self is not three-dimensional. The concept of the self implies a space-denying existence; the four-dimensional is the denial of the three-dimensional, so to speak of four-dimensional space is complete nonsense. It is a denial of space. Therefore, the self is best indicated by the bindu creative point, and the ego would extend outward into three-dimensional space; so you can make it bigger, as the earth to us seems to be bigger than the sun though in reality the sun is much bigger. The things which are smallest in the self or for the self are the biggest in space, and you can safely conclude that all the big mighty things in the outside world are just nothing in comparison with the self. So the more you are looking upon the self, the less the big outside things matter, and that is what they always hate. That is the reason those desperados who look into such experience always hide themselves away, make secret brotherhoods. They go into the woods and caves—not into the churches but into secret places below the churches—expressing by that that they can turn their backs on the big things. And as the big collective things mind it, time and again they accuse the secret societies of all sorts of things, like the hue and cry against the Freemasons. In Italy they really killed a number of them; all the leaders of the Italian Freemasons are assumed to be arch-devils and banished to a certain island, because they do not believe in the collective path, the big things. Of course, the visible powers of the earth become nil if you approach the center. So it is quite a dangerous enterprise, of which one can only warn people who approach this time-and space-annihilating something. The scientific concept is perfectly safe, but take it as an experience and it is unsafe.

Well then, with the self in the center absolutely unextended, and the ego revolving around it, the objective world in which the ego moves would be limitless extension, just space. Now Mrs. Baynes had indicated her Brahman by this vertical line, which would be the side elevation: it would really be at right angles to the plane. That would be a fourth dimension which is always a vertical upon space. Of course one cannot imagine such a thing, because space simply does not suffer a vertical upon itself, but that would be the mathematical definition as the third dimension is a vertical upon a plane. A vertical upon space is space-denying at the same time, because space only has three dimensions; if there were a fourth dimension there would be no space. There would be instead something absolutely unthinkable, unimaginable. Therefore, by putting that Brahman there you deny space, and Brahman is just that, a potentiality of a world—a world in itself perhaps—but a world of unknown quality, bearing upon our world like an indivisible and therefore an invisible point. It is an absolute potential. So that Hindu metaphysical concept of Brahman which symbolizes the totality of existence, contains in itself that quality which denies existence; therefore, Brahman is the eternal non-existent existence. To indicate it by a point is practical because it has absolutely no extension, and we cannot conceive of a thing that has no extension because it is not in space.

Mrs. Baumann: Professor Hauer represents it as making one world by this diagram: other would be point of the self

Prof. Jung: Yes, does not convey It is not Hindu diagram obviously

One circle is the visible world and the the invisible archetypal world, and the is in the center where the lines cross.

one also can show it like that. But that the idea of the annihilation of existence. philosophy to which Mrs. Baynes' di- relates, where it is indispensable to think of existence as being non-existent. And as one of the peculiar qualities of the self is that it is existent non-existent, you can call it a merely virtual center. In a way, it is as if it did not exist; in another way, it is as if it were the only existence. Of course, one could say it was perfectly futile to make such speculations. Yes, from the horizontal point of view, the world of words; there it is absolutely morbid and unsound. But if you experience the psyche, you cannot help speculating about it; you are simply forced to do so in order to defend yourself against the experiences that crowd in. Since you are confronted with them, you have to invent certain forms to try to express them. For instance, if you go into a man's bedroom and find that he has put the legs of his bed into washbasins full of oil, you think he is mad; but if you see that in the Bush, you know it is an excellent idea because he can then sleep. That is the only way to protect himself against the ants, which would otherwise eat him and his bed too. If you live in a country where there are no such things as mosquitos or migrating ants or termites, you don't need any particular methods of protection—you don't need an adaptation system—but if you happen to live in central Africa, it is a different story. And so it is with the question of the self. As long as you find the world livable, the world of newspapers and concerts and books, the world of lectures, drawing rooms, how-do-you-do, five o'clock teas, and so on, to talk of the self is perfectly ridiculous, utterly futile. But if you take the self as an experience, then these efforts become suddenly exceedingly important and vital, and if you don't succeed in making the right kind of cipher, you may pass a sleepless night, or your stomach will be upset; while if you happen to hit the right cipher, you are relieved, you can digest and are friendly to everybody, and the world and life seem to be worthwhile again—all of which is of course quite ridiculous looked at from the horizontal. Now here is another living attempt. Will you be kind enough to explain how you came to this, Mrs. Baumann?

Mrs. Baumann: It is sort of mixed up with the star map. At the right is Aquarius; and on the left the taigitu design stands for the Fishes because it is also the age of opposites; and Pegasus is above as the ruling principle of our time, the age of transition.

Mrs. Baynes: Above what?

Mrs. Baumann: The swastika which is the whirlpool of disorientation of the present moment between the two ages. But Prof. Jung ought to explain it.

Prof. Jung: This is not my attempt. I have made no swastika in the sun! But the idea here apparently has to do with the transition of the Platonic year; according to old astrological philosophy the precession of the equinoxes is now preceding into the sign of Aquarius, coming from the sign of the Fishes. Now, if you look at the sign of Aquarius on the star map, you find above it a constellation which is almost a square called Pegasus. The precession is really oblique, it comes down out of the horizontal second Fish and then Pegasus is just above. Could you explain to us how you connect this idea of the Platonic time with our problem in question, the self?

Mrs. Baumann: The self, of course, underlies it all. But I was thinking first of Nietzsche's relation to the time, that he was influenced by the time in writing Zarathustra. Also it has to do with our present time, and with what is happening in Germany.

Prof. Jung: But more closely in connection with the self. Do you mean Pegasus would be the idea of the self?

Mrs. Baumann: I would say it had to do with the development of man. But may I first explain the diagram as a map of time? As Pegasus is the ruling principle above, it seemed to me to also have something to do with the throat center, inspired speech and enthusiasm. Then the earth down below is the opposite creative thing; also the earth is the material which the sculptor molds, and there is another constellation down below the Fishes and the first part of Aquarius called the "Sculptor." As Aquarius is in the future (on the right), I call that the age of increased consciousness; and the past, the Fishes (on the left), is the age of relative unconsciousness. In the center is the golden swastika turning to the right. That is the constructive aspect. Then if you turn it the other way, man is moving backward and the swastika turns to the left. Aquarius would then be on the left as the unconscious future, and the Fishes (on the right) would be, from that point of view, the conscious past. And the swastika is black, destructive—the emphasis on the black. Then Pegasus, the ruling principle could also be called the “animal libido,” and the square is the Trinity plus the devil, making all four functions.

Prof. Jung: How would you explain this cross below?

Mrs. Baumann: I just used this as a sign for the earth.

Prof. Jung: Referring to the I Ching symbolism I suppose.

Mrs. Sigg: You spoke last time of the creative self and I thought that was an enormous relief; and you also spoke of the vital principle that was beyond everything, ruling over all. And I think if you connect the self with the creative idea, the forming principle, that makes it much easier for us to accept the idea of the self, much easier for living. Now in Pegasus, Mrs. Baumann suggests something of that forming principle, and she also spoke of the Sculptor, the constellation below, as a creative sign.

Prof. Jung: I did not quite understand what you said about Pegasus and the relation of the word, Mrs. Baumann.

Mrs. Baumann: I meant inspired speech, as in the creative poet, so it seemed to me it could be connected also with Nietzsche.

Prof. Jung: You mean connected through synchronicity—that the actual place of the spring equinox would coincide with the time of Nietzsche?

Mrs. Baumann: I mean with his intuition of the ruling principle to come.

Prof. Jung: Pegasus is a fixed place in the heavens, and in the stream of time the birth of Nietzsche would occur somewhere under Pegasus. And that Nietzsche would therefore coincide with that symbolism would be of course according to the idea of astrology, where a birth coincides with a cosmic factor and is unfluenced thereby. Would that express your idea?

Mrs. Baumann: Yes.

Prof. Jung: Well, that is possible. Thank you very much.

Mrs. Baumann: I felt so terribly shy about showing this. I did not want to be identified with it. It was absolutely not my own activity.

Prof. Jung: I am very glad that Mrs. Baumann has told us this, because she thus gives us a very excellent demonstration of what I was saying: that this is not a creation from the world of words, but from the world of experience. She naturally felt shy in talking about it and has not her usual certainty; it is a particular kind of experience which she has tried to formulate in cipher. I assume that this is more or less a definite experience, otherwise we could not explain why she took the time and trouble to seek out and bring together all sorts of situations and parallels, in order to express or substantiate her particular experience, which is in itself utterly inexpressible. You will admit that one experiences a peculiar difficulty if called upon to explain such a thing. Now the very character of the things she has gathered together to make her point clear, shows that one could also bring in God-knows-what other comparisons or analogies, which would contribute equally well to the same idea. This whole scheme, for instance, suggests the cross, and the cross was a very important time symbol already in antiquity; it has always been explained as the position of the spring equinox, the intersection of the equator with the so-called ecliptic. It has also been said that the Greek letter X in Platonism represents that spring equinox, but I don't believe it; I think it is the visible cross in the sky which one sees in certain latitudes, not the constellation of the Southern Cross, but the intersection of the Milky Way with the zodiacal line. I saw it in the desert in North Africa, but I assume one can see it on clear nights in Greece because it is the same latitude.

Prof. Fierz: We saw it in Rhodes.

Prof. Jung: It is a very old idea of course, belonging to that myth, for instance, where the demiurgos created a round universe which he cut into four parts and then stuck together again; and to the myth where man was made as a perfect form, a globe with double sex, which had to be cut asunder. In that case, it was cut into only two parts. But since the dawn of time it has been assumed that the living unit consisted of four. That was the idea of Pythagoras, and one finds in all medieval philosophy that the self consists of four elements, which were either identified with earth, water, fire, and air, or with the four kinds of temperament, just as we compare them with the four functions. It is an archaic truth that the essential thing consists of four, and therefore this cross symbolism is also linked up with time. The intersection of the ecliptic with the equator is such an association with time, and from that comes the cross symbolism of the early horoscope, which can be drawn in a square, as the ancients conceived of it, or in the form of a circle.

So this diagram is a sort of horoscope, but of the Platonic year, and though it apparently has to do with the most cosmic matters, yet it also expresses our psychology; and according to Mrs. Baumann, it would express the psychology of Nietzsche and Germany and Europe. As a matter of fact, one could say that it does represent it, which does not mean that events in the world are so because we have such ideas! This is not an explanation. It is utterly illogical, utterly irrational; it is merely an expression of the fact that our psychology is actually such that it has to produce this sort of thing if the psyche is experienced. That is, of course, the necessary condition; without that, nothing of the kind happens. And the best way of expressing it is surely to link it up with the peculiarities of the time, because there is presumably a synchronicity between the psychological events in ourselves and the events in the sphere of life in which we live. Of course, much more could be said about this peculiar symbolism. For instance, you have here the so-called four correspondences very beautifully. In Pegasus one sees the four points quite clearly, and they are included in the square below in a different arrangement, in the form of a cross. Here the points are connected, while in Pegasus they are disconnected. Then in the taigitu, corresponding to the age of the Fishes, there is a duality; and opposite, in the age of Aquarius, there is also a duality but of a different kind. The symbol for the Fishes is static because it revolves in itself, and the Aquarius sign is flowing. It has no beginning and no end. I am glad that Mrs. Baumann has given us this chance to see how such symbolic expressions come into existence, and why they come. They are always an attempt to formulate the immediate experience of our time. Of course, that doesn't mean that nobody experiences the time who does not make such a scheme; we can experience our time in many forms. It can be in the form of the word, also. As long as it is experienced in the form of the word, however, we are personally not really shaken. But if it reaches us within, in our own essence, we need an expression and we will seek an expression. We will eat dust to get that expression. People eat the most incredible things—Eastern philosophy, and anthroposophy, and I don't know what besides—in order to find the stuff which would allow them to express the experience of our time, the actual condition of our collective psyche.

LECTURE VII

6 March 1935

Prof. Jung:

I think we can today go on to the next chapter, "Joys and Passions."

My brother, when thou hast a virtue, and it is thine own virtue, thou hast it in common with no one.

To be sure, thou wouldst call it by name and caress it; thou wouldst pull its ears and amuse thyself with it.

And lo! Then hast thou its name in common with the people, and hast become one of the people and the herd with thy virtue.

Better for thee to say: "Ineffable is it, and nameless, that which is pain and sweetness to my soul, and also the hunger of my bowels."

What does he mean by that first sentence? If I have a virtue, justice for instance, then surely I have it in common with other people; I cannot assume that I am the only one who has the virtue of justice.

Miss Hannah: Does he mean by that the virtue of being yourself?—because a long way back (Prologue, sec. 4) he uses virtue in that sense.

Prof. Jung: Yes, in those passages he means by "virtue" the value of personality, or one can say the self. For the real value of a personality is always symbolized by a jewel, a treasure or something of the sort, because everything is centered round that central value which would be the self. And that value can be called "virtue" because "virtue" has almost the meaning of magic power. Therefore, the Latin word virtus was used to designate specific magic qualities, like the virtus of a medicine, or a metal, or a stone, for instance. The virtus of the amethyst is that it protects one against intoxication, and the virtus of the horn of the rhinoceros is that, when made into a goblet, it protects one against poison. That is a Chinese idea; they imported rhinoceros horn from Africa for that purpose. There was the same idea in Europe in the Middle Ages—you have probably seen those horn drinking cups. Then virtus later on became simply the same mana quality of a brave and courageous warrior. And later still it was supposed that people who followed a certain way, who observed certain laws or rules, acquired a virtue; for instance, if one lived an ascetic life, or performed certain ceremonies, one acquired the virtue or the man or the magic quality of a saint or a sorcerer; that was a new significance of the "virtue." Nietzsche takes it more in that sense, as effect, mana.

You see, another definition of mana is the idea of the quite uncommonly efficacious, and virtue would be an excellence or an efficacy of uncommon nature. A man with virtus is an outstanding man, who has quality, value—one cannot say what it is exactly. It is simply mana. So Nietzsche's idea would be that virtue is the thing which one has in common with none, because the highest virtue or virtus of a man is that he is himself. Individuality, self-ness—not selfishness—is the one quality which he has in common with none, because the self is utterly unique, and inasmuch as the self is realized in an individual it means uniqueness. And uniqueness means isolation, and it means also loneliness looked at from a human point of view, for it is differentiation, and a thing which is different is all by itself and not in any sort of participation; it is not connected by underground channels where the real life comes from. It is really and properly isolated, and therefore comparable to none. Now the passage: "To be sure, thou wouldst call it by name and caress it." What about that?

Mrs. Adler: Is it not the rationalizing action of consciousness? He brings it to the ego.

Prof. Jung: You mean he would make it a conscious quality and thus a quality of the ego?

Mrs. Adler: A rational quality, just that, and not something he has to do.

Prof. Fierz: He says, "When thou hast a virtue" he does not say "virtues." It might be justice or any other virtue, and that is not what you mean by "personality."

Prof. Jung: Not exactly; that is the interesting thing.

Mrs. Leon: You spoke of the principle of justice as being a virtue, but if that is formulated in laws it would have a collective aspect and lose its mana.

Prof. Jung: Well, that is something else. You see, when I speak of a virtue and call it "justice," I simply take one example, and by that I am giving you the name. Nietzsche starts with the idea that one has a virtue—usually when one speaks of a virtue one means a specific one—and then he goes on, "And it is thine own virtue"—which means specific to yourself. You must realize that this is a virtue which you have in common with nobody else; it is an individual belonging, and he implies that you had better not give it a name. He says, "To be sure, thou wouldst call it by a name"—meaning, naturally, that you are inclined to speak of a specific virtue, but as soon as you call it by a name, "Then hast thou its name in common with the people, and hast become one of the people and the herd with thy virtue." So don't designate your virtue by a name, for you thus make it specific: it becomes just one of the virtues.

Mrs. Fierz: It is making it exoteric instead of esoteric.

Prof. Jung: You can put it like that. For if you bring a thing which is nameless down into the sphere of the collective, you become part of collectivity, a herd particle; you have impoverished or reduced a uniqueness to a collective thing. Then the highest value has sunk to the level of a coin that can be found in anybody's pocket. So this idea, as he expresses it, is, "Better for thee to say: 'Ineffable is it, and nameless, that which is pain and sweetness to my soul, and also the hunger of my bowels.'"

Let thy virtue be too high for the familiarity of names, and if thou must speak of it, be not ashamed to stammer about it.

By giving a name to your virtue, you will disenchant it, lower it, deteriorate it to a collective level; and then it would not be your individual accomplishment. It would be just a character quality and no longer the excellence of your uniqueness.

Miss Wolff: I think he explains also in the second sentence that giving a name and displaying an interest is to be on too intimate terms with it, and that can have the same effect upon himself. For if he is familiar, then it is a possession which he can put in his pocket, no longer a thing greater than himself. He becomes it.

Prof. Jung: That would be practically what Mrs. Adler said: it would be assimilating it to the ego. If one can call it by a name and put it in one's pocket, the ego would be on top—I have a virtue. Giving a name to a thing generally has the peculiar effect of familiarizing it. It is as if it were depotentiated; as by giving a name to a demon, one has power over the demon. Therefore, one reads in the Book of the Dead that the Egyptians always put a book in the coffin of a dead king, containing the names of the gates and doors of the underworld, for they were only opened if he could call them by the right name. So in Grimm's fairy tale, that demon Rumpelstiltskin<sup>1</sup> comes and works mischief until he is called by his name, and then he gets so angry that he immediately explodes and is finished because his real name is known. Therefore, primitive kings or sorcerers have secret names: the name by which they are known generally is only a cover which conceals the real one. If anybody should know their real name it might have an effect upon their life and welfare, so they hide it. We have much the same custom. As a rule we have two, and often three, names: first our family name and to be called by that is not injurious, but when you are called by your private or Christian name, you can be injured because that person has an immediate hand in your psyche. For instance, if somebody suddenly calls out your Christian name in a crowd of apparent strangers, you will immediately be hit as if by an arrow. Therefore, one has a family name and if possible a title, which is most protective; a family name is already a bit specific but you can hide any amount of God-knows-what vanities behind a title and are not injured. For ordinary people a family name is quite good enough, but with the Christian name, the devil begins, particularly when the other sex calls you by it. This is not true in America where I was amazed to find that anybody called anybody by the Christian name, and it is even made into a belittling diminutive. That simply proves that the individual has been too highly familiarized there. A lot of trouble arises on account of it; one is secretly undermined by it.

Prof. Fierz: I remember when I was in a big powder factory in Wilmington, the man with a broom who opened the doors called, "Hello, Charlie," to the director, who was a very big man. It is as if one said to the President, "Good morning, Otto."

Mr. Baumann: You spoke of people bringing their virtue down to the collective level, and I think it also happens that people put it into their personas. For instance, a man thinks he is being frank when he always tells every nonsense without thinking.

Prof. Jung: That would be the effect of the familiarization of a virtue; you call it by a name and then you talk of it—you paint yourself with that war paint. A man who always insists that he is exceedingly truth-loving and honest, lies at the slightest provocation because he had familiarized his virtue. Nietzsche is quite right when he says one should consider a good thing in oneself as an excellence of one's own, as one's uniqueness; one should not call it by a name. For it does not matter what name one gives to it; if there is an excellence, it will be shown in many forms. A just man will have value in many different quarters, not only in exercising justice; but if he says his keynote is justice you can be sure he is lying. He says it in order to cover up injustice. So it is quite right to say, “Ineffable is it, and nameless”; it is something greater than oneself. It is one’s own uniqueness. One reads in the Upanishads that when Prajapati is deliberating about the creation of certain parts of the world, he usually consults with his own greatness, as if his own greatness were something different from himself, some super-quality, not the quality which he can name and put into his pocket. And that is the self. So even Prajapati, the Atman of the world, has a self, something greater than himself; then his own greatness speaks to him.<sup>2</sup>

Thus speak and stammer: “That is my good, that do I love, thus doth it please me entirely, thus only do I desire the good.”

Here he expresses the idea that having a virtue means a general indescribable good, a value that presides, one could say, over the whole of oneself; and you should not name it in order not to create the wrong appearance—as if you could put that good into your pocket and use it when it pleases you. It should appear, even in your formulation, as something which is in your being generally. It is always there and it will act when it pleases. You see, that is at the same time a formulation for the relation to the self, as an everlasting presence that cannot be disposed of and that cannot be named—that is there self-evidently, and will work by its own virtue. Then he says,

Not as the law of a God do I desire it, not as a human law or a human need do I desire it; it is not to be a guidepost for me to superearths and paradises.

An earthly virtue is it which I love: little prudence is therein, and the least everyday wisdom.

The only quality he gives to it is that earthly quality, which is, of course, analogous to his calling the self “the body”; he wants to include the body as the visible appearance of the self. He wants to make a whole of it, not only “a guidepost for me to superearths and paradises.” Not only a soul meant for paradise, that is; he also means the body, the living unit. And naturally if you take virtue as being a quality manifested in the whole of yourself, including the body, then there is little prudence in it and still less common sense. You know, common sense always advises us to give names to things in order to control them; it is as if you could take a thing into your hands, make it small, and grasp it. While if you deal with things to which you cannot give a name, you are confronted with an unknown quantity, and that always arouses your fear. It is uncanny, particularly in insisting upon less prudence and common sense. But prudence is an exclusion of certain ways. It is our own foresight, and you know how far foresight leads us—not very far. By prudence and common sense we might exclude a way which would lead us to the right place. Of course on the other hand, if it is a matter of uncommon sense, then you need common sense. Usually people with common sense are lacking in uncommon sense, and alas! people with uncommon sense lack common sense—and that is equally bad.

But that bird built its nest beside me: therefore, I love and cherish it—now sitteth it beside me on its golden eggs.

What kind of picture is this? What does it mean?

Mrs. Baumann: It is the uncommon sense idea.

Prof. Jung: This bird obviously means that earthly virtue which has so little prudence and common sense. But I would like to know the meaning of this peculiar symbol. Why just such a funny picture?

Mrs. Stutz: It is sent by God, coming from heaven, but it develops out of nature itself.

Mrs. Adler: A bird is a spiritual fact, so this virtue does not come from the earth; it is an opposite conception.

Mr. Allemann: This earthly virtue has spiritual power in it, and it is a creative thing. It sits on golden eggs.

Mrs. Leon: But nesting also suggests that weaving quality of women; they sometimes weave nests instead of plots.

Mr. Baumann: Has it not the quality of a rebirth, a resurrection?

Prof. Jung: Now you are getting warmer!

Mrs. Sigg: It has something to do, perhaps, with the Holy Ghost and its motherly qualities.

Prof. Jung: Ah yes, it has very much to do with the Holy Ghost. You see, when Nietzsche, a parson's son, speaks of a bird with golden eggs, it has surely never the American meaning of "business."

Dr. Strong: There is also the idea of self-perpetuation—going from bird to egg and then the bird again.

Prof. Jung: Yes, and the gold itself suggests permanency and duration.

Miss Wolff: Quite simply, it shows again that it is absolutely not his own doing; the bird came to him and Nietzsche just waits until the eggs are hatched.

Prof. Jung: So the bird would mean what? You are speaking of Nietzsche himself.

Mrs. Fierz: Zarathustra. And in as far as he is the wise old man, he can also be depicted as bird. It would be the hamsa.

Prof. Jung: Well, the hamsa is a miraculous bird sure enough, and it is also a sort of phoenix, because the old wise man knows of the elixir of life. He can give himself rebirth, always rise again from his ashes. He is a great sorcerer, and he is a bird because he is a spirit. You see, we could say that this bird is quality, virtue—made visible in the figure of Zarathustra, the greater one in Nietzsche. So this is a symbol of the self appearing in the form of a wise old man; in other words, the idea of the fact of the self is still enveloped by the symbol of the wise old man, in this case by the wise old bird, the hamsa.

Mrs. Fierz: Professor Zimmer quoted an Indian legend in his Berlin Seminar which I think illustrates this. Markandeya, who is a very great saint, is wandering all over the world, and at the same time the world is the body of the God, so that actually he is inside the God's body.<sup>3</sup> Wandering thus through many countries and kingdoms and meditating about the marvels of the earth, the saint happens to arrive at the God's mouth and suddenly stands on the surface of his body. But he cannot recognize this because of the God's maya. What he sees instead is an endless ocean and in this ocean a mountain-like sleeping giant. And just as Markandeya is going to ask the giant who he is, he is swallowed up again by the mouth of the god, and is wandering all over the world inside the god's body. Then, after a long time, Markandeya without his knowing arrives again at the god's mouth and is again suddenly standing on the surface of his body. This time he sees a baby playing under a tree, and the baby says: "Hello, Markandeya! Come here, my child, and be not afraid." Markandeya is terribly angry that a mere baby should be allowed to call him "child" and by his first name, instead of respectfully giving him his saintly titles. But then the baby says: "I am your father and creator"; it reveals its eternal godhead to Markandeya, so that the saint now knows. But again he is swallowed up by the god's mouth—and the interesting part of the story is this: that being inside of the body of the god again, Markandeya remembers him not as the god, but as the swan, as Hamsa. So, what on a superpersonal level is the god, on our everyday level seems to be the swan, the bird of the wise old man.

Prof. Jung: That is very interesting. Well, because that memory is wisdom, it is the wise old man who remembers back through the ages into the time before man, when there were only the gods; so it was a memory of a divine world. Professor Lévy-Bruhl alluded to that bugari world of the Central Australian aborigines, a mythical period in the past of mankind, a sort of heroic age when men were demigods and animals; and it was like a dream. They call dreaming by the same name.<sup>4</sup> So in the dreams one is in that original divine world, the world which is eternal, which lasts during the transitory world in which we are actually living and forever after. It is always the world outside time and the sage is supposed to have the memory of it, and it is interesting that this memory is represented by an animal. You see, it is necessary to pass through the stage of the animal in order to reach the absolute memory, because the ancestors are animal-like; therefore, it is always represented by a snake or a bird or another animal, according to circumstances.

Mr. Baumann: But has not the bird rather the special quality of pointing to the future? In other Seminars we talked about birds bringing new ideas to people, showing them what they have to do.

Prof. Jung: That is the bird considered as a messenger. But this bird functions rather differently. He says the bird has built a nest in him; it is now firmly rooted. When a bird builds his nest in your room, it means to stay. So this bird has established itself in Nietzsche; it is his other psyche. This memory, or the wise old man, the connection with the world outside time, is now within him and is going to hatch the golden eggs. "Gold" generally means value; also the virtue of gold is that it is in a way beyond time. It does not oxidize, but remains the same. That the eggs are golden, then, means highest value, greatest luck; and a number of them would mean fertility, many golden possibilities for the future. They have nothing to do with the well-known hen that lays the golden eggs, meaning riches—spiritual riches are meant here, quite obviously. And it is interesting that he speaks of the earthly virtue, meaning the virtue of the body, yet in the next sentence uses this spiritual symbol, an air being, a bird that has built its nest. It would denote a sort of intuition in Nietzsche that the body of which he speaks is not without spirit; it is not a contradiction between body or matter and spirit, but is a body that lives, a spiritual body.

You see, this is really the old idea of the breath body, the subtle body, which is always represented either as bird or ghost, because it is smoke-like and has no weight. It rises out of our coarse body and floats in the air, like a flying bird or a wreath of smoke. You can find all these ideas in the psychology of the primitives, that gives real substance for such a peculiar paradox. We must respect the fact that when Nietzsche speaks of the body, he does not exactly mean what we understand by a substantial or material body, but something that is spirit as well, and there is also that middle thing which the primitives call "the subtle body." Nietzsche was in a sort of trance condition when he wrote Zarathustra—we spoke of it in the beginning—and we have come across many places where such primitive images have simply welled up from the depths of the primitive unconscious. Therefore, it is no wonder that entre autres we meet this most important concept of primitive psychology, the idea of the subtle body which is spirit as well as body. It is the union of the two by this thing between. And we cannot speak of psychical reality without remembering the fact that the psyche can also have very real effects which are performed through that something which is called "the subtle body."

<sup>4</sup> The bugari world is that of a past period, a heroic age, which can be entered and dwelt in, under special circumstances, by a person of the present. It is also called the al-cheringa world. See Lévy-Bruhl, Primitive Mentality (London, 1923), ch. 3.

Thus shouldst thou stammer, and praise thy virtue.

By that he means you cannot possibly talk clever words about virtue, the uncommon efficacy of the self; you cannot say anything definite about it because it is greater than you. You can only stammer as if in the presence of a greater one. And you are right if you stammer and are embarrassed, not finding suitable terms or analogies. Then you do justice to it.

Once hadst thou passions and calledst them evil. But now hast thou only thy virtues; they grew out of thy passions.

This is rather unexpected; it is as if a new thought were beginning here. The question obviously has occurred to him: But why virtue? Virtue is something very positive, but where is the shadow? Where is the negative side of virtue? Where is vice? And he comes to passion, because passion is supposed to be the mother of all vice: evil passions are surely vices. So he cannot consider the idea of virtue without considering at the same time its negation. You see, he makes something very great of his conception of virtue, and I think we are perfectly right in assuming that he really means the self. Now the self surely is the greatest borderline concept we possibly could invent. It is a great symbol, and it includes also the darkness. We would be quite wrong in assuming that the self is what we would call "wholly positive." It has its own negation, casting a shadow because it is also material, not only what we call "spiritual." We usually associate beauty and all sorts of divine things with the spirit, and are inclined to assume that all the darkness, the heaviness, and everything bad is associated with the body. Also by historical tradition one is inclined to make all of the spirit and very little of the body. Nietzsche feels that here, and therefore he suddenly remembers, "Once hadst thou passions and calledst them evil. But now hast thou only thy virtues; they grew out of passions." He is anticipating modern psychology when he sees virtue in connection with passions; he understands that the self consists of pairs of opposites and that it is in a way a reconciliation of opposites. But he does not say that here, so one must leave it out of consideration.

Thou implantedst thy highest aim into the heart of those passions: then became they thy virtues and joys.

And though thou wert of the race of the hot-tempered, or of the voluptuous, or of the fanatical, or the vindictive;

All thy passions in the end became virtues, and all thy devils angels.

Once hadst thou wild dogs in thy cellar: but they changed at last into birds and charming songstresses.

Out of thy poisons brewedst thou balsam for thyself; thy cow, affliction, milkedst thou—now drinketh thou the sweet milk of her udder.

And nothing evil groweth in thee any longer, unless it be the evil that groweth out of the conflict of thy virtues.

In speaking here of passions, of the origin of virtues, he does not treat this problem in the way psychology would treat it, of course. We would be conscious of the fact that our virtues possess a shadow and that the shadow is just as real as the virtues. At least I hope you have given up such illusions as the notion, for instance, that you are completely converted, that you are now an absolutely new man, and that all the former sins have vanished. I am sorry: that is an infantile illusion. We cannot get rid of ourselves; we carry our body, and our shadow and everything else is as it always has been. We can only hope to become balanced between light and shadow—that is practically all we can hope for, no more. It is a catastrophic illusion to think that one can jump out of one's skin and be an angel from henceforth. But Nietzsche deals here with a psychology that creates good out of evil, and the connection is good. It is surely true that there is even a causal connection between evil passions and corresponding virtues. But it is not exactly as he puts it, that we make a virtue out of our devil. Of course, in a way one can create the appearance of having created a virtue out of a devil—humility out of vanity, for instance, and generosity out of miserliness; but if one has really created generosity out of miserliness, then it will be a miserly generosity. One's cleanliness will be an impurity at the same time, and one's frankness will be a lie in a miraculous way, because one forgets that the shadow is still there. One can create ten thousand angels but one's ten thousand evil passions are right behind those angels: it is a mere façade. A façade is very real. It is the front side of the house and the house would collapse if it had not a façade, but there is something behind it. Otherwise a façade makes no sense.

In this way we can understand it then—that one can even create the illusion to oneself that “Henceforth naught of evil groweth in myself except that one evil which comes from the conflict of virtues.” You see virtues, like all things which are named and specified, easily get into a quarrel; a virtue which is named has the disagreeable quality of being very imperious. Justice, being named, wants to be nothing but justice, and of course it gets into conflict right away with compassion; one cannot be just and compassionate at the same time because justice must be hard and cruel, otherwise it is not justice. Fiat justitia pereat mundus.<sup>5</sup> And true and essential compassion, compassion as it should be, from the standpoint of man cannot be just. And so on. So a man who really tries to be virtuous, having named his virtues that is, is always heading for tremendous moral difficulties, the so-called conflict of conscience, where the two goods clash. Then he does not know whether he should be more compassionate or more just or more respectable or more moral,—or should he be more human? The more he has all these marvelous virtues and the more he believes in them, the more he gets into a hell of a conflict between them; he will create one collision after the other between his own virtues. So he says,

My brother, if thou be fortunate, then wilt thou have one virtue and no more: thus goest thou easier over the bridge.

If you have only one virtue—provided you don't name it—you escape the conflict because that one virtue gives quality to your personality, and that will make itself felt in all quarters of your life, not only in the one which it would strike if you gave a name to it. For instance, if you say your virtue is justice, then within the realm of justice you are just, but outside of it you can be anything else; where justice as you understand it does not enter the question, there your named virtue simply would not play a role. But if you don't name it, then that valuable substance which produces justice can produce something else just as well—generosity or compassion, for instance. If you call it “justice” then it must produce nothing but justice, because you have caught it in the cage of your concept. You see, a concept is what you have grasped in that particular form; you have stolen that value and put it into a cage and then it can only produce what you say it should produce. It is no longer a general value of personality.

Illustrious is it to have many virtues, but a hard lot; and many a one hath gone into the wilderness and killed himself, because he was weary of being the battle and battlefield of virtues.

Here he refers to one who has sustained too many moral conflicts, not between good and evil but between two goods, which is worse. A battle between good and evil is easily won. You can slay the devil by the aid of all sorts of helpful ideas and institutions, public support. Everybody will shake your hand and congratulate you on having slain the dragon. But to slay another virtue is harder: there you gain no recognition. The just will say you are just, but others will say you have not been compassionate; and others will say, yes, you have been frank and honest yet you were not generous or compassionate. For if you are honest and believe in honesty you will speak the truth, and you will make a hell of a mistake: you will be cruel, tactless, unjust and you can have every vice under the sun. Just because you believe in that one virtue, you will have offended against all others.

My brother, are war and battle evil? Necessary, however, is the evil; necessary are the envy and the distrust and the backbiting among the virtues.

You see, he puts it very plainly here: each ideal claims the whole man, for provided one names the virtue, each virtue claims its own essence. If one says it is justice then it must be the justest justice, otherwise justice is not satisfied and will keep on grumbling; if you allow your compassion to make you deviate from the path of justice, then justice will begin to complain. And if your justice violates your feeling of compassion, then it will be compassion that is wailing and lamenting. Again somebody is not content, and finally you are in the situation of that famous old parable of the man, his son, and the ass.

Lo! how each of thy virtues is covetous of the highest place; it wanteth thy whole spirit to be its herald, it wanteth thy whole power, in wrath, hatred, and love.

Jealous is every virtue of the others, and a dreadful thing is jealousy. Even virtues may succumb by jealousy.

He is quite right, jealousy is the real character of virtues, of all ideas.

He whom the flame of jealousy encompasseth, turneth at last, like the scorpion, the poisoned sting against himself.

People in conflict between good and evil as a rule don't undergo such a terrible battle as those in whom virtues are clashing, where two perfectly good things fight against each other. That is the worst. That is civil war where brothers are slaying each other. It is a sort of poisonous war because you cannot deny that this idea is good and that idea is good and that they are irreconcilable. Suicide may result from such a conflict more than from a case of clear good and evil; one would hardly commit suicide on account of the fact that one does not like to steal, but one might if one is in conflict between morality and compassion, say.

Mrs. Adler: That would only mean named virtues?

Prof. Jung: It is always under the supposition here that virtues are specified by names. He says, "My brother, if thou be fortunate then wilt thou have one virtue and no more." That means an indistinct virtue, not a named one.

Mrs. Adler: If those virtues were not named, then the conflict would not be possible?

Prof. Jung: Well, of course if they are not formulated, such conflicts cannot take place; then it is the one value that rules the whole thing and you have not assumed the power by giving it a name. You see, we usurp something by giving it a name. We say it is this and nothing else, and think we have the purest substance of the thing when we name it. It is like qualifying a thing, as when one says that this is such and such a man. How can we say what a man is?—or what man is in general? He is millions of things. By saying he is such and such a man, you have classified him and then he is no longer free. If he allows it, he will be forced into that category. Usually we defend ourselves against being put into cages. But the State puts everybody into a category, and popular movements do it, and the church—those who belong to it are marvelous people and otherwise they belong to the devil. Or one is a German and beloved by God, and the other is a Frenchman and Satan's own son. You see, those are all names, and it is the same when you name or specify certain qualities. I don't say that this is all wrong of course, or that we have to give names is simply a tragedy. But don't forget that behind all names is the nameless and unutterable; beyond all our virtues there is one real virtue that has no name.

For virtues are gifts. I may have the faculty of being kind as some one else has the faculty of playing the piano, and as others have the moral art: they just have the gift of being nice or being good. Those are all gifts, and the poisonous thing is making a morality of it and imagining it to be a merit. If you are musical it is no merit; if you are a red parrot it is no merit. It is just so. So you see, if you don't give names, then it remains more or less a natural fact. It is not differentiated and it will work as something in nature will work. For instance, a dog is jealous, voracious; he hates his fellow dog and he tries to get his bone. But he has justice and even a sort of compassion in the measure in which a dog should have such virtues. If you have a big dog and a small one and put the bone between them, then the bone is considered to be in the middle when it is nearer to the small dog than to the big one: the distance between the big dog and the bone can be greater than the distance between the small dog and the bone. I have made that experiment with my own dogs. If it is right in the middle, they hesitate as to which should take it; but if I put it a bit to one side the small dog takes it. If I throw a ball, they both jump at the same time, but they always consider that the one who is first must get the ball, and the other desists; and if the ball is rolling towards one of them, then the dog on the other side desists. It is really natural politeness. So primitives have exquisite manners. They have immense virtues and immense vices, but they work more or less smoothly together, so that a fairly round individual appears. Of course, it is wholly unconscious because it is not named. If they said, "Now I am compassionate, now I am just," they would have an inflation and of course they would then be one-sided; they would be at once in conflict with their surroundings and with themselves if they were capable of having a moral conflict at all.

Miss Kaufmann: I know that Nietzsche is right here, but I must say that to find a name for an experience is also a great experience. What he means here perhaps only applies to people who have too much consciousness, and consciousness is a kind of imperative power. But with the right kind of consciousness, to name it can be so beautiful; it has happened to me so many times that I got my balance just because I found a name which was just the right thing.

Prof. Jung: Yes, there is a great merit in names. It is tremendously important to give a name to a thing—it may really save you from demons and disintegration and chaos. To be able to name things is man's greatest prerogative. But you can see what they made of it—having nothing but names. And with a man like Nietzsche it is, of course, a different question. We give too many names; we name things far too much, thereby killing possibilities which would otherwise function naturally. We must be careful only to give names where we really know. For instance, if you call a certain tendency or psychological movement in a man "sexuality," then it is just sexuality and you have spoiled the whole thing: it becomes absolutely unmanageable and you can do nothing at all with it. You make the same mistake if you call it "spiritual." If you give it a certain name you qualify it, put it into prison, into a drawer, or a cage, and you can no longer handle it because that name is all wrong. But if you give the right name to a thing, ah, that is something else; there you have acquired a power over nature. Science chiefly consists in an attempt of man to give the right names to things, and science is a great achievement of man.

Mr. Baumann: The Greek philosophical school made a great fuss about what they called the virtues, and it has a great influence upon the whole of science. Was it partly because they had to put something up against Greek mythology?

Prof. Jung: That early philosophy was the great attempt of the human mind to free itself from the mythological level; as scholasticism was the heroic attempt of man to free his intellect from the evidences of facts, of immediate impressions, affects, and so on. Therefore, that utterly detached manner in which they tried to think.

Dr. Escher: Can one call this process re-abstraction?

Prof. Jung: Yes, one could designate it like that. Giving a name to a thing creates a sort of abstraction, you remove a thing from life by having abstracted it; then in order to bring it back into life you have to undo the attempt, give up the name, and that would be re-abstraction. Nietzsche is really trying that here. He tries to dissolve the abstraction of differentiated concepts into nameless experiences. He does so because he has been tremendously impressed by the utterly irrational experience of Zarathustra; he is filled with that experience and he believes in it, so he wants to convey it to everybody. Therefore, this particular admonition: don't name your virtue, in order that the virtue may remain an unutterable value which will lead you in the right way. Don't use too much man's prerogative of giving names, for thus you are not creating life substance but killing it. Now, the idea of this last sentence, "He whom the flame of jealousy encompasseth, turneth at last, like the scorpion, the poisoned sting against himself," is that the one who is in a raging battle of ideas or moral duties will eventually kill himself. He will go under in this fight.

Ah! my brother, hast thou never seen a virtue backbite and stab itself?

This means again that those virtues which are named have a tendency to kill themselves. If you overdo justice it is no longer justice; it is as if you jumped off the roof of your house: you fall dead. You can kill each virtue by following up only its own tendency. Compassion that goes beyond common sense one could say was no longer compassion; it simply becomes a vice and so it kills itself. Now he says

Man is something that hath to be surpassed: and therefore shalt thou love thy virtues,—for thou wilt succumb by them.

This is very interesting. If you try to follow up your virtues, you cannot avoid naming them, and then you will get into that battle which will eventually destroy you. And that is exactly what he wants: man ought to be surmounted. This man must be killed in favor of the Superman; otherwise he cannot produce the Superman. This, curiously enough, is a Christian idea, and I brought a picture which illustrates it. It is a codex of the thirteenth century from the Bibliothèque de Besançon, Jésus-Christ crucifié par les vertus dont il avait été le modèle. He is being crucified by all the named virtues; one is hammering the nails into his feet and his hands, another one is stabbing his side, and so on.<sup>6</sup> His virtues have really brought that painful death upon him—obviously a very Christian idea. That is medieval philosophy, you see. To that extent could they draw the conclusion that it was really the virtues, not the devils, which brought Christ to his cross. Now what does this symbolize?

Mrs. Fierz: Is it not the idea of the enantiodynamia?—if you go to the very end of the thing then it must change.

Prof. Jung: Oh yes, it is an enantiodynamia, but more important here is the thought that it was not the evil people—those evil Jews or Romans or whoever they were—who crucified Christ. It was his virtues, his greatness, that really led him to the cross; consciousness of those qualities, the named virtues, killed him, tore him to bits. And the cross is, of course, the well-known individuation symbol, which means that individuation is the necessary outcome of moral development. If you are consistent in the moral development you get into the moral conflict and into the role of Christ, namely, into the process of individuation. That is not a weakness, it is strength—as it was not a weakness that Christ was crucified. It was strength because it was voluntary; he made up his mind to the crucifixion. And that is Nietzsche's idea: you should live your virtues because they lead to your destruction, and only through your destruction can you create the Superman, which is of course the highest man, the self. The act of destruction is the nailing to the cross in the Christian mystery. The cross is the symbol of individuation.

LECTURE VIII

Prof. Jung:

Both Mrs. Baumann and Mrs. Stutz have asked about the concept of the subtle body which I mentioned last time. That is a very big problem in itself, and I think it would be a good thing if a comprehensive report were made next term about the primitive idea of the body of breath. Very little is known about this strange concept of the subtle body. Mead has written a book about it.<sup>1</sup> You see, when we speak of the unconscious we mean the psychological unconscious, which is a possible concept; we are then dealing with certain factors in the unconscious which we really can understand and discriminate. But the part of the unconscious which is designated as the subtle body becomes more and more identical with the functioning of the body, and therefore it grows darker and darker and ends in the utter darkness of matter; that aspect of the unconscious is exceedingly incomprehensible. I only mentioned it because in dealing with Nietzsche's concept of the self, one has to include a body, so one must include not only the shadow—the psychological unconscious—but also the physiological unconscious, the so-called somatic unconscious which is the subtle body. You see, somewhere our unconscious becomes material, because the body is the living unit, and our conscious and our unconscious are embedded in it: they contact the body. Somewhere there is a place where the two ends meet and become interlocked. And that is the place where one cannot say whether it is matter, or what one calls "psyche." Now everything that can be represented to the conscious is psychological, but if a thing cannot be made conscious, or can only be expressed by vague analogies or hints, it is so dark that one doesn't know whether it has to do with the top or the bottom of the system, whether it leads into the body or into the air.

According to the old Gnostic system, the pneuma is above, that part of the unconscious which is divine; then below would come the body which was called hyle, or sarx, as Paul calls the flesh in the New Testament, and between the two there is the human or the psychological sphere. The Latin words for pneuma are spiritus and in another connection animus, not to be mistaken for the specific animus concept in our psychology. Then with the psyche would be the anima, with the connotation of the breath of life, the living flame, the living warmth of the body. This anima has a spiritual side, called in China the shen, and their concept of kuei would be the somatic or corporeal part. This region contains the psychology of the subtle body because it reaches into the sarx. Now, when you look at man you see the body, the sarx, and only by inference do you come to the psychological side; you get reflected rays of light from a body of flesh, and you hear a voice, vibrations of the air, and they give you the necessary hints to conclude as to the psyche. If you are inside yourself, in your own body, then you are in the psyche, which is the center. It would be about like this. The mountain would be the conscious and the unconscious, and the spiritual would be on one side and the somatic on the other. The greatest intensity of life is in the center and the darkness is on either side, on the spiritual side as well as on the side of matter.

You may have read that famous Gnostic work, Pistis Sophia.<sup>2</sup> Pistis means fidelity, confidence, trust, loyalty, wrongly translated by “belief” or “creed,” and Sophia is the woman wisdom of God. She is God’s wife in a way, and therefore has also been understood as the so-called theotokos, the mother of God—that is the term used in the Greek Orthodox church for Mother Mary—and certain Gnostics held that Sophia was the mother of the spiritual Jesus. The man Jesus has of course been born of an earthly woman, but the spiritual Jesus that descended into him when he was baptized by John was born out of Sophia. They were convinced that the man Jesus who was hanging on the cross was only the material body, that during his struggle in the garden, hours before his crucifixion, the God had departed from him. So the God was never crucified. The body was hanging on the cross and not the God-man, the proof being that Christ himself said, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" That is the belief of the Doketic form of Christianity, a very important branch which for a while threatened the development of the orthodox Christian dogma.<sup>3</sup> I mention this because all these ideas of the subtle body play a great role in the New Testament. The body, or sarx, to St. Paul is the gross, biological, physiological body, the corruptible body; but he speaks also of the incorruptible body which we put on with Christ, because Christ is in a way the soul or the pneuma, the incorruptible body that is beyond space and time.<sup>4</sup>

You see, the subtle body—assuming that there is such a thing—necessarily must be beyond space and time. Every real body fills space because it consists of matter, while the subtle body is said not to consist of matter, or it is matter which is so exceedingly subtle that it cannot be perceived. So it must be a body which does not fill space, a matter which is beyond space, and therefore it would be in no time. You know, we can only have a notion of time by the measure of distance; for instance, to move from this end of the room to the other needs a certain length of time, but if there is no extension, no change, there is no time; even if that moment stands still for ten thousand eternities, there is no time because nothing happens. This idea of the subtle body is very important, and it is marvelous to encounter it in a text which naively comes from the wholeness of man. You will see from the next chapter that Zarathustra is one of the books that is written with blood, and anything written with blood contains the notion of that subtle body, the equivalent of the somatic unconscious. I usually do not deal with that concept simply because it is too difficult; I content myself with things of which I can really know something. It is beyond our grasp per definitionem; the subtle body is a transcendental concept which cannot be expressed in terms of our language or our philosophical views, because they are all inside the categories of time and space.<sup>5</sup>

So we can only talk primitive language as soon as we come to the question of the subtle body, and that is everything else but scientific. It means speaking in images. Of course, we can talk such a language but whether it is comprehensible is an entirely different question. And you know I believe in science, I believe in that which man can do. I also remember what Mephistopheles says to the student who went away with the devil's good advice. The devil smiles behind his back and says:

Scorn reason and science if you can,
The highest powers yet bestowed on man!<sup>6</sup>

Science is the highest power of man, for we can do just what we can do, and when we try to deal with things which are beyond our comprehension, we are overstepping our competence. You see, there are plenty of secrets—only a few fools, morbid intellects, think we have solved all the riddles; anybody with even the smallest amount of imagination knows that the world is a great enigma, and psychology is one of the foremost enigmas. And you can touch one with your hands in this question of the subtle body. Now, Mrs. Baumann first asks, “Are there not two uses of the expression ‘subtle body’? At times, it seems to be used as a synonym for the diamond body. Isn’t the other, more primitive meaning of ‘subtle body’ a kind of ghost-like body, like a framework, halfway between spirit and matter, which everyone possesses and in which the various centers are located? Is the diamond body something which may develop in this subtle body?”

Such questions will inevitably arise as soon as you begin to talk of the subtle body: Is the subtle body identical with what Chinese Yoga calls the diamond body, or it is rather the kuei of Chinese philosophy, the somatic unconscious? Well, the diamond body is the equivalent of the concept of the self. Therefore it is expressed by the stone of the highest value, and it is also called the golden germ, the golden child, Hiranyagarbha in Sanscrit. According to Chinese Yoga, it comes from the lead of the water region, which is not of a precious nature. It is the heavy cold metal of a low nature which is supposed to be deep down in the body, the muladhara, or in svadhisthana, the water center; out of this common or vulgar body the alchemistic procedure produces gold or the diamond body, the everlasting body. In the language of medieval alchemy it would have been the philosopher's stone or the eagle (aurum nostrum, “our gold”); for those old alchemists were by no means making ordinary gold. There was no making of bodies. They started from bodies and tried to develop something out of the water region into a substance of highest value, something with the qualities of light. Yet it is located in the center—the psyche—between body and spirit—and consists of both. So in that respect one can say the concept of the diamond body is really identical with the idea of the subtle body. Naturally, the subtle body is a primitive formulation and the diamond body is the expression for a finished product of the same nature.

The Chinese Yoga procedure and alchemy are much alike, but alchemy is a most mistaken name; it had better be called the “Yoga process.” It is a process of transmutation which creates out of the subtle body within, something which is equal to the subtle body, yet it is of very great value. The matter out of which it is created can also be of little value, so the alchemists said that it could be found everywhere, quite ordinary, even despicable, a stone that is ejectus in viam, thrown out into the street. It is the stone, rejected by the builders, which became the cornerstone. They even find it in the Sterquilinium, the dung heap, as you can read in their literature. Therefore when Meyrink read those old alchemistic treatises about sorcerers making gold and God knows what, he was so impressed that he bought an ancient water-closet, a little outhouse, and dug up the fond; it was two or three hundred years old and he went to the very bottom of it in order to find the substance for the stone, because the old texts say you can find it in such disreputable places.<sup>7</sup> It is funny that many old things, even manuscripts, have been found in that way. I am not a bit sure whether the famous Oxyrhynchus papyri were not found in such a place and that they had not been put to a most disreputable use before.

Mr. Baumann: In Schaffhausen they found a wonderful one, containing a whole collection of valuable things.

Prof. Jung: Yes, such places are often really treasure-troves. But it was also said in the old texts that many have dug up such places, worked with fecal matter, yet found nothing. (That would be a good motto for a certain variety of psychoanalysis: I have dug up and worked with fecal matter yet found nothing!) Another thing they said was that people stop their work where they should have begun. The sayings of those old masters are really marvelous; as Nietzsche says in the next chapter, such things should not be read but learned by heart, they are so exceedingly true. You see, that is exactly this idea; the process begins no matter where, deep down or up above, but if above, you have to work down into the sarx, because the body also must be in the great mixture. The body is an important contribution to the diamond body, the final finished product. So, as I said, the diamond body would be merely the finished product of the primitive concept of the subtle body.

Then Mrs. Baumann says: "I don't understand how Christ was crucified by his virtues." That picture of Christ being crucified by his own virtues was an idea which they already understood in the twelfth or thirteenth century, and which you easily could understand in the text of Zarathustra which we have just dealt with, so that by naming your virtues you create the collision between virtues. If you follow up the divergent virtues, if you are just and compassionate and several other things besides, inasmuch as you name these qualities you will be torn asunder. For then you don't know whether to follow your justice or your compassion. Only inasmuch as you are unconscious of your value can you remain together. If you become conscious of your virtues you are lost; you will quite certainly get into a hellish conflict. That people don't get into these conflicts more comes from the fact that they are altogether unconscious; they don't notice it, and at a certain place they stop. For instance, a man preaches on Sunday, "Sell all your goods and give your money to the poor," but he doesn't dream of doing it. Or the Communists talk of sharing their goods, but if they have a fat pig in the stable they don't share it. So millions of people don't dream of doing it, and it is very healthy not to because it doesn't work; if you really try it you get into hot water, and nobody is fool enough to want to get into hot water unless he understands that it is necessary—that that is the one way, though it goes into the cooking pot, the Krater, and it is pretty hot there.

You see, your named virtues would be your conscious ideal; you want to be just but you want to be compassionate too, and you want to be generous yet you don't want to be a spendthrift. If you try it in reality, you will land in a tremendous moral conflict between duties, and if you follow it up to the end you get into a state of dismemberment. Compassion then runs away with you on the one side, and justice on the other, so you are like a spread eagle, or like an animal that has been nailed onto a board. The peasants are so mad at those black animals—in England they are called stoats—that they nail them on a board, crucify them alive; everybody must know that if those animals don't listen to what they are saying to them, if they do that again, they will be crucified. They hate them so much that they inflict the punishment of the Lord upon them. So you see, the end is that our virtues become utterly dissatisfied with us and kill us because we cannot fulfil them. If we are dishonest, we may say we have fulfilled them, or that, having declared a principle or an ideal, we are bound to fulfil it. But if we are honest we know we cannot. Therefore, don't say this is your ideal, because you are then giving a promise which you cannot keep. For if you give it, if you cannot avoid giving it, you must name your virtues; every decent man must name his virtues, and so he is meant for crucifixion, provided he is consistent. If he is very healthy he will stop on the way: he will be half-crucified, perhaps on Sundays. He will give an old coat, say, his Sunday coat, and he will put the thorns around his top hat.

Dr. Strong: Doesn't the fact that Christ was crucified vindicate John the Baptist in his stand against revealing the divine mysteries? In giving it to collectivity, making it a collective concept, Christ gave it a name and therefore it turned upon him. He gave the crowd a chance. That was exactly what John the Baptist foresaw.

Prof. Jung: Yes, in that making conscious, that revelation, he was giving it a name.

Now Mrs. Baumann asks: "Did Christ identify with the virtues and undergo the conflict between them?"

Evidently I must make this clear once more. Nietzsche's idea is that you should not name your virtue; otherwise you will get into a conflict of the virtues and destroy yourself. And at the end of the chapter he says, "And therefore shalt thou love thy virtues—for thou wilt succumb by them." The most foolish thing one can do is to name the virtue, because as long as you don't, you are one, acting under the influence of something incomprehensible and indescribable. You have no wrong impressions, don't know yourself, are more or less a primitive; or more like an animal that is always at one with itself and so never hesitates. It goes to its own death because dying belongs to life; and primitives die with no particular fuss. They take it as part of life. This is in a way an ideal condition, so why try to give names to things? Just because we must: our growing intellect, consciousness, forces us to do so; if we don't discriminate, we are cursed by the primitive condition. Primitive conditions are all right as long as the conditions are primitive, but the unfortunate thing is that man is not only an animal—in a way he is an animal and in a way he is not—because he has the faculty of developing consciousness. His consciousness wants to develop; he must give names even to his virtues, and so he is meant for conflict. He cannot escape it, cannot remain at one with himself. He will get into hot water in the end if he develops at all; and if he has once given a name he must continue to give names. Already, the primitive man has begun to give names, and the more "adult" he becomes, the more he will do so. So it was a particular stunt of old sages to know the names of things: it was understood to be a particular sign of power; to know the names of demons meant power over the demons. But there is a high price on knowing names; you will be tempted, even forced, to give names, but you will pay for it with conflict. Because you have discriminated between things, they begin to compete with each other; and you will be the victim of your own conflict, be crucified, get into the condition of the Christian mystery of self-destruction, self-sacrifice.

In the making of the Superman, Nietzsche is simply continuing in the path of Christianity, developing our hitherto valid form of Christianity into a philosophy that reaches a bit beyond. He tells us to be reasonable, continue the way on which we have begun, name our virtues and be damned for it; if we are damned that is our destruction, yes, but thus we shall give birth to a new man, a man with a new consciousness; a new light will dawn on mankind if we are able to give birth to the Superman. That is his message, and for that it is necessary that he even kill God. He means also that since you cannot avoid giving names, give as many and as accurate names as you know how, because all that works for your own undoing. In the end you are dissolved in conflict, you will be dissociated, disintegrated, extended on the cross, and torn asunder. You see, crucifixion is also a dismemberment, the classical death of the god, like the death of Osiris and Dionysos; through that dismemberment the god distributes himself into all parts of creation. Everywhere is a part of the god. The dismemberment is figuratively shown in Christianity by the dividing of his mantle under the cross. The soldiers cut it asunder; they threw dice and divided it. That is a sort of symbolic performance which foreshadows the distribution of the sacred body in the Host, or the indwelling of the deity in the tabernacle: the God dwells in the Host or on the altar. So Christ is distributed all over the world in the form of the Host. As a sort of Dionysos he enters into everybody and deifies everybody; you eat the pharmakon athanasias, the medicine of immortality, and are given an immortal soul. For without the sacraments of the church, unless you participate of the God, in other words, you cannot attain to immortality. That is the dismemberment, and the crucifixion symbolizes the state of supreme torture through conflicts.

When you are eaten up with conflicts, completely disintegrated, you can safely say it is crucifixion because you are spread out in the four directions of your being, to the four points of the horizon. You may have read that article in an American paper about the death of a medicine man. A medicine man who has misused his powers, failed or neglected to do the right thing, is put to death by being torn asunder in the four directions of space, and the torn-out parts are left in the distance. You see, a medicine man is made by the drawing together of the four into one, a process of individuation; therefore, when he is killed he will be torn asunder into those four directions of space. This condition of the crucifixion, then, is a symbolic expression for the state of extreme conflict, where one simply has to give up, where one no longer knows, where one almost loses one's mind. Out of that condition grows the thing which is really fought for. For Nietzsche, it would be the birth of the Superman. We would say it was the birth of the self. Only through extreme pain do you experience yourself; you believe then that you are a unit. Before that, you can imagine that you are anybody, the Pope or Mussolini—you are not necessarily yourself. Afterwards, when you have undergone this extraordinary experience of the self, there are no illusions any longer. You know exactly who you are. That is what Nietzsche means.

There is another question about the subtle body by Mrs. Stutz: "Does the 'subtle body,' which is a symbol for the individuating process of human beings, help forward the physiological work of the body itself?" The subtle body is not a symbol for the individuating process, as I have already explained; it is a concept that covers only the somatic unconscious. She goes on: "For instance, are the reactions of the body on itself, as well as coming from it, directed from the 'subtle body'?" One could not say that because the subtle body, being the somatic unconscious, is only one part; the ultimate decisions of body and mind or anything that lives within them, are obviously not only given by the somatic side of our existence; there are determinations coming from the other side just as well, and the ultimate decision is given by the self. The self includes the somatic as well as the spiritual unconscious, being neither the one nor the other, but in between, in the psyche. Then she says, "I experience the inside body as a free power, wherein all possibilities for forming or producing are given from one central point, which leads all events and reactions. So is the putting of the body into life as the consequence to an inside demand, the 'subtle body'?"

Well, from the standpoint of Platonic philosophy, the body is built up on the eidos, the eternal image of the human body. The human body would then be explained exactly as the making of a crystal is explained, by a sort of preexisting abstract axial system into which matter is filled. In crystallography, one also assumes a sort of spatial structure, the so-called mother solution, which has reached the highest degree of saturation where crystallization begins. The ions in solution are already in a certain axial structure, and they draw the molecules of the solution into place. If it is a solution of ordinary salts, the system is cubic and the cubic crystal will result; a sort of eidōs, an inevitable form, preexists and the ions are in the decisive points of that structure to draw the molecules of the solution into place. One can assume that the human body is also built in that way; this is the theory proposed by Geley in his attempt at physiology viewed from the standpoint of the subtle body. He was formerly director of the Institut de Métapsychologie in Paris, the predecessor of Dr. Osty.<sup>8</sup> It is a thoroughly Platonic idea. In that sense, one could say that the subtle body directs and builds up the physical body. Of course, this point of view is in a way very much against our hitherto valid physiological ideas, but I must say, from a scientific standpoint, there is as little proof on the one side as on the other. To explain it through the chemical transformations of bodies, the materialistic assumption, is just as right and just as wrong as explaining from the other side; one needs both points of view. In that example of crystallography you have a practical Platonism. One needs that hypothesis to explain a crystal, but of course one also needs the ions of a solution to give the start.

Mrs. Stutz: I did not think of such a material standpoint.

Prof. Jung: You can explain from within or from without: those are two contradictory points of view. It is the same with the ultimate explanation of nature. For instance, the modern explanation of light is corpuscular, but on the other side is the theory of oscillation. You have the two explanations and you need both because there are certain phenomena which you cannot explain as corpuscular, which must be oscillation, and others where it cannot be oscillation—where it must be corpuscular. You are simply forced to these antinomies of reason if you follow up a problem far enough—to a clear issue. And even there you get into a conflict. You cannot live without getting into trouble, cannot think, cannot feel; you can do nothing without getting into trouble. For trouble is what we are all looking for; we all hate it—we want to be perfectly nice and frank—but we are looking for trouble.

Now we come to the next chapter, which begins with a problem in the title, “The Pale Criminal.” How does Nietzsche arrive at this?

Mrs. Baumann: It refers to Christ.

Miss Hannah: The whole chapter seems to me to be awfully influenced by his being a parson's son.

Prof. Jung: So is the whole of Zarathustra. There is a great deal of Protestant psychology in it, but we are now only concerned with the title.

Mrs. Baynes: I think he draws the title from the thing that we see in the rationalistic mind and what he goes on to describe; that is to say, he has lust which he cannot justify, and so he tries to take the blood from the lust, and what is left is the pale criminal.

Prof. Jung: That is pretty complicated. How does he arrive at the subject matter of crime or the criminal? It must follow from the chapter before and I want to make the transition.

Miss Wolff: Because the virtues are fighting like hell and murdering themselves. The idea of murder and bloodshed is at the end of the last chapter. The virtues kill man, trying to create the Superman out of the ordinary man.

Prof. Jung: That is true. But I might put that same question in a somewhat different way. Usually in a work of this kind, written out of the blood or out of the unconscious, as we say, it is written out of that which has been left over from the preceding chapter, the preceding image. You see, each of these chapters corresponds to an image. The stream of the unconscious is a stream of images. In one chapter comes up one image, and in the next another, and all these images are connected as, for instance, the images of the I Ching are connected. There you have the same stream of images, not connected by what we would call causality, but by an irrational connection. What is its chief characteristic?

Miss Wolff: The opposites.

Prof. Jung: Yes, the enantiodromia, the opposite comes up. Now in this case, quite superficially looked at, the opposite of the virtues we are speaking of would be vices. In the preceding chapter man is supposed to name his virtues and to live them to the utmost until he himself is killed by them; he lives his virtues until he is thoroughly virtuous, and he ends in terrible trouble because he is virtuous all over. Even his vices have been transformed into virtues, or they have been overlooked, or neglected; out of his many virtues he made a god, and out of his poison he made a medicine or something sweet. So the shadow is transformed into light and he dies really from sheer goodness. And when the vicious evil way of living, the way of the shadow, is entirely neglected, up it comes in the next chapter. Like dreams—what you have forgotten in the daytime is brought up in the night. And here is the thing that is forgotten, that should be also realized.

Mrs. Baumann: You did not read the end of my question about Christ. Christ said, “Resist not evil.” He was conscious of the black side.

Prof. Jung: I did not read it on purpose because it is a different consideration of which we shall speak after this chapter. Of course, Christ says “Resist not evil” because it is too one-sided to be only good. It is very nice to be only good if one can, and it is enough of a task, sure enough.

Mrs. Baynes: You have explained why it should be the criminal but not why it is the pale criminal.

Prof. Jung: Yes, one can be a rosy criminal! This is a criminal who does not feel well in his skin.

Mrs. Baynes: But “pale” is very important is it not?

Prof. Jung: This man cannot help being pale; he gets pale at the aspect of himself. But that leads to the next chapters. Let us assume now that we don’t quite understand why this criminal is pale and unhealthy-looking. We will begin.

Ye do not mean to slay, ye judges and sacrificers, until the animal hath bowed its head?

The German text is a bit different here. Nietzsche had profound philological knowledge, and by this nodding or bowing is meant the movement which is called in Latin numen, meaning a hint; nodding the head would be a hint or a sign. When you have whispered into the ear of the god and remain before his divine image, then you suddenly see that the god, the statue, is nodding. He has heard you and agrees or disagrees: that is the numen. One observes such phenomena in studying fantasies; when you concentrate upon, betrachten, a fantasy image, after a while it begins to walk perhaps. You have made it pregnant with your life and it moves, just as when you concentrate upon a picture with exclusive interest, it begins to move. Numen is one connotation of the divine power, the assent of the god. So this German text means that the judges and sacrificers don’t want to sacrifice or to kill before the animal has nodded—given its assent or justified the killing. The translation overlooked that meaning; of course it is a bit involved.

Lo! the pale criminal hath bowed his head: out of his eye speaketh the great contempt.

“Mine ego is something which is to be surpassed: mine ego is to me the great contempt of man”; so speaketh it out of that eye.

How is that passage connected with the chapter before? We can see then how the unconscious introduces the idea of the criminal.

Dr. Schlegel: In both these is something that must be surmounted.

Prof. Jung: Yes. The end of the chapter before is, "and therefore shalt thou love thy virtues, for thou wilt succumb by them." The idea is that you should love your virtues because they will eventually kill you, will mean your own undoing. For instance, a criminal shows by his crime his will to destroy himself. He has committed murder so he will be judged and his head will be cut off, and that is what he wanted. Moreover, when a person murders, he has murdered himself morally, which is of course just as bad as real death. He has had the courage to rebel against human life, and therefore the idea here is that judges and sacrificers should not be afraid of standing up against human life; he almost says they should not wait until the animal has nodded its assent, they should be as courageous as the criminal in killing. As the criminal does not ask whether the victim consents to being put to death, does not say to his victim, "Perhaps you will be kind enough to allow me to kill you," so those judges and sacrificers should not be afraid of killing right on the spot, with no delay, not asking whether it is fitting or just. They should have the same quality of decision and the contempt of life and of man which the criminal has. Of course this does not agree with our ideas of justice in the least, but it agrees very much with our psychological ideas of punishment.

The natural idea of punishment if a man has committed a murder is to hang him, kill him; then we are satisfied. That is the only real theory of punishment, any other is nonsense. You see, when a man commits murder, he has the advantage of us, because we have all wanted to do that. Once at least, in a moment of affect, everybody has wanted to murder his fellow man, but he could not because he was decent. And then comes that hell of a fellow who dares, and why should he do it when I couldn't? We are all potential murderers. Of course it does not need to be a cowardly murder, it can be straightforward manslaughter. Our ancestors have universally been murderers—it was even a virtue to commit murder in that way—so it is innate in us: it is in our blood. But we have not been allowed to do so because it is immoral. Therefore we say rightly, if another man has committed murder, we also have a right to do it. But he is one and we are many, so we must do it in collectivity; we call it "law": we elect one member of our society and give him a sword to hack off the criminal's head. Then we are all pleased; now his head has been cut off and we are highly satisfied. So everybody has got at least his sprinkling of blood for his own salvation. It gives people a fine feeling to have committed a certain amount of crime. That is the psychology of crime, and any other way is just a rationalization of this very primitive fact.

I can substantiate it by a very real example. In the Celebes it is the custom to kill prisoners of war in the ghost house. This is used for all sorts of purposes, it is a condensation of all the buildings round the square in a village; the church, and one or two little inns, with the names of the Evangelist animals if possible, and the mayor's place, which usually is connected with the house for the fire engine, and the morgue where they put all the corpses they find, and also the communal prison. This whole assemblage of establishments in a primitive society is condensed into one building which is not only the ghost house, the place of initiation, but also the guesthouse, the community building, the club house, and the morgue. And there they fasten the prisoner of war to a pillar round the top of which are hung skulls of former victims, a sort of ghost pillar. Then the whole crowd arms itself with knives or spears or arrows, and each sticks his knife into the victim a bit and then licks the blood, so finally the victim dies. Everybody has had a taste of the blood, it is a sort of communion, a very gruesome thing naturally.

The original idea was that putting to death should be a communion of the whole people, that they should all share in it; it was establishing a sort of connection between people through a common emotion. Since they have no such chance now, they must read detective stories, or go to the movies; they must be thrilled by accounts of ugly crimes. Also they must at times be very enthusiastic about a war because they have seen too little killing. The psychology of killing is the psychology of the criminal, so there are even murderers who want to be put to death and are not satisfied if they are not. In certain murderers there is a sacrificial psychology; they thus feel their importance over people. All that is in the death of Christ; he was counted as a criminal and crucified between two thieves and in place of a thief. He was exchanged against Barabbas who was freed as the fertility god of the coming year, according to the old rites. So Christ was very much in the place of the criminal, he was the god of the past year that is crucified for the good of the community.

LECTURE I

8 May 1935

Prof. Jung:

We had just begun last term, the chapter called “The Pale Criminal”; I think we dealt with only the first two verses. This is not a particularly engaging chapter—even disagreeable. I will read it beginning with the third verse:

When he judged himself—that was his supreme moment; let not the exalted one relapse again into his low estate!

There is no salvation for him who thus suffereth from himself, unless it be speedy death.

Your slaying, ye judges, shall be pity, and not revenge; and in that ye slay, see to it that ye yourselves justify life!

It is not enough that ye should reconcile with him whom ye slay. Let your sorrow be love to the Superman: thus will ye justify your own survival!

“Enemy” shall ye say but not “villain,” “invalid” shall ye say but not “wretch,” “fool” shall ye say but not “sinner.”

And thou, red judge, if thou would say audibly all thou hast done in thought, then would every one cry: “Away with the nastiness and the virulent reptile!”

But one thing is the thought, another thing is the deed, and another thing is the idea of the deed. The wheel of causality doth not roll between them. [That is an awful sentence!]

An idea made this man pale. Adequate was he for his deed when he did it, but the idea of it, he could not endure when it was done.

Evermore did he now see himself as the doer of one deed. Madness, I call this: the exception reversed itself to the rule in him.

The streak of chalk bewitcheth the hen; the stroke he struck bewitched his weak reason. Madness after the deed, I call this.

Hearken, ye judges! There is another madness besides, and it is before the deed. Ah! ye have not gone deep enough into this soul!

Thus speaketh the red judge: "Why did this criminal commit murder? He meant to rob." I tell you, however, that his soul wanted blood, not booty: he thirsted for the happiness of the knife!

But this weak reason understood not this madness, and it persuaded him, "What matter about blood!" it said; "wishest thou not, at least, to make booty thereby? Or take revenge?"

And he hearkened unto his weak reason: like lead lay its words upon him—thereupon he robbed when he murdered. He did not mean to be ashamed of his madness.

And now once more lieth the lead of his guilt upon him, and once more is his weak reason so benumbed, so paralysed, and so dull.

Could he only shake his head, then would his burden roll off; but who shaketh that head?

What is this man? A mass of diseases that reach out into the world through the spirit; there they want to get their prey.

What is this man? A coil of wild serpents that are seldom at peace among themselves—so they go forth apart and seek prey in the world.

Look at that poor body! What it suffered and craved, the poor soul interpreted to itself—it interpreted it as murderous desire, and eagerness for the happiness of the knife.

Him who now turneth sick, the evil overtaketh which is now the evil: he seeketh to cause pain with that which causeth him pain. But there have been other ages, and another evil and good.

Once was doubt evil, and the will to Self. Then the invalid became a heretic or sorcerer; as heretic or sorcerer he suffered, and sought to cause suffering.

But this will not enter your ears; it hurteth your good people, ye tell me. But what doth it matter to me about your good people!

Many things in your good people cause me disgust, and verily, not their evil. I would that they had a madness by which they succumbed, like this pale criminal!

Verily, I would that their madness were called truth, or fidelity, or justice: but they have their virtue in order to live long, and in wretched self-complacency.

I am a railing alongside the torrent; whoever is able to grasp me may grasp me! Your crutch, however, I am not.—

Thus spake Zarathustra.

What is your general impression of this chapter? Do you like it? Does your heart react to it?

Mrs. Sigg: It is very deep and interesting and extremely difficult.

Prof. Jung: You seem to be chiefly attracted by the intellectual intricacies, then. Is there no man here who has an opinion on this chapter—a man who realizes his feelings independently? Or perhaps an independent woman's mind with a heart attached to it?

Mrs. Fierz: I don't know whether I am independent, but I think it shows very much what I often feel about Zarathustra. I did not read it ahead, not a line, because I could not; this, especially, is a chapter where I simply stop if you don't do the whole work beforehand to help me to get into it a little.

Prof. Jung: Yes, exactly my feeling. It is exceedingly disgusting to my feeling. Excuse me for talking of my feeling condition, but in this case you simply go astray if you don't realize your feelings. From an intellectual point of view, it is unspeakably intricate; a sort of intellectual devil is all over, which will come still more to the foreground in a chapter a bit further on. Here Nietzsche really becomes an intellectual criminal. That is the disgusting thing—he reaches here one of the pre-stages of his own madness. It is not yet madness, but it becomes as sophisticated, as intricate, as madness when it first begins to insinuate itself. Therefore, my idea is that a natural feeling function, as well as a natural untwisted mind, will be hurt by the special psychology here. It is thoroughly evil from any aspect. You are stopped dead when you begin to read it. Your feeling refuses to touch upon that thing because it is altogether too pathological. No wonder that he speaks of the secret thoughts of the red judges as a poisonous worm, because a poisonous worm is at work here. You see, you have to deal with a man who is doomed to madness, preparing himself for it; Zarathustra, under a certain aspect, is the preparation for madness, the way into it. If a man is really going to be mad, in this way he will land there. And if a sound man goes this way, he will learn what madness means, something of the possibilities, because he will go very close to the edge. Here, Nietzsche is flirting with it. He reaches over into the forbidden land, and he is scorched, tainted all over, by touching upon that area. So it is necessary to overcome a certain resistance in dealing with this material.

You see, each chapter of Zarathustra is a stage in a process of initiation, for whenever a man takes that way of the immediate experience of his inner condition, he gets more and more under its influence and thus he becomes initiated. That is the initiation process, as it always has been. Of course later, as has happened in all traditional initiation processes, there comes a moment when the original experience is lost and then one is confronted only with ritual—with certain ideas that have become dogmatic or almost dogmatic. One looks back and thinks of the experiences of the forefathers—the gurus, the teachers—and one naturally tries to pick up what they have left behind them. One thinks if one imitates these relics that one is surely going to make the same way, forgetting altogether that they are now only shackles—what they used to call scoria. We imagine, when we follow the words or images, the symbols left by others, that we are making a way. But we are only imitating a way, and it is not the thing itself. The thing itself is an immediate primordial experience, and therefore it is always individual. We still have traditions or such initiation processes; they are to be found in no books of course, but one comes across series of individual symbols in the great libraries of Europe. In the higher grades of Freemasonry, the so-called ancient and accepted rite of Scotland which has thirty-three degrees, the initiation process is codified, dogmatized; one is told what to do, what to think and believe, and the whole thing is just flat and empty. It is most interesting, but it is too good to be true—well, it is true, but nobody is in it. It is quite hollow. It is only form and as dead as a door-nail. And this organization, which dates back probably to about the seventeenth century, was preceded by another stage of which we still have traces. I myself have a series of manuscripts and books of symbolic representations copied from those in the Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal in Paris. They came from noble families whose male members were officers in the army and belonged to secret societies where such initiations took place. But these books date from a time when the initiations were not according to the rule. They were individual, therefore they made books, like the symbolic series of visions of the American woman which I produced in a former Seminar.<sup>1</sup> That was such a secret individual initiation process. And those knights, or whatever they were, made very similar books; some of them consisted not even of words but were picture-books only, in which the processes of psychological transformation in an individual nature were depicted. But no book is really understood, no book resembles any other; of course, they have the style of the time, as our symbolic books have the style of our time, but they are individual in themselves. Later on, those things were replaced by codified dogma, and then the spirit was gone. They were no longer alive.

Now, Nietzsche's Zarathustra is one of the first attempts in modern times to come back to the immediate, individual initiation. But he did not seek that. It took him, rather, by the neck: he was overcome by the process because the time was ripe and he was just the kind of man who was open to such a thing. It really began at the height of that period of blooming materialism, and he, being an exceedingly sensitive individual, realized the need of the time, feeling that our traditional forms had become more or less empty. He himself moved in those academic circles where spiritual life was utterly gone. He naturally felt the need of something—there was nothing for him to stand on—so he was forced to have individual experience, and this came about in the moment when he said to himself, “God is dead,” as he says in Zarathustra. The spirit gripped him in that moment when it was completely denied. For it is just then that the spirit cannot be hidden any longer. If you believe that there is spirit in a certain form, in a building or a saying for instance, then the spirit has an abode. Then it is cut away from yourself because it is embodied in something. But when you believe there is no such thing as spirit anywhere, you have disinfected the heavens and the whole world and found no God in it as that doctor said (whom I have told you about) who suffered from the same disease as Nietzsche. You see, as soon as you make such a declaration, the spirit is liberated from its incarnations and then it is in yourself: then your unconscious begins to stir. That happened to Nietzsche. His initiation process began, and he wrote it down as such a man would do.

When one has a vivid inner experience, one always feels tempted to write it down, give form to it and expression. Therefore, painting and drawing have been discovered as a means for the symbolic purposes; one simply feels the need, and also has a peculiar satisfaction if one succeeds in giving expression to an inner experience. Many people who are not usually poets begin to write verses, and they write in a peculiar hieratic style. They become solemn and poetic and express themselves in a high passionate manner, using all sorts of means to emphasize it because they feel they are experiencing something which needs that expression. So Nietzsche at once drops out of his intellectual, aphoristic way of expression. Zarathustra is a most passionate confession from beginning to end, and moreover it is an experience: his life itself flows into these chapters. Therefore, each chapter is a new image in the process of initiation. You know, those ancient initiation processes consisted of symbolic passages. First, one is confronted, say, with a certain threat, or one is put into a dark room perhaps; and then one is exposed to all sorts of dangers, tests of courage are made—one must endure cold and heat and all sorts of things. Those are all symbolic stages, imitating the processes one would presumably go through in an individual initiation. These were all individual in the beginning, and from the condensation of the original representations, slowly a ritual was made; and then it all became artificial. The most ridiculous forms were invented which nobody could take seriously. For instance, in the Freemason initiation, one is put through tests which look a bit gruesome, but are not real at all. It is like a sort of child's play. Of course, one is serious, or tries to make it serious, but it is not: it doesn't even touch your skin. Wilhelm<sup>2</sup> told me that when the Japanese bombarded Kian Tchau, a Masonic lodge was hit by a shell and éventré, the whole wall of the house came down, the intestines were laid bare, and people went there to see the funny things inside. Belonging to the initiation ceremonies, for example, was a sort of grating with most dangerous-looking iron spikes upon which the initiate had to kneel, and then the marvel happened that when he believed in God those spikes did not hurt him. But upon examination it was found that those spikes where he had to kneel looked exactly like the others but were made of rubber; they were nice and soft, so instead of having his flesh lacerated, the initiate thought, how marvelous that God had helped him! So the initiation may degenerate into mere fraud.

The individual process on the other side is not a fraud, but a terrible thing. Nietzsche is confronted with all the devils, the temptations of his own nature, all the lowest as well as the highest qualities of man, the greatest possibilities of the depths as well as the heights. Now, there is a secret logic, a sort of Homeric chain, going through the whole thing: one chapter leads on to the other.<sup>3</sup> The last chapter before this was "Joys and Passions." To follow the way of delights and passions is the way to the Superman; but it leads to the pale criminal, an inelegant, pale criminal who cannot commit his crime without having an idea of it at which he collapses. That is the pale criminal and as such that term has entered the common speech; one reads it in books and papers, meaning a man who is not on the level of his deed. Now you can be sure, if a man as unsound as Nietzsche comes into that layer of his personality which is meant to bring about his madness, that you will come into something which is surely not very engaging; it is something which hurts and cannot be accepted because it is against our sound in-instincts. But this is just the chapter where a man of unsound mind, on the other hand, would be touched or tempted.

I remember a fellow student of mine who was an exceedingly gifted man, but the first thing I noticed about him was that, in reading Nietzsche, the chapter over which he fell down was "The Pale Criminal." It was all the time on his mind and he never got away from it, "What a wonderful chapter—that a man should sacrifice his life even for his crime!" He identified with the pale criminal, and the result was that later on he became insane too—not of course because he had read Nietzsche, but because he himself was doomed to become insane. He never succeeded in life because he was altogether too pathological. But as a student, everybody expected him to have a rather remarkable career: he began in a more or less grand style.<sup>4</sup> Soon he made himself impossible, however, because his delights and passions carried him too far. He lost sight of humanity and developed paranoia, which is the idea of persecution, the idea that everybody hates one, the reality being that one runs away from people. But in the sound part of such a man there is still the yearning for connection with humanity, and those ideas of persecution develop as a compensation for the fact of running away from them. All those people who feel persecuted and unrelated are suffering from a minor form of paranoia: to feel observed, to have the feeling of awkwardness and to be gêné in society, but unable to give themselves because they are inhibited by other people. This is the mildest form of it. Such people don't love others. As a matter of fact they hate them and they try to avoid them, and if that thing grows upon them, they will develop ideas of persecution.

Now, the fact that Nietzsche, after the chapter about "Delights and Passions," arrives at the chapter or the stage of "The Pale Criminal" is not abnormal in itself, but perfectly normal; for if one follows the path of passion one will surely come to the place where one's passion becomes abnormal, asocial or criminal, and that is a quality which is in everybody. Therefore, one says, principiis obsta,<sup>5</sup> resist delights and passions, resist in the beginning before it is too late, don't have passions, it is not good taste, it is bad form. The deeper reason is that if one slips too far into such flames, one is sure to land in criminality. But how can you live and have no passion—for then you would escape suffering?

(Passio also means suffering. The German word is Leidenschaft; as a poet says: Leidenschaft ist das, was Leiden schafft.)<sup>6</sup> Nobody can escape suffering, and to try to escape passion is to try to escape suffering. But as you cannot escape suffering you cannot escape passion; you will suffer from passion either directly or indirectly, and it is much better to suffer directly because indirect suffering has no merit. It is exactly as if nothing has happened. So the indirect suffering in a neurosis has no moral merit. Years lost in neurosis are just lost, without gain. But if you suffer directly and you know for what you suffer, that is never lost. Therefore, Christ said that if you know what you are doing you are blessed, but if you don't know you are cursed.<sup>7</sup> For then it is a neurosis. So, arriving at the Pale Criminal is perfectly normal, but the way in which one deals with the Pale Criminal is of course the test of soundness or unsoundness. Now here, Nietzsche is dealing with it in his own very peculiar way.

I think we will go on through the different items and try to make sense of this chapter:

When he judged himself—that was his supreme moment; let not the exalted one relapse again into his low estate!

You see, in doing his deed, in committing his crime, he made himself a criminal, and that is what he meant to do because he was a criminal; he was meant to be a criminal. Thus far that is perfectly sound, provided that he knows what he does. But there is the difficulty. If he is a criminal without knowing it, simply doing his deed like an animal, he has absolutely no chance of redemption; but if he knows what he does, there is a possibility, for he is then simply fulfilling his role. For instance, a good man will do a good deed. He will be forced to be good and feel utterly miserable if he isn't; so there is no merit in it. He is just doing what he is, all quite natural, like an animal. It is very good of the bees to make the honey we eat, one might say, and when they sting us it is very bad, but in either case they have done it unconsciously and there is no merit in it. But if the man knows he is doing a good thing just because he cannot do otherwise, then there is merit because he is then conscious of that saying of wisdom: The king shall play the role of the king, the beggar the role of the beggar, and the thief the role of the thief, being conscious of the gods. This means being conscious of their role, of Karma, the necessity that the one must play the role of the king because he is born a king, and the other the role of the beggar because he is born a beggar, and if another man is born the villain of the play, he needs must be that villain. Yet if he knows that this is all from the gods, there must be redemption. That is Hindu philosophy, which simply shows that the condition of redemption is in being conscious of what you do. And from that point of view it is just as bad to be good without knowing it as to be bad without knowing it: neither way has merit; the only chance for redemption is in consciousness, for that is the point where one differs from what one does, where one differs from being a mere animal. So it is a sublime moment here. He should not fall below it by judging himself, provided he knows what he is doing.<sup>8</sup>

There is no salvation for him who thus suffereth from himself, unless it be a speedy death.

That is not the salvation that I would designate as redemption, of course. Nietzsche means here that he is committing his crime in order to reach death; the lust for murder, the greed for the blood, is simply the preparation for death. Therefore, he says, it is the madness before the deed. The murderer wants to see blood, as if he knew that committing murder meant his own death. He is seeking to end his existence because—as the text afterwards says—he is nothing but a mass of diseases, a coil of wild serpents which can only wind up in its own destruction. So the Pale Criminal is in that respect the symbol for the man who must end his existence because he is no good—in order to make room for the Superman. That was the point which caught my fellow student, but at the same time he was identified with the Superman, like Nietzsche. He was always talking about committing suicide. He felt that if it were necessary in order to make room for the Superman, he would do so without hesitation. He played with such ideas; he removed himself. So he committed a moral suicide, becoming so much a Superman that he could no longer deal with ordinary mortals and the result was that fear of persecution. You see, if the criminal knows in committing his crime that he really means his own undoing, that he commits the crime in order to kill himself, then one can only agree; he most certainly will commit his crime, nobody can prevent him, and if he knows that he is thereby killing himself it is all right. One judges a crime differently when the murderer immediately afterwards kills himself too: one has the feeling that he has judged himself and sentenced himself to death. If the murdered is also put out of life, it is satisfactory.

But if we begin to think it over and ask what is the use of putting him to death, we can make frightful mistakes, errors of justice. To think of the moral side, that we should improve the criminal, is nonsense. That is all trash, having nothing to do with justice. It is just to put the criminal to death because we are in his crime too; everyone of us contains a criminal who wants to commit crimes though we don't know it. Our criminal is terribly disappointed. In sleepless nights he complains that we don't give him a chance. Then we read in the paper about somebody who has committed murder and we think, "What an insolent devil! He has smashed a man's head. He can do what I wanted to do, having taken the liberty to commit that crime." Our criminal instincts are all roused and we must have our revenge, something must be done against him. And as it is impossible for all the 350,000 inhabitants of the town of Zürich, for instance, to kill one man, we choose a judge, but we are so unreasonable that we don't even have a hangman in Zürich. In England they are reasonable enough to choose a hangman who is entrusted with the public sentiment: he must take care of the criminal instincts of the whole town. When he has put that man to death, we have had our share in the crime. And that is right. Otherwise, we are simply frustrated. Instead of trying to improve that man, hang him. Our criminal instinct is not satisfied by this damned reasonableness, so we get bitter and poisonous and more and more reasonable, but we are really just waiting for the time when we can take a revolver and kill; we are waiting for an age of revolution, for an age of cruelty. So it would be much better if we could begin at the beginning and put the criminal to death by public execution; it doesn't make us any more cruel than we are already.

Look at the things that happen in the world! The amount of quite open cruelty is incredible. One reads about in in the papers. Yet we still go on believing that we are growing better and better every day and in every way until we shall arrive in heaven. But we are in hell, and I tell you, if in our most reasonable town we had some juicy shooting, people would feel grand. I saw a policeman a while ago in the country, a perfectly harmless fellow, who said, "But just wait till the next time I get at a machine-gun!" He promises himself a marvelous feast. And that is so everywhere. Only a few fools believe that we are growing better and better every day, hoping that we are improved by improving a few criminals. We are not improved by it and we shall not improve the criminals. That is a bad mistake, because the murderer has murdered himself already long before we cut his head off.

Well, the good admonitions and good counsel here are not very important. The only thing which is revelant would be that sentence, "Let your sorrow be love to the Superman: thus will ye justify your own survival." He obviously means that our guiding or leading idea should be the Superman, and the criminal who is a mass of disease, etc., ought to be done away with, to make room for him. The criminal simply has to perish: that man is no good, he is a bad mixture, and the judge will justify his own survival by having the courage to do away with him. But people say that should not be done! How awful! Or, it should be done in a moral way! But how can I say that somebody else ought to be improved? I have absolutely no stand. I know what filth I am. I know my own thoughts. I have absolutely no point of view. How can an ant say of another ant that it should be improved as an ant? They are all ants.

Mr. Baumann: From the biological aspect, every kind of animal, man or ant, has the tendency to make his own race strong and surviving over the others. So I think there is a certain instinct to improve man for man and ant for ant.

Prof. Jung: But no animal has a tendency to improve another animal. That is again a well-meaning raisonnement which we make from a biological point of view. A biological justification for punishment is just as wrong as a moral idea about it, for if you follow your biological idea of punishment, you must punish a degenerate thief as much as a murderer because he is a degenerate individual; you would cut off the heads of all sorts of little frauds, pickpockets, etc., and your feeling would not back you up in that at all. You would say they needed a good thrashing, or to be put in a prison for a fortnight, or something else disagreeable, but not to be put to death. But from a biological point of view, you have to put him to death, and with him, imbeciles and lunatics and people with bodily diseases or anybody equally incapacitated.

Mrs. Jung: What you have said seems to me to refer only to a criminal who would be, as an individual, a criminal, but I think most people who commit a crime do it out of a sort of mistake. They do things which are not really individual.

Prof. Jung: Well, Nietzsche is speaking of such people. He doesn't look at the problem from the standpoint of individuation. To him, the criminal is a man who has gone astray, say a fool or a diseased individual who ought to be done away with, so there is no question of consciousness of crime or of the problem of individuation in the criminal. He doesn't even mention it.

Mrs. Jung: But you say he must only be improved when it is proved that he has got to be a criminal. But with many people it is not proved that they have to be criminals; it is quite unconscious what they have to be.

Prof. Jung: Sure enough, if they were not unconscious there would be a redeeming factor; as a matter of fact they are so identical with what they do that they do not know what happens to them.

Mrs. Jung: And therefore they could be improved.

Prof. Jung: That is a question, As soon as one begins to reason about the possible arguments in favor of capital punishment, one simply loses oneself in a maze of considerations and can do nothing. So the simplest thing would be to react according to feeling; then you do something which is perfectly proper and sufficient, except for the intellectual who wants to have proper reasons. You see, what the crime is for the criminal, whether he can be improved or whether, by committing his crime outside himself, killing somebody else, he has done evil to himself, selling his own chance. Those are considerations for the criminal and we are not speaking of his psychology, but of the psychology of Nietzsche versus his own instincts. The criminal is only a sort of mirror reflex of the criminal impetus of Nietzsche. I speak of the criminal in this frame and not of the psychology of this individual criminal—merely of the social aspect of this individual. If I have to deal with the criminal individual then I shall consider the case just as any other. For instance, every case I am treating has a criminal in himself. If one goes far enough, everybody has done something or is planning to do something which is not right, which is criminal; and there we have to observe all the rules of the game, exactly as in any other case. But inasmuch as murderers don't come into my analysis I cannot talk about the possible analysis of a murderer. I also cannot say that all murderers should be analysed, as I cannot say that all neurotics should be analysed. For there are certain social considerations over which I am not a lord, and I never make rules that would be good for humanity, particularly if nobody is very likely to carry them out. They kill murderers in France, in Italy, in England, in America, in Germany, and in most Catholic cantons of Switzerland; only a few very enlightened and reasonable communities have gone astray so far as not to kill murderers. I am not speaking of our Christianity—that point of view is not valid at all, only talk; I go by facts, and the fact is that capital punishment is valid in nearly all the most enlightened and civilized countries, and I am not against it. There is a very good reason why it is so. All other ways of punishment are wrong.

By putting the criminal to death, one shares the crime; otherwise, one doesn't see the criminal in oneself. One must see one's criminal point: if one does not, one has not shared the criminal impetus, the criminal personality in oneself. And then one never becomes integrated. The purpose of individuation is that every part of the individual must be integrated, also the criminal part; otherwise, it is left by itself and works evil. So thus far Nietzsche is giving recognition to the criminal instincts. For instance, the "red judge" is his own moral function naturally, which might call his criminal instinct by all sorts of bad names: he might say this is perhaps a foolish or pathological tendency. It is, but it is not to be judged from a moral point of view because that is not helpful. It does not help to say a thing is bad or good. To say it is bad helps least the thing which is the most important, namely, that one can accept the bad thing. You see, when we accept it there is a chance that something can change, but we never accept it. We can improve only when we accept what is part of ourselves. Then we can change, not before.

Now he comes to the explanation of the Pale Criminal; hitherto he speaks simply of the criminal. The paleness comes from the fact that the man was made pale by an idea; he begins to think over what he has done, and he gives it a name. You remember we came across this idea before; it was represented as a particular mistake to give a name to your virtues. Of course, unavoidably you will do so; you don't live your virtues simply as the recognition of an indescribable something about yourself which has value, but say it is this or that, and so you give it a name and make it exclusive and cause trouble—quarrels, conflicts between duties and between virtues. While if you have not given it a name, you will have retained the value. So you cause a conflict by giving names, but one cannot see how to do otherwise.

The criminal has to give it a name, then. He adopts an idea about his deed and says he has done so and so, and then cannot stand it because he sees himself with ten thousand pairs of eyes. For a name is a collective thing, a word in everybody's mouth. He has heard that word from ten thousand other mouths already; when he says to himself that he has committed a murder, he sees it in printed letters in the newspaper, and what he has done is just that awful thing which is called murder. While if he did not give it a name, it would have remained his individual deed, his individual experience, which is not expressed by the collective noun murder. Such a criminal usually says: "I just beat him over the head, or "I put a knife into him," or "I wanted to tell him something and I put a bullet into him, and afterwards they said he was dead." You see, it was an individual series of events which were not named. Even the premeditated murder is very often accounted for in such a way: "I simply had to give that fellow something to make him quiet because I wanted to get at such and such a thing; naturally I had to shove him aside. And then it turned out that he was dead." That is the way such people use a revolver—as a means to change something. It is a sort of aftereffect or a concomitant circumstance that a corpse was left. How awkward! That it is murder only dawns upon them a long time afterwards when they are told. Then they realize it and get pale, but as long as somebody simply has been removed, well, it was awkward that he was found afterwards with a fractured skull, but that does not make one pale: it is simply regrettable. People who commit a fraud invariably explain that they just wanted to do this or that. They are quite astonished when they are told that they have committed a crime, because they only did it for a certain effect and never thought that it had such an ugly name. So the pale criminal is really slain by his own idea of it, though it is not exactly his own, but is now the standpoint of the eleven thousand virgins who are flabbergasted. Nietzsche calls this a sort of madness: the criminal's weak intellect has been overthrown by a mere word. That is the madness after the deed. Now what is this line of chalk which paralyzes the hen in the text?

Mrs. Baynes: There is an old wives' tale that a hen will not cross over a chalk line.

Prof. Jung: That comes from the fact that Athanasius Kircher, a Jesuit living in the beginning of the seventeenth century, made the first hypnotic experiment by hypnotizing hens.<sup>9</sup> We repeated that experiment once. You take a hen very carefully so that it doesn't get excited, and you put it down slowly and softly, holding her head down for a while to the floor, and then you make a chalk line over the beak and on the floor, so that it looks as if it were a white ribbon over her nose—of course, that is not necessary, but is only to blind other people—and the hen remains there. You can hypnotize monkeys and dogs in the same way: you must impress them for a while with the idea that they cannot move. That hen stretched out with the line over its beak looks very funny, as if it were glued to the floor by the white line—an experimentum mirabile!

Now he says that there is another madness, the madness before the deed; that is the question of the cause of the crime. He says that it is a general prejudice that one commits a murder for a certain purpose, in order to rob for instance, but that it is really madness, that the murder has been committed for the sake of the blood. This is of course an unconscious truth. Consciously, each murderer considers his murder as a by-product. Perhaps in very wild crimes of affect people cry for blood and want to kill, yet it is not quite real; they are always astonished that it worked. They wanted to demonstrate murder and then it happened to be murder. The ordinary psychology is that murder is more or less a by-product. But in the unconscious, as Nietzsche understands it, it is really murder, the thirst for blood, and it means the undoing of the criminal himself if he understands himself rightly. He therefore prefers the rational explanation that it was for robbery. Otherwise, he must admit that he is caught and he cannot admit that, because to have done it for the sake of blood is madness; he prefers the sort of superficial motive of robbery and so he lies, on top of all the rest. "Could he only shake his head, then would his burden roll off": if he only would not think such rubbish he would not be burdened.

Then Nietzsche asks what the criminal is, after all. He is a mass of diseases, a coil of serpents. For such an individual is terribly pained and tortured really and therefore he commits a crime; nobody causes pain to another person unless he himself suffers pain. As a rule only such people torture or hurt who are hurt or tortured themselves; they want to relieve themselves from their own suffering by hurting somebody else, in order to feel that the pain is not inside themselves alone. You see, it is as if we were secretly threatened by the invisible presence of the criminal in ourselves, and then we wish that somebody might commit a crime so that we can say, "Ah thank heaven, there is the criminal, there is the evil." That explains somewhat why we love detective stories and the long reports of crimes in the newspapers; it is of the greatest interest to us to know where the evil is. We exclaim, "What an awful fellow!" We lap it up because we have hunger and thirst for such things; they fascinate us because we have an unsatisfied criminal instinct in ourselves. So the whole respectable community grows more and more uncanny; if nothing happens, everybody looks at everybody else with fear and hate. Are you the one who is going to relieve us? Am I the one to relieve the others? Am I the one who will set the ball rolling? Am I the one to kill? And then suddenly the news comes: somebody has committed murder. "Thank heaven!"

You see, a murderer is a sort of scapegoat for the community; it is as if each community should have a bouc émissaire<sup>10</sup> who was burdened with the sins of the community. Therefore, in the Orient they often had the very wise custom of making a murderer represent the sacrificed god, as they did in old Mexico for instance; then he was cut open afterwards, the living heart was cut out, and he was a god practically: he carried the sins of the community. That is the original psychology of the sacrificial death of Christ, of course. Therefore, Christ was crucified between the thieves. He was the murderer of the season, one could say; he was exchanged against Barabbas who was a real criminal. So he is the bouc émissaire and is killed as the criminal of the season, and thereby we are redeemed from our own sin. When the community puts the criminal to death, it is an act of redemption for the community, a sort of psychological alleviation. The criminal has a certain social role—this is not my idea, it was valid long before I lived—and therefore a real criminal has always been given the dignity of a sort of ritual in recognition of his merit; first a long trial with judges in wigs and gowns, and then the procession to the guillotine or the gallows with tambours and soldiers and a great crowd, and then he is executed. It seems, of course, absurd that we should worship in our churches just that kind of public execution, yet each crucifix carried that meaning. But we won't give that dignity to our criminals to whom we ought to be grateful for committing a crime instead of ourselves; they pay with their blood for our sins and we should give them a decent burial with soldiers and music, or at least tambours. Those ancient ways of burying the criminal took naively into account the great social importance of the crime as the atonement for the sins of the people.

Nietzsche also says here that other ages had other ideas of morality, etc., and that therefore one should not judge morally. But that is not very important—that the heretic and the witch were considered to be bad people in the Middle Ages and that nowadays they are just fashionable. Here again, however, we come to a good and sound idea—that the madness which precedes the crime might be named “truth” or “faithfulness” or “justice.” Those are virtues, mind you, so the madness of the belief in virtue is the madness which precedes crime. The idea is that if we believe in such ideals of virtue and if we identify with them—if somebody says he is faithful or just, for instance—that is the forerunner of crime, because to burden the scale of virtues makes the scale of <sup>10</sup> Emissary goat, scapegoat. Aztec sacrifice was not, strictly speaking, scapegoating but rather the furnishing of victims to the insatiable sun god who required blood to keep moving. vices rise: the scales have to be balanced. The more people think that they are good or identify with good, the more they leave evil alone, and as much as their good increases, unconsciously their evil will increase. So we leave it to somebody else. But we have already committed the crime in leaving our evil to other people, and we are not even grateful that they spare us. Nothing makes us more moral and self-righteous than when anybody is humble enough to be immoral. Then we say, "I am not like that, such things don't happen in our family." They have their virtue in order to live long in wretched self-complacency. That is, they simply misuse their faculty of being good, the grace they have of being good, in order to rescue themselves from life and to have a long life of despicable ease.

Then having said all this, in the end Nietzsche thinks obviously of his own role, and why he says such things, and he goes on, "I am a railing alongside the torrent; whoever is able to grasp me may grasp me! Your crutch, however, I am not." That is, he is a certain guidance along the torrent, but if you cannot walk, if you need a crutch, it would not do. It is a truth which takes the ground away from under your feet; you know where it leads but there is no stand. It is not a certainty. It does not help you to keep upright. It is tempting but undermining. And it is undermining: that is the purpose of this chapter.

LECTURE II

15 May 1935

Prof. Jung:

We have a question by Mrs. Baumann, "Is it au fait to deal with my question about Christ now? I cannot help feeling there is a catch somewhere about Christ being crucified by his virtues, because he did recognize evil by saying, 'Resist not evil,' and therefore I should think he was conscious of both extremes."

It is right to ask this question here, indeed almost inevitable, because the chapter about the pale criminal is part of that whole problem of virtue and evil; if you consider the good in man, you cannot help considering the evil too. And there is a catch, as you say, in the fact that Christ really never said that he had been crucified by his virtues: that is what medieval fantasy made of it—you remember I showed you a picture where he was being crucified by his virtues. It is a very curious idea, but that miniature in the medieval codex most certainly shows that it existed, and there is a good deal to say about such an idea. (We have already said a good deal about it.) So it is not a contradiction in the logia of Christ, because he never said that; from his point of view he never would have said it. You are quite right: he said, "Resist not evil." One must always make a difference between the logion, the actual word of the Lord himself as given in the tradition, and what people made of it. If one compares the teaching of the church with the original teaching of Christ himself, one sees that there is most certainly a great difference. Therefore, it is so difficult, really quite impossible, to have a Protestant church, for that can only be found upon the Word, the Bible; but the New Testament as well as the Old is so full of contradictions that it has no authority. Such an institution cannot be based upon those contradictory sayings.

So, the Catholic church is quite consistent in the point of view that the Holy Scriptures have no absolute authority because they were compiled a long time after the death of the Master by pupils of his disciples. They say that Christ is really the founder of the church, which is older than those sacred books. The Evangels of St. John or Matthew or Luke were not even written by the apostles themselves; the Greek text says katá, according to Matthew or Luke. Those reports were compiled by one or more people, who were presumably pupils at least of the evangelists, but it is quite questionable whether the Evangel of St. John was connected even so directly with the apostle. It is very possible that the Evangels have been compilations made in places like Asia Minor or Alexandria for the use of the Christian communities there. Moreover, it is a fact that in the first century the sacred books were considered only as good and useful literature for Christians to read, and never as infallible divine inspiration. Of course, the church has the memory of those days so they have put the Bible on the Index, and that is quite right because it is a tempting and contradictory collection of books with very dangerous teachings in them. The Pope reserves the right of the authentic interpretation; in his official position, according to the dogma of infallibility, he is infallible in his interpretation of the dogma. Also, the church, since it holds higher authority than the Scriptures, can make dogma; that gives a basis for an authoritative body. But the sayings of that institution do not necessarily agree with the teachings of Christ himself.

Then here is a question by Mrs. Baynes: "There seems to be a growing conviction in our world that it is heroic to murder for the sake of the cause one is serving, and lily-livered to be held back by the thought of what that means. Has the pathological element in Nietzsche's idea of the pale criminal helped to foster this point of view?"

Well, it is generally said that Nietzsche was at the bottom of the world war and the new revolution in Germany, and so on. Nietzsche himself would be highly astonished to hear such news. He surely never dreamt that he would be called the father of all this modern political evil. That really comes more from the misunderstanding to which Nietzsche is exposed. For he made one considerable mistake which of course would not be generally considered a mistake. But I call it a mistake that he ever published Zarathustra. That is a book which ought not to be published; it should be reserved for people who have undergone a very careful training in the psychology of the unconscious. Only then, having given evidence of not being overthrown by what the unconscious occasionally says, should people have access to the book. For in Zarathustra we have to deal with a partial revelation of the unconscious. It is full of inspiration, of the immediate manifestation of the unconscious, and therefore should be read with due preparation, with due knowledge of the style and the intentions of the unconscious. If a man reads Zarathustra unprepared, with all the naive presuppositions of our actual civilization, he must necessarily draw wrong conclusions as to the meaning of the "Superman," "the Blond Beast," "the Pale Criminal," and so on. And such people will surely draw such conclusions as murder-for-the-sake-of-the-cause. Many suicides have felt themselves justified by Zarathustra—as any damned nonsense can be justified by Zarathustra. So it is generally assumed that Nietzsche is at the bottom of a whole host of evils on account of his immoral teaching, while as a matter of fact, Nietzsche himself and his teaching are exceedingly moral, but only to people who really understand how to read it.

You see, it all depends upon what level one speaks from—whether one is talking on the level of the ordinary understanding or of an extraordinary understanding. Whatever you say on the normal level is understood by all the people who are on that level, but if you say something which really comes from a level underneath as if it belonged to the normal level, then it will be misunderstood. People will not realize that it comes from the layer below, and that in order to really understand it they themselves should be below. Of course that is very difficult, because we never reckon with such levels, but in dealing with a product like Zarathustra, we must consider this question.

In that connection there is something which I really must say here. The general idea is that through analysis one becomes conscious of certain contents which have been hidden in the unconscious hitherto for one reason or another. And in making these things conscious, you would represent the conscious on one line, and the personal unconscious on the line below, and then the collective unconscious below that. Now, if you bring some content from the personal unconscious up to the conscious level, say something you have repressed or more or less wilfully forgotten, then it would be just like anything else on the conscious level. For instance, say you are unconscious of the fact that you are very ambitious or that you have considerable will-to-power. You have believed hitherto that you were a sort of pious lamb with no particular ambition; then through certain experiences or through the benevolent teaching of analysis you become aware that you really have a will-to-power, and are not that pious lamb you were supposed to be. Thus you lift that will-to-power up to the conscious level and you handle it as something quite reasonable, for it is easy to believe that we are imperfect: it is not unheard of that we should have a certain ambition or sex fantasies or something dark like that. You see, the admixture of a bit of dark substance to our snow-white conscious innocence is not absurd; you can easily admit that you are of course not perfect, but are like everybody, a bit black somewhere. You can say that quite reasonably; being in human society, you can say it in the most respectable drawing room and even acquire a certain merit in doing so. They will think, "What an understanding man, how human—of course we are all a little bit black, you know!" So that is all right, above board; nothing bad has happened.

But you have omitted one fact: namely, you cannot lift up something from the unconscious without being just a bit lowered in consciousness; that thing has a certain weight. You see, you are floating like a ship or a bowl on that level above, but if you put a load into the ship, it goes down a little and then it remains at the slightly lower level. Of course reason would say, "Is it not nice and reasonable that he admits that he is not quite a saint?" You appreciate the person for admitting that he is not 100 percent pure gold. But you don't take into account that if the confession is real, that person is no longer floating on the white fleecy clouds of innocence but is a bit pulled down; inasmuch as the repressed content has come up, the person has gone down. Yet, he really believes that he has added to his whiteness by confessing his blackness—as most people believe—and then he naturally thinks, "I am better than ever before. I am quite different. I am such a nice lamb, and we love each other and there is no sin any more." Having confessed his sins, he thinks there is no longer any black in him. As in the Catholic church, you may have done a hell of a meanness, but if you confess it and repent, you get absolution. It is dealt with; it is non-arrivé, past: you are cured. You have made a sort of moral Couéism, ça passe, ça passe, and finally it has passed: it never has happened.<sup>1</sup>

They have a more modern form of confession in the Oxford Movement. To take a nice example: I go to the meeting where I am to be the leader for the day, and I confess that I have watched a girl in the opposite house quite by chance: I could not help seeing her as she undressed. Of course, I really remained glued to the window, even standing on the table in order to see her. Then I confess that I have had an impure fantasy and must share it with the members of the group. Yes of course—very human, very nice for him to say so! And I feel simply grand; it is rather detrimental to my self-respect, but by confessing it I share it with the people, and the mutual love will keep me afloat. I cannot help patting myself on the back for having been so honest and so generous in sharing the painful details of my little life. And then the meeting can begin. With radiant eyes they go about, absolutely redeemed, and sin has vanished from the world, and I have only made a slight mistake.

But they don't see that I am loading the ship, because if once I stood upon the table to see a girl undressing and had my pleasure there in watching such a performance, I am forever the man who has done it and it is unforgettable, I am not redeemed by confessing it. Yes, I can feel you are all the same damned fools that I am; you think you are all forgiven, but we are all a herd of fools. But I am never forgiven. Forever I am the one who has done it. I am characterized as such, have burdened my ship with that fact. Forever I shall carry that burden, and I must be careful not to climb too many tables at too many windows or my ship might go under in the end. Hell! What have I lived? A series of mean tricks. I am just an ordinary swine—the swine that always repented what he ate, the poor swine that could not even be a proper swine. One needs must come to that conclusion. Of course I have repented. That is all right, but nevertheless I have done those things. And so one might wake up to the understanding of one's life, and that would be fatal, because one will have seen that one's ship has gone under in spite of all confession and repentance. For by making something conscious one lowers the ship and it keeps on sinking down the more one puts into it.

Now, if you pull up something of the kind from the personal unconscious, you can say it is quite human, something that really could have been conscious; you can rationalize it, and it is not very visible considering that you put such a weight into the balance of your ship. But when you fetch something from the collective unconscious, it has a much greater weight, because it has come from much further down, for everything is in the place where it belongs according to its specific weight. What Nietzsche fetched up was the lead of the water region (according to the Secret of the Golden Flower),<sup>2</sup> and lead is the heaviest metal and therefore at the bottom of the collective unconscious. So put this in your boat and you will be pulled down into the collective unconscious. For when two points are in space, it is impossible that only the one attracts the other: both are attracted. If you lift up a stone from the earth and let it fall, in that moment you would say that the stone was falling and would not assume that the earth was rising; but as a matter of fact if that stone were as big as the moon or the earth itself, it would suddenly appear to you that the earth was attracted to the stone as much as the stone was attracted to the earth. So when you fetch up the lead of the water region, you will notice quite suddenly that your boat up in the bright regions of reason will be pulled down; you cannot get it up to the top because it is too heavy.

Therefore, we are quite reluctant to bring these heavy things up to the surface; we are afraid of pulling down our boat. It seems to be dangerous, too great a risk, and we avoid doing it. We have quite a natural instinct against being conscious of such things; even when it is a small cargo which our boat could easily carry; it is already too heavy. To be conscious of the fact that we steal or lie or have sexual fantasies would burden us too much. We had better keep unconscious of those facts; we want to be clear of them and remain floating in the region of the white clouds. Of course, the higher up you are, the more you lose your body, the more you lose yourself, the more unreal you become; and finally you are just a sort of smoke floating in the sky, and that is no human existence. So you are forced to overcome your unconscious, to make these things conscious; but inasmuch as you make them conscious your ship comes down further, and if you become acquainted with the collective unconscious, you are pulled even further under. You may still be laboring under the impression that you can lift something up to consciousness and that the level of your consciousness will not be affected, that on the contrary, it will be increased, improved—but that is an illusion; if you lift up those contents approaching the lead of the water region, your consciousness will go down. That is an inexorable fact which must be taken into consideration.

Of course it is the secret meaning of life, one could say, that the lead of the water region should be lifted up. For you must make gold of it; you must transform matter by penetrating it. If you don't penetrate space or time, you are still half born, still wandering about in the collective unconscious in a prenatal state. And then the real purpose of the unknown creator that is behind your existence has not come off; he wanted you to penetrate space and time in order to transform the lead, but you buried your talent and have not done it, and you fade away before you have accomplished anything. But if you can lift up the lead of the water region, you really fulfil the task; and whether your consciousness is on this level or that, or on a still deeper level, is relatively unimportant in comparison with the fulfilment of the task. Of course, the deeper down the level of consciousness goes, the more you are threatened by the unconscious, by becoming engulfed in the sea, and that should not be, for it means that you have gone under, the lead of the water region has overcome you and the experiment has not come off. But if you can just keep afloat, you have accomplished the task; then you will land somewhere in between. So the symbol of perfection, or the self in the human being, was to the old masters nothing volatile or light, but a stone or a metal. Therefore they say about the philosopher's stone, which is the symbol of the self, lapis est media res inter corpora perfecta et imperfecta: the lapis philosophorum is not the perfect body, but is in the middle, between the perfect and the imperfect bodies.<sup>3</sup> You would expect it to be among the perfect bodies, but the perfect bodies are up on the conscious level and that is not the real middle position.

Nietzsche is no longer concerned with a personal unconscious; that chapter about the Pale Criminal clearly shows it. He is here concerned with the evil of mankind, with universal humanity as it is represented in himself, and therefore one can say he is concerned with the collective unconscious; the Pale Criminal is a form in the collective unconscious, the criminal is everybody. Now, inasmuch as he is concerned with that, he undergoes naturally the dangers of those who deal with such matters. But he labors under the assumption that he is on top, that he has a reasonable consciousness, that he can make it visible and understandable; and he tries to bring up the lead of the water region. His Pale Criminal is lead, an ignoble substance, and in bringing it up he has the illusion that he keeps the level of consciousness. He does not see that he gets immersed and really sinks insofar as he brings it up. So he talks on this lower level. Of course there is an infinite number of possible levels; he talks now on the level of people who have contacted the collective unconscious, and they speak a different language. If people on the normal conscious level hear it, they draw conclusions which are typical for that level; only the people who hear him on the lower level have the right understanding because they know about that kind of thing. They will draw the conclusions, not of the world above, but of the world of the shadow.

On the conscious level, everybody knows what a criminal is; if you don't know, you take an encyclopedia and look up the chapter about crime, or any handbooks of laws, and they show you. But from the level below, the criminal is something quite different, no longer a statistical or social or juristic phenomenon, nothing reasonable or rational, but a psychological concept. Therefore, it is already a symbolic concept; it is a concept of the twilight, in the region of the pénombre where things have two sides, the sun side and the moon side. The leading principle above is the sun, and below it is the moon; and whatever is between is in two lights, the light of the sun and the light of the moon. So when someone speaks of crime or the criminal on the lower level, he is conscious of crime from such an aspect; it is a twilight concept, and only people who have experienced the shadow can really understand what he is talking about. But if he makes the mistake of coming out into the daylight, into the broad street, and talking as if he were on the first level—and then having the whole thing printed so that every jackass can buy and read it—of course people will read him as they read the newspaper or any other obvious thing. And they will be horrified.

Freud made the same mistake in speaking of things on the unconscious level. He should explain; he should say, "Come, let us go down several steps into the twilight world where things have that aspect." Then everybody could admit incest quite easily. But in the everyday world that is a horrible thing, impossible; the police will catch hold of you and you will be put into jail or the lunatic asylum for it. Also, people from the unconscious level make the mistake of assuming a sort of benignant attitude, and talking as if they were really on a level above, when they are not, but below. Of course, the deeper down you go the worse it becomes; to talk on the topmost level of something brought up from the collective unconscious is to make the most horrible mistake.

You see, Nietzsche, in trying to bring something up from this level, could say he had certain tendencies that were discernible: he might steal, he might lie, or even commit a crime. That is more or less understandable on the upper level, as I said. He might say it was his particular psychology, or write a confession like St. Augustine or Rousseau, freely confessing what a sinner he was. Then people would be agreeably shocked: "How marvelous that people can do such things!"—they themselves of course being not concerned at all. That would be possible: you can speak on this level as a personal confession. But Nietzsche is no longer talking from the level of his personal unconscious; he talks of the crime of man, and then everybody is in it. But then he can only have bad results from his teaching. People will say, "If one is a criminal in a good cause, why not? One is a hero—Nietzsche did it, so why not? But here it is not even twilight. It is already the great night, and those are the things which can only be taught in secret.

Therefore, the more dangerous teachings, the more questionable or profound teachings, were always told in the form of mysteria. One finds these ideas in St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians: "These things must be taught in secret and woe unto those who speak of them in the daytime, thus betraying the mysteries."<sup>4</sup> Such people are always injured or killed. They injure themselves by bringing such matter up to the light. Not realizing that they are already dragged down by the weight, they expose themselves in a most unfortunate way to people on the normal level, who suddenly discover that they are really from below and look down upon them. So what happens on this level is still more dangerous, still more mistaken; it has not even two sides. Whoever is on the level of the personal unconscious has still a sort of luminosity on top from the sun, but down below it is all moonshine: treacherous, poisonous, evil, not to be trusted. And if you expose this thing on a higher level, you are not only exposed but a victim also.

That is what Nietzsche does, not realizing at all. He is quite naive about it: to produce that chapter about the Pale Criminal is really a tremendous naiveté. And probably you have noticed that it is profoundly disturbing because it is true, but it should not be told in the daylight, but only told in the night under the seal of secrecy. This idea was by no means strange to Nietzsche. In another place he speaks of the secret teaching in the temples, and how the initiants were put through many degrees in their initiation, harder and harder, always more cruel and more difficult, complete abnegation and mortification and God knows what; and then comes the last ceremony where the grand master himself receives the initiant who of course expects something extraordinary. But the grand master says, "Everything is allowed. Before, everything was forbidden but now everything is allowed." And that means complete licentiousness.<sup>5</sup> This is of course a legend, but it has a kernel of truth: namely, it reverses the values of consciousness, exchanges the values of consciousness for their opposite, absolute shadow. Of course, for that to be said on the surface is criminal, but five hundred or a thousand meters down in the depths, it is a truth. But we cannot imagine what kind of truth it is because we don't know how things look at that depth; it is a truth of the darkness. There are really organized mysteries in which the ultimate teaching is of such a nature; therefore the principle of these mysteries—I am now quoting facts, this is not my imagination—is: Gloria dei est celare verbum, meaning, it is the glory of God to conceal the word. That is the motto of the highest degree of Knights Templars, a contradiction of the more Christian ideas in the lower stages. We say the glory of God is to preach the word; our mysteries are called sacramenta, which means the mysteries of the divine word, and to preach the word is our duty. Yet in the highest degree of initiation it is the glory of God to hide the word. And why? Because, bring it up and the people will be dumbfounded—and worse, they will be misled.

<sup>5</sup> Thus, although everything is allowed since there is no cosmic forbiddener, there remain, for Nietzsche, good ways and bad ways of being and acting. "What is good: Everything that heightens the feeling of power in man, the will to power, power itself. What is bad? Everything that is born of weakness." The Anti-Christ, tr. R. J. Hollingdale (Harmondsworth, Middlesex, 1968; orig. 1895), sect. 2.

That comes from the same fact which we are here dealing with, that the author of such a book does not realize where he himself stands. In Zarathustra, Nietzsche was already somewhere in the collective part of his unconscious. The Genealogy of Morals and his Aphorisms, for instance, would come more from the personal level; it is possible still to be intellectual and rational there, as Freud has shown. But when it comes to the profounder points, like incest, Freud just reaches the collective level where things have a different meaning and aspect; yet he talks of them naively and thus makes a fatal mistake: he betrays the secrets to infants, which always has the worst of effects. Therefore, my idea is that Zarathustra should not have been published, but should have been worked over and carefully concealed, perhaps put in a form—in spite of all the beauty in it—more or less like his aphoristic writings, because of the evil or morbid influence such a book can have. Just that chapter about the Pale Criminal has a poisonous influence because it makes a really impossible thing quite palatable, and the result is that one is in a mist.

Well, that, to my idea, is a very important point of view whenever you deal with matters of the collective unconscious; touching the personal unconscious already changes you and touching the collective unconscious changes you all the more: you are a different being, and no longer like the people who have not touched it. That does not mean that you are better. On the contrary, you are worse, because from their point of view you are on a lower level; and if you talk from a higher level it is just bluff and you add to your burden by lying and cheating and trying to make a good impression. So one can only recommend the utmost of discretion and tact in the understanding of the level of other people. Of course, in Nietzsche's case you cannot make him responsible: he was utterly overcome by the unconscious and he did not realize that he was lower down than his time. On the contrary, he assumed that he was higher up, that he was light and easy and marvelous; therefore, he speaks of dancing and flying as a compensation for the fact that he was really weighed down. If you are concerned with lead, you naturally realize what lightness is and are likely to make the mistake he made. In his letters, for instance, he says that thought never is difficult to him; it jumps ready-made out of his head as Pallas once jumped from the head of Zeus. Yet on the next page he complains bitterly about his terrible migraines when working; he doesn't make the connection, as he doesn't understand why he feels particularly light when he is weighed down by lead.<sup>6</sup>

Now we have another question to deal with, by Dr. Schlegel: "You told us in a quite convincing way that there is no redemption in confessing oneself. Would you, in that connection, deal with the problem of the possibility of redemption (Sühne) by suffering in the sense of punishment (Strafe)?"

The idea is, you never can get away from the fact that you are the one who has done a certain thing; that is an absolutely indestructible fact and no repentance in the world will ever change it. Now, that being true, you never can live another life than that of a man who has done that thing; inasmuch as it is a general fact that a man who had done it will have such and such a life, you have to expect such a life. If you commit a crime, then you are that man who is called a criminal and the criminal's life is such and such: he will be caught, he will be punished, and he will undergo suffering. So you expect suffering, and if it doesn't come, then you yourself have not found the answer which you expected of life. Of course, it sounds absurd when you put it in this way, but reverse the picture: say you do something really good—then you are the good man who has done the good thing and such a man rightly expects gratification or recognition. He supposes that the good will be followed by certain compensations, and if they don't happen, he is disappointed; he feels frustrated. You see, doing a good thing is, dynamically, exactly the same as doing a bad thing, as from the standpoint of the unconscious, love and hatred are identical—dynamically identical: the one is positive and the other negative. In nature it is exactly the same whether electricity is positive or negative, and so to the

Of course to us, it makes all the difference in the world whether a thing is good or bad; but any effect would be equivalent to the good or the bad you produce, and you expect the sequence. You accept naturally the consequence, the effect that follows a good or bad deed; if that does not follow, you are frustrated. You have not received what life really owes you. So it is unnatural if crime is not followed by suffering and punishment, and it is unnatural if good is not followed by gratification and recognition. We feel under a certain moral obligation to be grateful to somebody who does good, as we are compelled to an adverse reaction against somebody who does wrong. That is simply inescapable. We cannot reverse the picture and punish the one who is doing good. It is impossible—only crazy people could do that. And it is equally impossible to reverse the conclusion in the other case. For the sake of normal psychological life, the good deed ought to be followed by gratitude or something of the sort, by a true recognition or compensation; and the same in the opposite case. Then only do you feel: this is right. Suppose somebody has done something very good, for example, and is then compensated by public recognition; then, though you have not contributed to it yourself, you feel that to be a perfectly satisfactory expression of your own feeling: it is very nice that recognition has been given to that individual. Therefore you have, and you ought to have, the opposite reaction in the case of crime. When you hear that a man who has committed a terrible crime is sentenced to prison for life, or even has to undergo capital punishment, you cannot help feeling that it is right, the true answer.

And since I look at these things, perhaps, from a very irrational standpoint, the balance of the dynamis of psychological events, I think the natural order would be disturbed if we ceased to give recognition to good and evil. There must be an equivalent recognition. For instance, that modern standpoint where a man commits a crime and a very enlightened alienist comes along and says he could not help himself, that he is just a degenerate individual and should be put into a sanatorium where he will be well fed and taken care of and even enjoy a certain amount of liberty: that is not quite satisfactory—it is a worse answer as a matter of fact. Because you put yourself on a much higher level and regard him as pathological, a degenerate individual, you can only put him to bed without caring for the fact that he has murdered a little child or tortured some other being to death. That is really not satisfactory. People's natural reaction is: "Those damned alienists! Now we must feed him in a lunatic asylum where he can stuff his belly and have a good time and smoke cigars at the expense of the state! And they are right, it is true. Perhaps this is a very sinful point of view, I don't know, but I feel that is simply a straightforward statement about human psychology, and how else can we judge of these things than by human psychology?

Dr. Schlegel: Thank you. The standpoint of modern criminology is really quite a rational one. It denies the Vergeltung.<sup>7</sup>

Prof. Jung: Of course. The Vergeltung is compensation already, a sort of revenge. That is the only true point of view from the standpoint of psychology. I quite agree that my point of view from the standpoint of Christian morality and of reason is very sinful, yet I am convinced that this is the only right and true standpoint. It always has been true and it will be true forever: that we feel under a certain obligation to be grateful to the one who does the good deed, and if that is the case we must always punish the evil.

Mrs. Baumann: Perhaps some of the confusion in the world today comes from the fact that the good deeds seem to turn out to be bad, and perhaps a crime might turn out to be a good thing.

Prof. Jung: That is possible, but it does not hinder our considering it a crime, and then we punish it. Of course I admit that somebody might be doing a great good to humanity which his time understands as a great evil; we have plenty of such cases in medicine. We have observed more than once that the people who introduced new methods have been persecuted as being the worst enemies of mankind. People were put into prison for dissecting corpses, for instance; they really were benefitting mankind, but it was not understood and so their good was considered to be a crime. And it was in a way a crime for that time too because they were criminally naive about it; they should have known to what time they were talking. It is criminal to put a bottle of digitalis into the hands of a little child as a plaything, for instance. It might save your life by helping your heart along, or might mean rescue to a man with heart disease, but if a child drinks that medicine, it dies. You must always take into consideration to whom you are speaking; it is a criminal disregard to talk certain verities to babies. One of the main considerations in analysis is that one tries to understand to whom one is talking, and that is exceedingly difficult; one is always in danger of saying too much or too little. So a thing which in itself was really good, one would say from a later more enlightened point of view was at that time

Mrs. Crowley: May I ask a question in regard to the treatment of the criminal? Would you not say that was influenced by a transforming process in a historical sense, just as other collective attitudes are? If we are attempting to outgrow the medieval attitude in our relation to life, why maintain a system of punishment that belongs to the Middle Ages? If, for example, our rational age has begun to produce certain codes or standards of decency, how in the treatment of the criminal can we revert to barbaric practices that belong to the days of dungeons? Does not the law of development or transformation apply here too?

Prof. Jung: Surely there would be a development, but the development into rationalism is to me no development. It would be a development if we could produce criminals with a moral sense; we would then arrest them and bring them before the judge who would say, "Now Mr. So-and-So, I am very sorry, but I must tell you that you have done something which really should not be done; you have hurt the feelings of all the decent citizens and I must politely beg you not to do such a thing again." Now if the criminal is so far developed that he is deeply humiliated by that, so that he really promises never to do such a thing again, that would work. But we must first produce decent criminals. You see, it all depends whether the prisoner is of a coarse structure or not: the punishment must be according to the nature of the criminal. There is a considerable progress in the postponement of punishment; every reasonable being would agree, when somebody has lost his head and committed a crime, that he did it in a sort of panic, and therefore we must be reasonable and postpone punishment. I think that is progress or evolution, but one should make it clear that the punishment is merely postponed, and if the swine commits such a crime again, we will lay him by the heels and he will then undergo the whole severity of the law. That is sound. But to improve the lot of the prisoner is I am afraid very sentimental; even the prisoners do not approve. The real criminal makes fun of this leniency in punishment.

Mrs. Crowley: Many of our modern prisoners have the same conditions as in the Middle Ages.

Prof. Jung: Yes, one cannot hinder that kind of development; surely one will make the prisons hygienic so that the prisoner can really last fifteen years. It would be too bad if he should die in the third year of his punishment. You have no idea what it is to be in prison really, how hellish it is to condemn a man to that for twenty-five years. It is much better to condemn him to death right away. So it is cruelty anyhow on principle. For instance, the murderer of the Empress Elizabeth had confessed the murder—it was absolutely clear—so they put him into prison alone where he dies after six years.<sup>8</sup> It was a very cruel punishment—to be entirely alone for six years. Now, perhaps, the hygienic conditions were not of the best so that he was infected by tuberculosis and died soon; if it had been a very good prison he would have lasted thirty years and the punishment would have been drawn out. I should prefer to die.

LECTURE III

22 May 1935

Prof. Jung:

The title of the next chapter is "Reading and Writing." Now how on earth do you think Nietzsche is coming across that gulf from the pale criminal to reading and writing?

Mrs. Baumann: After he had finished writing "The Pale Criminal," he must have looked back on it to try to understand it himself; he must have begun to think about what he has "written with blood."

Prof. Jung: Well, these chapters, as I said, are like a flow of pictures which follow each other; "The Pale Criminal" is one picture in the stream, and out of that logically follows the picture of reading and writing. But what is the connection? Is there nothing in the chapter of the pale criminal which would explain that we were coming to the chapter "Reading and Writing?" What is reading and writing?

Mrs. Sigg: Expression, a means of communicating something to other people.

Prof. Jung: Yes, it is a function of relationship. And how does that follow after the criminal?

Miss Hannah: Doesn't it connect up with the last verse about being a handrail? There he is beginning to get rather cold feet about what he has said.

Prof. Jung: You are quite right. It connects up with the last verse: "I am railing alongside the torrent; whoever is able to grasp me may grasp me! Your crutch, however, I am not." He begins to ask himself what he has said. But what has the fact that reading and writing are functions of expression to do with the criminal?

Mr. Allemann: The Pale Criminal is a protest against any connection.

Prof. Jung: Exactly. The criminal is quite certainly asocial, disrupts the laws of humanity, and sins against all the rules of the human community; whoever commits a crime is cut off. He has to keep his crime secret, upsets the feeling of his fellow beings, violates their rights: he is the most violent breaker of the bond of the human community. It is really interesting that he names this chapter not just “The Criminal,” or “The Bad Man,” but “The Pale Criminal.” Obviously he realizes what that means.

Mr. Allemann: He realizes the horror of being alone, of being an out-cast.

Prof. Jung: Yes, and also his inability to be a criminal; he realizes the meaning of the criminal who could not stick to it, could not suffer the complete human isolation. I once had a pale criminal in consultation—a murderess. It was such a case in reality. A highly educated women whom I did not know at all came one evening to consult me. She told me that she had committed a murder twenty years before, had killed another woman, and it never had been found out. It was thought to have been a suicide. She came to me because her last connection with life had been destroyed. She had a daughter whom she loved, but for unknown reasons she could no longer stand her mother and had separated from her. And all her friends withdrew; she did not know how that came about, because nobody really knew anything about it. But she herself sought solitude, lived in the country, and could only deal really with animals. She was afraid of horses however, and they reacted to her very nervously; but being very energetic, she forced herself to ride just because she was afraid. She had dogs also and there was one, an Alsatian, that was particularly beloved by her; and when that dog became lame, she was completely finished, demoralized; she did not know what to do. It was then that she came to me and confessed; I was the first being to whom she had spoken of it. Then she disappeared again. You see, she was in a way not a pale criminal; she just suffered and stood it, but she became absolutely isolated, I have hardly ever seen a human being so isolated—more than any hermit. Even if one lived in a deserted country like Alaska or Northern Canada one would not be so alone, and it was most characteristic that she broke down completely when her dog failed her.

Here, then, Nietzsche realizes the pale criminal in himself; that is his picture, his experience. He is the man who really cannot stand that isolation. It is, of course, sufficient to realize anything of a criminal kind to feel at once the extraordinary isolation, but being a Superman he should be able to stand it. His exhortation is: “Realize yourself, even your criminality, and stand for yourself: be a Superman who is beyond all such human feebleness.” The reaction comes at once, however; in the end of “The Pale Criminal” he understands that what he said might perhaps have peculiar consequences, and he begins to preach as if to people actually present: “Now don’t use what I say as crutches. I will show you the way but you cannot rely upon me.” So quite naturally he comes to his most characteristic function, reading and writing, taking in by reading communications from other people, and sending messages by writing to them. That is the logical connection between the two chapters. Here we are in the midst of that activity and he says,

Of all that is written, I love only what a person hath written with his blood. Write with blood, and thou wilt find that blood is spirit.

It is no easy task to understand unfamiliar blood; I hate the reading idlers.

He who knoweth the reader, doeth nothing more for the reader. Another century of readers—and spirit itself will stink.

Or another century of writers!

Every one being allowed to learn to read, ruineth in the long run not only writing but also thinking.

There is a great deal of truth in that.

Once spirit was God, then it became man, and now it even becometh populace.“

How do you explain that?

Mrs. Crowley: In a previous Seminar, you spoke about the difference between the word that is derived from the spirit, and the spirit that is derived from the word, where the spirit becomes merely a concept. I think it was in “Joys and Passions.”

Prof. Jung: Yes, and we encountered a similar thought right in the beginning where we met the saint in the wood; there we spoke of this descent. Now we again meet that thought of Nietzsche’s, “Once spirit was God, then it became man, and now it even becometh populace”—mere mob. This is the way the spirit has taken. And how did this come about?

Prof. Fierz: We see it in Christianity, where it started.

Prof. Jung: Yes, in the whole course of development in Christianity, starting really with the beginning of the Evangel of John: “In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the word was God.” So word and spirit are pretty much the same; the word is simply the emanation of the spirit, the visibility or the audibility of the spirit, because the spirit is conveyed by the spoken word. If God emanates spirit, it will be in the form of the word, the creative spirit. For instance, Ptah, the Egyptian creative god, is a creative word; he generates by speaking—speaks and it is.<sup>1</sup> So the Logos that was with God was the potential creation, and by speaking he created the Logos that became visible in the flesh: God became man in the god-man, Christ. As Nietzsche says here, “Then it became man.” It appeared among us on this earth, shone in the darkness, and the darkness did not understand it. Therefore, it is the duty of the Christian to preach the word, to reveal it to the world in order that the darkness may be enlightened; it must even be forced to understand the word. Now, inasmuch as the word became established on the earth, inasmuch as it has generated believers, institutions—the universal Catholic church—inasmuch as we have missions that carry the Evangelists to remote places, the word is becoming mob. It is becoming beliefs, stone churches, dogmas, laws, all sorts of organizations. And so it becomes more and more flesh, until it is now a merely human church, and therefore has necessarily lost its power. It is like the transformation of the sun’s energy which through radiation reaches the earth in the form of light, and transforms into plants, say, and into beings that live; but they are not light. It is as if the light has been absorbed into them and then it is no longer light.

You see this is an important process, and it has never been the object of scientific or philosophic consideration, because the time was not ripe and the human mind was not ripe. But long before such processes are objects of philosophic or even of scientific consideration, they are in existence in the form of philosophical mythology. For example, this whole thing has been beautifully anticipated by Manichaeism. Mani, the founder, built up a sort of mythological philosophical system based very largely upon Zoroastrianism. The idea there was that originally the word, or the good spirit, the good attitude, symbolized by Vohu Manō, and the bad attitude, symbolized by Angramainyu, were dormant or identical with Ahura Mazda; then when he dismissed his good countenance and his bad countenance out of himself, the world was split, so ever since there has been the fight between the power of light and the power of darkness. That this very old Zoroastrian teaching is the origin of the most basic concepts of Christianity, is a well-recognized fact, and of course it is the very substance of Manichaeism. Mani lived about 220 A.D. and he represents a differentiation of those older Zoroastrian beliefs, mixed with a great deal of Christianity; the “Hymn to Jesus” was by Mani himself, which makes it evident that he recognized Christ fully, and probably other predecessors. Islam has recognized all “the people of the Book”; it was a law to spare the people of the Book, otherwise Mohammedanism spared no one. Christians were tolerated to that extent, the Jews also, and Moses and Joshua and other prophets were recognized, as well as Nebi Issa, the prophet Jesus. And so Mani, who is of course older than Mohammed by four hundred years, was also recognized. According to his system, the light was almost swallowed by the darkness. Angramainyu caught an immense number of light germs and was always trying to get more, and Ahura Mazda was continually fighting him in order to recover that lost light substance. It is the eternal struggle of human life really: man consists of a certain amount of light substance and a certain amount of devilish darkness, and in each man the same battle is waged between them.<sup>2</sup>

Mani's practical prescriptions, which go into great detail, are imbued with the same idea. That shows itself in the symbolism of the communion which consisted in the partaking of fruit. A beautiful representation of that is in the Asiatic Museum in Berlin: some miniatures were discovered by Grünwedel and Lecoque of the so-called Turfan expedition at Gandhara, and on one of them the Manichæan communion is depicted.<sup>3</sup> There is a big bowl full of fruit, particularly grapes, and on top is a large melon, which was considered to be a sacred fruit because it looked like the sun and was supposed to contain the most light particles, to be made entirely of light. The outside is yellow and the inside a beautiful orange color: the sun itself. So by eating melon one eats light germs and makes one's body light, thereby depriving the devil of them and restoring them to Ahura Mazda. This myth of the absorption of the light into the darkness is a very philosophical idea; it is the light of consciousness of course, which is forever threatened by unconsciousness. It is much older than the time of Zoroaster; it is found among primitives very frequently in the fights with dragons or dark powers that try to steal the soul of man, to suppress his consciousness. That comes from the fact that primitives are far more in danger of being overcome by the unconscious; they are deadly afraid of emotions, and many of their rites and ways of dealing with each other are dictated by that fear of losing their individual consciousness; it is a real danger, for then they entirely lose their self-control and things become exceedingly disagreeable: they kill each other. Therefore, such outbursts are particularly repressed; they become objects of taboo, in order to assert the life of the tribe over against the destructive powers of unconsciousness. So the theme of the struggle between the light and the darkness is exceedingly ancient.

Now, consciousness can be understood as the light because it needs a certain spirit to remain conscious. Spirit is a very peculiar concept which has in many cases lost its original character, but the history of the word spirit, or the German word Geist, tells us what it originally meant. The Greek word pneuma and the Latin word spiritus mean wind, and the Latin word animus is the same as the Greek word anemos, and they also mean wind. Pneuma is still the term in the Greek Orthodox church for the Holy Ghost, which is the sacred wind; it is a movement, a force. And Geist comes from a root which means to well up; it is a sort of enthusiasm, an emotional condition. The English word aghast is an emotional word which comes from it, and the word ghost is related to it. Geist was understood to be like a geyser, a welling up, an inspiration. In the miracle of Pentecost, all those symbolic phenomena are together; the fiery tongues mean the fire of enthusiasm: the apostles were like drunken people, and a powerful wind filled the house.

That was spirit, but to us spirit has become something exceedingly lame and ineffectual, a mere two-dimensional picture—sort of beliefs or ideas that have no body and no force; one must believe them to give them any force. In the philosophy of Klages, one learns that the spirit is now the devil that destroys life, but he at least attributes a destructive power to it. And Scheler, who tried to restore a certain amount of importance to the spirit, made again a very lame thing of it; it is neither very destructive nor very effective.<sup>4</sup> That powerful wind, which was destructive as well as generative or emotional, has gone. It is a poor thing with us now, no longer what it used to be. This process has come about within two thousand years. It was God in the beginning, and before that time it was latent in what man calls “God,” that incomprehensible power in the depth of his own soul. And man supposes that this is in the depth of the universe in general because the microcosm is in no way different from the macrocosm; so what is in the depth of the soul was in the universe before, in that eternal source of life. Then it became visible or audible; it became the euangelion, the glad tidings, and people received it. But later it grew into an organization, so the effect was lost in created things. You see, the creative impulse comes to an end with the creation, just because it has become a creation; for a while there is no longer an impulse—until one has liberated oneself again from that which one has created. If one sticks to the creation, one will create nothing more. And so the time comes when the world is absolutely empty of spirit, when nobody knows what spirit is, when there are only the effects of the spirit—though those effects make visible efforts to remember the times when they were young, as old people like to speak about their youth just because they have it no longer. This descent which has happened to us within the last two thousand years, then, is the phenomenon to which Nietzsche here refers—of course in a more or less negative way. Now, where is the spirit when it has done its work? An effect has been produced, one sees that, but one finds no spirit in it.

Mrs. Jung: I think we have already spoken of it; it is in the body, in matter.

Prof. Jung: And what kind of matter? It is always that matter which the devil is especially keen on.

Mrs. Jung: The blood.

Prof. Jung: Yes, because blood is the liquid spirit of life, the seat of the soul; one signs a contract with the devil with blood. The devil wants that quite particularly because he knows its worth; anything done with blood or through blood is mighty important. So arriving now on a level where the spirit is in the blood, in which part of the world do you push your head up through the crust?

Prof. Fierz: In Germany.

Prof. Jung: Of course, Heil Hitler! You see, the spirit in the blood is of course the unconscious spirit; wherever the spirit is in the blood the unconscious begins to stir. Then a man, or a nation, will be moved by the unconscious; then they talk of instincts, race, blood, because they feel that the thing which is moving them comes from within, comes somehow from the body. So naturally they think it is the blood, and then they naturally will rationalize it because they suffer from the disease of rationalizing everything. Thus, their philosophy must then be a philosophy of blood. All that talk of blood and iron, that playing with fire, that war fear and war lust—which does exist—all that comes from this philosophy of the blood. You see in how far Nietzsche is a forerunner. But the Germans of his generation and the next generation and all the following generations are not so gifted that they would learn it from Nietzsche; it just happens to them. And Nietzsche could foretell it because it happened to him; in a certain way he anticipated in his own life and his own body what the future of his people would be.

The true prophet is the man who in his personal life experiences the fate of his people, and who also tries to find the remedy in his personal life for the disease or the misery of his people. You see that in the Old Testament. That was the reason why Hosea, for instance, not minding his personal convictions, obeyed the command of the Lord and married the whore—that was a symbol to his people.<sup>5</sup> Now, I don't know how far we are allowed to go in accepting Nietzsche's prophecy. Is Nietzsche's life prophetic? We don't know. But I should say that he was a dangerous prophet, he has surely anticipated in words what the unconscious was preparing, and it remains to be seen in how far his life also will be prophetic. Certainly Zarathustra is highly prophetic. Not very long ago I saw that others had discovered something along that line too. I find in the prophecies of Maître Michel Nostradamus, in his book called Les Centuries published in 1555, that he says:

En Germanie nai tront diverses sectes
S'approchan fort de L'heureux Paganisme:
Le coeur captif et petites receptes,
Feron retour à payer le vrai dine.<sup>6</sup>

There you have it. He did not mention the century in which that new paganism would come about, but he must have had some feeling about the peculiar possibilities of the inhabitants of those northern countries beyond the Rhine. He had the right intuition, anticipating what was to come in Germany. And he only could do that from the depths of the unconscious that knows ahead, that works ahead, just as Nietzsche anticipated.

Mrs. Baynes: What did he prophesy? I did not understand.

Prof. Jung: Oh, that in Germany different sects would come which would approach very strongly the happy paganism, that the heart would be a prisoner, and that they would have to learn to pay for understanding or acknowledging the true divine. The first editions of that book are exceedingly rare; it was first printed in 1555. I have the edition of 1610 which is also quite rare. (I will bring it to show you next time.) Also he wrote to the King of France—I think it was Henri II—that in the year 1792 they would have a new time calculation in France; and as a matter of fact in 1793 the Congress voted for that new division of the year into ten months, giving them those natural names, Germinal, Floreal, Fructidor, Brumaire, etc.; they voted on it in 1793 but it was to take effect already in 1792. So old Michel Nostradamus was materially correct.<sup>7</sup> He was a most peculiar fellow, but there are really astonishing things in those prophecies, and he said they would be good till the year 3796. I take it as simply an anticipation through reading the unconscious. I don't doubt that he is quite right, and if he had made prophecies for 6000 and 10000 A.D. I would equally believe it. Why not? If he can foretell such things, what can he not foretell? Probably we would all be very much better prophets if we were closer to the unconscious—of course always with a knowing mind. You must have open eyes, and remain conscious in order to realize what you see.

Well, we said that when the spirit has become mob, when it has disappeared into its own creation, then it reappears in the blood. That is, there is a sort of latent time in between when there is no spirit whatever, like the second part of the nineteenth century. Then the depths begin to move, and we are probably not very far from the truth when we assume that those most destructive psychological developments which led into the great war were really the first stirrings of the blood and whatever it implies. Now here is a detail which I passed over: Dr. Kirsch has just drawn my attention to the sentence, "It is no easy task to understand unfamiliar blood" which comes just after, "Write with blood, and thou wilt find that blood is spirit." Here Nietzsche realizes something very important: namely, when one is moved by the spirit in the blood, one is really moved by one's own blood and whatever that blood means: and then it is no light matter to understand the blood of others. That is, le coeur est captif, the blood is in the heart and the heart gets caught by this idea of the blood, the feeling and the fact of the blood. One is so much in oneself that one will find it very difficult to understand other blood, the expression of other individuals. That is exactly like a patient who in the beginning of analysis is caught by his own unconscious facts. He dreams nothing else, talks nothing else—he is all in his own psychology, and then he spreads himself all over the world and is utterly incapable of seeing anybody else's point of view. It is one of the most urgent tasks of analysis to make those people see that other people have a psychology of their own; it is simply incredible how little they are aware of that. Perfectly reasonable beings start from the premise that other people are not only like themselves, but simply identical, and if they don't behave as they want them to, they must be wrong.

Of course this is not only the predicament of the patient, but is also the predicament of the analyst, which is still more remarkable. But one sees it very clearly. It is the disease of the analyst that he thinks he must be right as soon as the unconscious is touched upon, in whatever form it is; it needs all one's good humor to keep more or less balanced. You see, when one touches the unconscious one is in danger of becoming a prophet. That is simply the result of the fact that whoever touches the unconscious, in whatever form it is presented to him, is instantly caught, and he cannot liberate himself because the spirit is stronger than man: it is an enormous power. When the spirit is in the blood one is caught by the blood. If it is in the water one is caught by the water, and if it is in a stone one is caught by the stone and becomes transformed into that substance with all its implications. If caught by the blood one gets into a sort of intoxication and sees red. If you meditate on this sad truth, you can understand a lot that is actually happening in the world; on the one side it is positive, on the other negative. Whether you are afraid or enthusiastic over the blood, it is all the same. And it is an exceedingly dangerous condition because the blood is the characteristic or the attribute of the chthonic powers that are typically the gods of darkness.

Now, the picture I am painting for you is pretty dark, and it would not be the whole truth if I remained with that exceedingly negative aspect because it also has another side. Therefore, partially, I quoted for you the verse of the old master Michel Nostradamus; you may have noticed that he said Germany was approaching "l'heureux paganisme," das fröhliche Heidentum. You see, that sounds exactly like Nietzsche, that is his term: the gay science, die fröhliche Wissenschaft, is what he calls his philosophy; his Heidentum is a very gay and funny and most enjoyable matter.<sup>8</sup> So that very terrible thing, the blood, seems also to have an exceedingly enjoyable aspect. For instance, as we see in the actual phenomena of our time, when the pagan tendencies issue from the spirit of the blood, we see it under an aspect which is not just agreeable, not in good taste, but utterly unwise. Yet if people could content themselves with the heureux paganisme, and if they would not make such a damnably serious affair of it, it would be all right; then some of those funny gods with horns and hairy legs might still be dancing somewhere in flowery meadows, and you would perhaps hear occasionally the flute among the reeds. But if you make a system of it—and the Germans have the unfortunate habit of always making a system of things—then it becomes just bad taste and is most regrettable. For the heureux paganisme has really nothing to do with that dry rustling of papers and law books and Bibles and missals and God knows what; those things belong to the next level below.

You remember about the different layers of consciousness which we were discussing last time: first the topmost world of consciousness where everything is perfectly organized and explainable, the daylight sphere; then the next level below is the personal unconscious, the things of the twilight; and below that is deep obscurity. Now, what is happening in our days comes from the twilight region of the spirit of the blood. And woe unto those who understand this spirit from the layer above, for that remains Christian. So whatever comes up from the depths must be assimilated. If it is not to destroy whatever is above with all the good that is in it, it must be canalized into some reasonable form.

For instance, when I introduce myself to you as a doctor, even a professor, I am absolutely established up in the daylight; I have public lectures, I call my stuff “analytical psychology,” and one talks reasonably about these matters. I teach doctors, I go to congresses, I am president of such-and-such societies, and all that shows me to be a properly balanced individual, a citizen, and a man of the right order. And that is important because I am thus far an assurance that the powers of the unconscious can be organized. To those who do not know that there is a twilight layer below, of course that seems self-evident, and they would not understand that I spend any time in the twilight region because they don’t know that anything is happening there: they are simply astonished. They are absolutely incapable of understanding what is happening in Germany, for instance; they cannot understand why no conclusion is reached about disarmament; they think a lot about the League of Nations and they never realize that those things won’t work. Then to those people who are aware that something is happening underneath, it is important that I am established in this world, for otherwise I would be a sort of moth or butterfly or anything else that is drifting and utterly unreliable; and that would result in an instantaneous lack of confidence: people only have confidence if I am a being properly established here. Therefore, I make it all-important that people should be established in this reasonable daylight world, for inasmuch as they are not, they are not reliable and they must not wonder if nobody trusts them. They must be trustworthy and they are only trustworthy when they are here. Anything that supports the day is a pillar of the world as it is and therefore should be maintained, and one must try how far it is possible to canalize the flow of blood, that spirit issuing from the depths.

This is an exceedingly dangerous time and we are confronted with a problem which has never been known in the conscious history of man. You cannot compare it with the early times of Christianity, because that movement did not come from the blood, but came from above, a light that shone forth. This is not a light but a darkness; the powers of darkness are coming up. Therefore we must be careful not to swim as if we were fishes, but remember that we are human; and we must not resist by shutting ourselves up and defending ourselves blindly. The symbol of our time and the coming time is Aquarius, the man with the vessel to catch whatever flows, and he must transform it into the fertile water of life. The symbol of the time before was the Fishes, and they are able to swim; those people were liberated from the earth by the power of the spirit because the spirit was then above in the light. Today it is not in the light, but in the blood, so the position is entirely different; we cannot compare it with the conditions two thousand years ago.

You see, to be moved by the blood means that you are really moved by the things in the twilight zone, where things begin to become visible. And if we want to do something about that fact, I surely should not organize it, up in the light of day; inasmuch as it is a phenomenon coming up from the twilight it should be kept at bay. It should not be a big organization; it should be an heureux paganisme—enrich human life and not upset it. It is as if you were to turn a river over your perfectly good fields; of course they need water, but if you turn a whole river onto them, you simply destroy them. And if you turn on that river of blood, it will be a most horrible destruction. But if you keep it in its place, and don't raise too much fuss about it, it will be quite nice. Don't be too specific about it, don't tell if that old Pan is again abroad in the woods; otherwise people will say you are crazy. If you get a glimpse of Pan in the woods, then be very glad that you had the grace to see something of him; but always keep in mind that it is not quite nice to know of such a mystery: you cannot talk about it. It is like a good bottle of wine; well, it is quite possible to mention that you like to drink a glass of good wine, but don't say you were drunk. To be drunk is very nice sometimes, but don't speak of it too loudly or people will say you organize drunkenness, that you are corrupted by the wine merchants, or feed your patients with alcohol.

That is the way people speak in the daylight where everything is light, where everything is canalized or on a straight roadway; while down below in the twilight, it is a nice round little fact, very enjoyable, very useful, sometimes even vital, saving your life perhaps. But it should not be organized in the open, otherwise it becomes a thing of utterly bad taste, and then it is immoral. If you have a moral conflict, it is quite immoral to answer it by getting drunk; I never can say, "This is the kind of conflict which, according to the books, is dissolved by drinking a bottle of strong wine, by getting drunk and vomiting afterwards." One speaks like that up above, but in the next layer below there are no such things as prescriptions. There are only certain experiences, certain facts which simply don't bear much scrutinizing light. And it would be wrong to disturb these germs because here are the attempts of a new form of life, which needs perhaps centuries and centuries before it can become more or less organized. If you take it right up and make a system of it, you have actual Germany, and that is really not a good example. So this fact of the blood is a most upsetting problem, because it brings up an order of things which is really no order, and it cannot be made into a human order.

Of course we are all thinking of the so-called neuheidnische Bewegung,<sup>9</sup> and there you see the mistake; that thing should not be organized. If anybody has a Wotan experience—and I don't doubt that there are such things—he should keep perfectly quiet and think, "Well, this is a pleasant slip into former times." Or if another god plays a trick on somebody else, he should not try to make it into a system according to which children are baptized and people are married, nor should it become the object of a particular credo. It is all individual fantasy; those are germs, or faint possibilities, which might develop into something in the course of many centuries, but for the time being it is an individual slip, perhaps even regrettable. Of course one can acknowledge at the same time that a real and full life, coming really out of the blood where it ought to come from, is always a bit regrettable. For the culmination of life or the real meaning of life is not the greatest sum of happiness; only very naive people can believe such things. If you have the greatest sum of happiness, then you are simply incapable of appreciating it. For instance, primitives believe that having the greatest amount of food is heaven; but even a primitive, if he could only arrest himself for a moment in his state of desire, would realize that was nonsense. It is like the fairy tale where one must eat cake for three weeks in order to get into a paradise called Schlaraffenland.<sup>10</sup> That is a land where stuffed pigeons fly into your mouth, where the fountains run wine, where the trees are laden with sausages, and roasted pigs run around with a knife and fork in their side, all ready for you to take a slice. Of course anybody would get sick in the first hour.

The greatest amount of good, of happiness, is complete nonsense; the really good life is half happiness and half suffering.<sup>11</sup> And therefore God made for man the full life which is always a little regrettable. Then it is all right, then only one feels that one is really alive: the beauty is beautiful and the ugliness is really ugly, and everything is in its place. You see, this organization, the new paganism, even if it is due chiefly to political influence, is nevertheless a fact, and it is a destructive fact. Sure enough, it contains many germs but it needs wise people to make use of them, and the bigger an organization the more it is idiotic; you can be absolutely sure that the more adherents there are in this new movement, the more it will become absurd. It would have been much better to leave the sheep to a well-organized church which is at least universal—that is the only redeeming factor in a church. But a national church, one that has a sort of pagan character, forebodes nothing good.

Mrs. Sigg: I should like to know whether it would not be a solution for us if we could understand the meaning of the old Christian teaching that man had to be reborn by the spirit and the water and the blood together.

Prof. Jung: Well, it is of course perfectly sound teaching that you cannot be redeemed without having undergone the transformation in the initiation process. It is therefore absolutely impossible to start a new religion. People must first undergo the rite of transformation before they can take on a new creed. And that is just not so in these new movements; it is not even true of their founders. You see, if you are duly initiated, you surely lose all desire to found a religion because you then know what religion really is.

Prof. Fierz: I have just been reading the report of the 1925 Seminar, where the difference between the German and French Christianity was discussed.<sup>12</sup> An American gentleman said then that when Christianity came to France, it was absorbed by the Roman culture, so the early Catholic church in France is actually one straight line coming from Rome, and it has not changed. Whilst in Germany, paganism had to be destroyed and the new religion put on top of it, so it had no foundation and no continuity. Therefore Luther was possible in Germany, but he was not possible in France.

Prof. Jung: Yes, that is a historical fact which cannot be denied. The ground was prepared for Christianity in France and Italy by the Roman civilization and therefore it fitted completely and still fits; but in Germany it did not fit because Germany was not prepared. That is of course an additional reason why we have these difficulties now, and why they break out just in Germany. But they are breaking forth really in the whole world in other forms. For instance, that terrible wave of licentiousness in the United States after the war was the same manifestation. Well now,

He that writeth in blood and proverbs doth not want to be read, but learnt by heart.

Here another quality of the blood spirit comes to the foreground: namely, if you write out of the spirit of the blood, you are not only caught by that, but you are also caught in your own words. Then your words, your thoughts, take on such an importance that you become intolerant, authoritative; you say, people shall read you, shall swallow you wholesale, either they are with you or against you. This intolerance is of course again the difficulty of understanding other people's blood.

In the mountains the shortest way is from peak to peak, but for that route thou must have long legs. Proverbs should be peaks, and those spoken to should be big and tall.

This is a sort of megalomania; if one is filled by one's own importance, then naturally it is quite impossible to talk to an ordinary crowd. One's audience must consist of giants at least; one must always be amongst the gods. And since your surroundings obviously don't consist of gods exclusively and since there are certain human beings among the noble born, then they have to be improved on the spot.

The atmosphere rare and pure, danger near and spirit full of a joyful wickedness: thus are things well matched. [Indeed!]

I want to have goblins about me, for I am courageous. The courage which scareth away ghosts, createth for itself goblins—it wanteth to laugh.

These verses are again in pretty bad taste; it is of course megalomania. Yet he sees that thing more or less correctly. He understands that what comes out of the blood is a very high and a peculiarly aloof spirit, and a very courageous attitude is needed to meet it. Also one cannot help seeing that this spirit is filled with merry malice, that there is a gay quality about it—that heureux paganisme, provided that you have the right attitude. It is as if I should say, "Don't be too serious for heaven's sake!" If you don't take it at its face value, it is a very high and a very delicate thing; yet one must preserve a sort of gay countenance with these profound matters. Then you would strike about the right note. For instance, to say "I want to have goblins about me, for I am courageous" is of course wrongly expressed, but it is correct; he does want to have goblins around him because he is not so brave, but is really afraid, and unfortunately he is not courageous enough to admit his fear. It is much more courageous to say you are afraid; to say you are brave means that you are almost a coward because you are afraid of your fear. If you say you want to have goblins round you, you lie, for you are afraid that you have only goblins round you. And if you have only goblins you are in extreme solitude; then your solitude becomes alive with goblins and it is exceedingly uncanny. He would be speaking the truth if he said, "I am afraid. I notice there are goblins about me and no human beings. I have scared human beings away and now ghosts are all over my deserted roads." Then he goes on to say that courage wants laughter. Well, the courage which consists of fear that is not admitted needs laughter in order to become bearable. So he has the right vision, but it becomes peculiarly distorted by the fact that his attitude is not up to the vision. Therefore, he has to twist the vision, and then it is no longer what it was, no longer helpful, but becomes tragic. You see, those goblins are madness already. If your surroundings begin to be alive and to talk to you, it means madness; but if you can smile when you meet a toad or a squirrel or a leaf that says something funny to you, and if you don't mention it, don't make a system of it, then you have had a mighty good morning in the woods: you are very healthy and have a good appetite and will sleep very well. You were surrounded by goblins and your solitude was quite a beautiful garden. But don't tell it, because then the goblins disappear and instead you have ghosts.

LECTURE IV

29 May 1935

Prof. Jung:

We will continue our text:

I no longer feel in common with you, the very cloud which I see beneath me, the blackness and heaviness at which I laugh—that is your thunder-cloud.

Here he describes something very important; he says that the cloud beneath himself, the blackness and heaviness, explains his peculiar attitude, the fact that he laughs at it. He feels particularly light because he stands above the blackness which would pull down other people, which would be a threatening thunder-cloud to them. They would be afraid of it, and rightly so. But he makes light of it and that is not natural; he surely lifts himself up too far, even identifies with a dancing god, like Shiva the great Creator and Destroyer who is sometimes represented as dancing in the burial ground upon a corpse. So he says:

Ye look aloft when ye long for exaltation; and I look downward because I am exalted.

He makes a sort of compensatory movement, making light of the thing that is heavy; he simply takes the other side and disidentifies with that blackness. But he thus gets rid of his own shadow and becomes a mere idea; he leaves behind the heaviness and fear and darkness which would make him human, and so separates himself from humanity. That of course must lead into an identification with the deity and that is the inflation; he becomes identical with air and with phantoms of the air, those are his goblins. Here he prepared for the inevitable issue, insanity: it is a very decisive moment. You see, the chapter about the Pale Criminal is really continued here. He cannot stand the vision of the criminal, which means that he himself is a pale criminal; therefore, he disidentifies and rises like a balloon, and thus falls a victim to the goblins. Now he continues:

Who among you can at the same time laugh and be exalted? He who climbeth on the highest mountains, laugheth at all tragic plays and tragic realities.

Courageous, unconcerned, scornful, coercive—so wisdom wisheth us; she is a woman, and ever loveth only a warrior.

Sure enough, wisdom is a woman, Sophia, and sure enough, she loves none but the warrior, but the warrior is not understood to be a being of air, a dancer upon the burial ground. He would be amidst all the dangers, really fighting the battle of life, not dancing in the clouds. There is a parallel in Nietzsche's personal life: when he wrote Zarathustra he had withdrawn from his job as professor at Basel University because he suffered from all sorts of neurotic troubles, and having no money of his own he was supported by certain wealthy people in Basel. With that money he lived high above the clouds in the Engadine where he wrote the better part of Zarathustra. So even in his personal life he was walking on clouds, living upon the benevolence of other people without realizing at all that he had no feet on the earth. One really doesn't know how he would have written Zarathustra, or whether he would have written it at all if he had had his feet on the earth. I always regret that Christ only reached the age of thirty-three, because I would like to know what he would have been at fifty or thereabouts, having had a wife and half a dozen children. I wonder what his teaching would have been then. I have an idea that certain things would have been quite different. Since the normal human life lasts more than thirty-three years, and since most people do marry and propagate themselves and are on the battlefield of life or even the burial grounds, they surely must have different views of life from people who never are fully born into the darkness of existence. Nietzsche was really care-free, scornful, and violent—all that is really true of his personal life. You see, he could afford to be like that since he was not completely born, but remained a human promise, an attempt that never came off; so what he teaches is what a soap-bubble might say, or a butterfly—no, not even a butterfly, because a butterfly is very real. A butterfly never dreams of travelling above thunder-clouds, but is always below the clouds in the vicinity of the earth, among flowers and mates and such things.

Ye tell me, "Life is hard to bear." But for what purpose should ye have your pride in the morning and your resignation in the evening?

Life is hard to bear: but do not affect to be so delicate! We are all of us fine sumpter asses and assesses.

That is just what he is not, but he easily can talk like that; being out of the fray, he is outside and above it.

What have we in common with the rose-bud, which trembleth because a drop of dew hath formed upon it?

Well, he just escaped it.

It is true we love life; not because we are wont to live, but because we are wont to love.

This is a very great sentence. He says we are accustomed to love. But what? Let us assume, to love life, but if one loves life then surely something should come from it. You see, life wants to be real; if you love life you want to live really, not as a mere promise hovering above things. Life inevitably leads down into reality. Life is of the nature of water: it always seeks the deepest place, which is always below in the darkness and heaviness of the earth. So what he says here is really a soap-bubble.

There is always some madness in love. But there is always, also, some method in madness.

That is very true, but it is a dangerous kind of talk under such conditions.

And to me also, who appreciate life, the butterflies, and soap-bubbles, and whatever is like them amongst us, seem most to enjoy happiness.

One mistrusts that happiness, particularly if one knows that all these ecstasies in Zarathustra are dearly paid for by awful days of headaches and vomiting, which Nietzsche never connected with the production of his thought.

To see these light, foolish, pretty, lively little sprites flit about—that moveth Zarathustra to tears and songs.

I should only believe in a God that would know how to dance.

We know that God, but he is called the destroyer and his dancing takes place unfortunately in the burial ground.

And when I saw my devil, I found him serious, thorough, profound, solemn; he was the spirit of gravity—through him all things fall.

That very normal and very sound and even inevitable trend of life to seek the deepest places was the devil to him. And who is more earnest or solemn or profound than Zarathustra? You see, he cannot get rid of his devil.

Not by wrath, but by laughter, do we slay. Come, let us slay the spirit of gravity!

I learned to walk; since then have I let myself run.

Because the more he learns to walk, the lighter he becomes and the faster he runs—something like an avalanche.

I learned to fly; since then I do not need pushing in order to move from a spot.

Now am I light, now do I fly; now do I see myself under myself. Now there danceth a God in me.—

Thus spake Zarathustra.

Here he really demonstrates the psychological process going on in him, the preparation for insanity. It is a very frequent symptom in the beginning of certain forms of insanity that people have a very peculiar relationship to their own body. They often have the idea, for example, that the body has no weight, that they can not hear their own footfall. They also think they can fly and make attempts at flying, thus accounting for what has been supposed to be suicide in many cases; they climb out of the fourth story and naturally, following the law of gravity, they land on the pavement. And as they cannot explain what they really attempted, it is called a case of suicide from unsound mind. Or they attempt to walk on the water and then they are drowned.

I remember such a case, a fellow student at the University, a particularly intelligent man who passed his medical examination at the same time as I did, and was equally good at it so people thought he would have quite a remarkable career. But I did not hear of him again until, about ten years later, I met him on military duty, and he then gave me an account of his hectic life in the meantime. I had heard that he had gone to Egypt and thought he must have some great scheme on, so I asked him what he had done there. "I got out of the train at Cairo." "And where did you go then?" "I walked down to Alexandria." "What! You walked down to Alexandria! What for?" "To see the country; there are pretty bad dogs there." "Dogs! Did you see nothing else?" "Well, I had a scrape with the police. I had to shoot those dogs." "And you experienced nothing else in Egypt?" "But what could you see there? It is pretty flat." You see, that was his first attempt at flying over the earth; he had the idea that he was approaching divinity and should now move over the lands, so why not over Egypt? And being in Egypt, why not move over the Delta? With no relation to the soil, with no relation to the country, just in order to move over the lands of the earth. But when he told me he had been in a lunatic asylum later I began to understand.

The next thing after his notable trip to Egypt and his experience with the bad dogs in the villages of the Delta, was that he had grand schemes, sort of Faustian schemes, to produce life for millions. His greatest idea was to dam up the Canton of Wallis near St. Maurice in Switzerland, thus making a big lake inside that Rhone valley; the whole population would be drowned, but it would be done in order to produce energy for all of Europe. And while he was at those plans, he made other discoveries, how to diminish gravity for instance; he had a pile of five-franc coins and in playing with them he found that by heaping them up and by means of a peculiar electrical process, the coins at one end of the pile became lighter. He repeated the process many times and finally was convinced that he could produce a similar phenomenon in himself, could cause his own body to lose weight. To test it, he walked out into the street and over a bridge where his footfall seemed to him to be quite inaudible, so he concluded he must have lost his weight. Then he rightly deduced from this fact that his body must have lost the quality of matter and therefore would not reflect light and would be invisible. He tested that by walking in a loop round people on the street for quite a distance; apparently nobody noticed it—or he did not notice that they noticed it—and he even brushed against somebody who paid no attention to it, so he decided he was immaterial. But as he was still not quite sure, he went to the main station and began to circle round the groups of people there; evidently they didn't see him so he made up his mind that he was really invisible, and was circling each tree in a row of trees in front of the station when, he said, "Such a stupid ass of a policeman suddenly caught hold of me and put me into a lunatic asylum, upsetting my most serious experiment." Then he went on to tell me that he noticed afterwards in the clinic that they had mice particularly trained by the director in order to test whether he would be stupid enough to fall for their tricks. But he finally discovered that there were really no such mice—they were hallucinations—and thus realized that there must be something wrong with him. I said, "And you really could correct all your ideas?" "I corrected all of them." "Even the mice?" "Yes, they were all hallucinations but one, and that one was surely trained by the director." He was then a doctor who was carrying on his professional work, but he had retained that one thread: he held the whole string of delusions by the tail of that one mouse that surely had been trained by the director. Of course one knows in such a case that the whole matter has been condensed into a sort of corner, so that field is left clear for the time being; but that hole is open and the whole thing can swing out into consciousness again. About a year later he was as a matter of fact inundated by such delusions and was confined for life. You see, that is a very similar case.

Of course, here it is a sort of metaphor—it has not yet affected consciousness to such an extent that Nietzsche in person would feel a loss of gravity—but this peculiar loss of connection plays a great role with Nietzsche. He describes a similar feeling in a very beautiful poem about the mistral, for instance, where he becomes identical with the wind.<sup>1</sup> There are many passages in Zarathustra where we encounter the same symptom of insanity, but in that mitigated form of a speech metaphor which all too easily can become truth to him. For the time being, however, it is only a piece of psychological symbolism, but a very significant one, which in insanity describes the lost connection with reality. That marked phenomenon in schizophrenia, the loss of feeling rapport, is the same thing. One notices first a peculiar drop of feeling relation; either it becomes exaggerated or it becomes atrophied, no longer in tune with circumstances. It is as if other people or conditions had lost their specific psychological value so that consciousness becomes disorientated. Such cases no longer know how to deal with objects, human beings or objective situations; the function begins to fail which tells what these things mean or are worth. So the behavior of such people becomes inadequate; one first remarks inadequate feeling and then naturally judgment also goes wrong. It is something like a withdrawal of the psyche from its natural projections and expectations. It can also happen that the psyche withdraws from the natural facts of the body, from the instincts for instance; people don't feel hunger, or pain. They don't feel the weight of the body or perceive its condition; so more and more the psyche becomes isolated in itself and what then becomes of it we don't know. When we say that those people are insane, we must never forget that they are only insane in their effect; we don't know what is inside the psyche. There are cases where, by careful observation, we see that something in the psyche is functioning

It is exactly like certain spiritualistic experiments. I don't know whether you have read that quite interesting book, Science and the Future Life, by Hyslop, in which he quotes his experiments with Mrs. Piper.<sup>2</sup> She had a wonderfully developed animus called "the emperor group"—which shows very clearly the quality of her animus! But she understood it as a group of real spirits that were communicating with her. Hyslop made some very interesting discoveries; he describes the difficulties of ghosts who want to communicate with this world, for instance. When a ghost approaches the sphere of man, he contacts the psyche of the particular individual he wishes to talk to, and instantly becomes disorientated. He is influenced by the mental sphere of the individual and forgets everything he was going to say. Therefore, one of the helpful spirits of the emperor group advised an inexperienced spirit who wanted to manifest something, to learn it by heart and then to rush in and say it immediately, as quickly as possible, because otherwise he would lose his mind. As if, when entering a gathering where you wanted to say something definite, you were afraid you would be so influenced by the thoughts of others that you would forget your own, and so learned it by heart, and then rushed in and got off your sentence.

The same thing happens in insanity: people sometimes succeed in saying one or two sentences, or only a few words that are on the right line, and then they lose sight of the rest. Of course that is a common phenomenon even with normal people. How often have I heard a patient say, "I had made up my mind to tell you something last time, but as soon as I entered your office I entirely forgot it." I remember a case where that was quite usual; first she accused me of trying to shut her up though I had not said a word beyond, "How are you?" or "What are you bringing me today?" and then she lost her mind completely and talked of everything under the sun excepting what she meant to say. So I asked her to put it in a book and bring it to me. She promised she would but the next time she ran on completely wild till I said, "Now come, produce your book." And then she had forgotten the book! You see, that is like ghosts and insane people—only with insane people it goes a bit too far. They have the right intentions, something functions properly, but when they want to transmit their thought, in the attempt

I had a case of a woman who for many years was in an asylum completely insane, but occasionally she heard voices that talked absolutely normally. She always got caught in the delusion and the artificial kind of speech they have and could not express herself, but one day she suddenly in an angry way shook her head and said somebody had called her to the telephone. I asked her what had been said, and after a long hesitation she came out with it, that somebody, a very foolish person, had made the remark, "You are leading the doctor by the nose through the whole wood." Another time she was complaining that she was not insane and should not be in the lunatic asylum; it was most unjust and the other people were all mad, when the telephone rang and the voice said: "But it is perfectly evident that you belong in the lunatic asylum because you are crazy." Of course that was just nonsense to her, but it showed me that her normality had withdrawn into the realm of voices—that is, her insanity had already inundated the sphere in which there had been a normal ego. There was no vestige of a normal ego any longer except that psyche which had withdrawn still further and was only to be discovered through the telephone.

As long as such normality exists, we know that there is somewhere normal functioning, normal orientation. That explains why, under certain conditions, when such people have a very serious physical illness, for instance, they suddenly become normal. There was a man who had never spoken a reasonable word for many years; we always had to keep him in the ward for the excitable cases, but when he got typhoid fever he became entirely normal, very nice and full of understanding. For six weeks, as long as the fever lasted, he was all right. We had become quite accustomed to it and thought he must be cured, but one morning when I came to his bed again, he greeted me in the same old way, as one of the dog and monkey host—he always greeted the doctors like that—so I knew he was back again at his old game. The moment he recovered from his fever he fell back into insanity. And where had his normality gone? It had drawn back and left the field to the goblins. So we have no justification for assuming that insane people are completely destroyed. The last thing we have been able to discover is that their normal psyche simply withdraws, is not on the job, not in the house—unless perhaps in the cellar or the attic. Or it may be outside somewhere and only able to reach home by telephone; so the normal self can ring up at times, but the goblin that is dwelling in the house gets very angry if the former inhabitant disturbs him.

It has often been said that there were traces of such a withdrawal in Nietzsche's insanity, and I don't wonder. There are still people who are convinced that it was not real insanity, but a state of ekstasis of a most mysterious nature, that he simply left the level of the ordinary mind and went into a higher region where there was no return, and that we were fools not to understand what he was doing. The only tangible thing which I ever heard of his condition in that respect, which might point to such a peculiar withdrawal, is that, after he had left the clinics in Basel and Jena and was living with his sister in Weimar, he once suddenly said to her in a very quiet voice, apparently perfectly collected, "Has not everything become quite different and are we not quite happy now?" But the next moment he was gone; it was just as if that withdrawn psyche of his had come back and declared itself, as if it could use the wire for a moment, and then the clouds drew in and he was gone again. This would be nothing extraordinary, however; already in former centuries it was well known by doctors that physical illness apparently cured insanity, and they therefore applied certain means to cause pain or fever, having observed that their patients then became more normal. They used to rub an ointment which caused ulceration of the skin into the heads of insane people, assuming that the evil vapors or humors or whatever was the cause of the insanity could thereby escape, and they would then become normal again. And there was some truth in it.

Now we will go on to the following chapters, "The Tree on the Hill." This is the next picture in the great stream of images from the collective unconscious as they represented themselves in changing form to the conscious perception: each chapter is a new phase of the unconscious development. We saw the connection between "The Pale Criminal" and the chapter on "Reading and Writing," and now we must make the bridge to this picture of "The Tree on the Hill." To know the connection, one must consider the main ideas alluded to in the last sentences of the previous chapter. What idea is paramount there?

Miss Hannah: Having no weight.

Prof. Jung: Yes, flying, moving like a bird, like a wisp of air or a cloud.

Miss Hannah: Then he comes to the tree, a rooted thing which cannot move.

Prof. Jung: Exactly. The tree is that living thing which is forced to remain where it grew; it cannot withdraw its roots for they are vital, but can only live when it has its roots in the earth. So the tree is the absolute opposite of a flying, airlike being, far more than an animal because practically all animals, even a snake, can move. Then the tree symbolizes something quite specific?

Mrs. Crowley: It is a symbol of psychical life.

Prof. Jung: Of course it all depends upon how you define psychical life—no easy matter.

Miss Hannah: You usually use it as the symbol for the impersonal life, the life that one gets through taking up the other side of the psyche.

Prof. Jung: But why should not any animal represent the impersonal life just as well?

Miss Hannah: Because a tree is a rooted thing, whereas an animal can walk off.

Prof. Jung: But you can impersonally walk off as well as remain rooted.

Mrs. Baumann: Plant life develops in a spiral and is before animal life; in the past Seminars it has always been used that way. And in the East it is a symbol for development.

Prof. Jung: Well, sure enough, the tree being a plant represents a very different kind of life from an animal; usually warm-blooded animals have red blood for instance, so the plant must represent a life which is really quite strange to what we would call life. And since such a symbol is used and always has been used by the collective unconscious, we must assume that we have some notion within of a kind of life in ourselves which is not animal life. This is of course a very bold hypothesis, but what do we know, after all? We know very little of life. Our hypothesis is that our unconscious produces evidence of facts; and our hypothesis further says we can make use of the evidence produced by the unconscious in order to conclude hypothetically about certain conditions, say, which are absolutely unknown to us. So if the unconscious speaks of a tree, and surrounds that symbol with all sorts of signs of importance—the magic tree for example, the tree that speaks, or the tree in which the gods live—then we can make the further hypothesis that this symbol refers to a peculiar type of life within our animal life, a sort of life absolutely strange to our own, which can most probably be expressed by plant life.

Now, if you assume that the life of the collective unconscious is life in general, not only the life of the human species but perhaps also of animals, monkeys, horses, elephants, snakes even, then why not go further and include the life of plants? Why not assume that they are at the very foundation of our life, engrammes or archetypes which contain also the potentiality of plant life? For surely our planet is characterized by plant life as well as animal life, and there are even quite a number of animals that are alternatingly plants and animals. For instance, take the simple case of the algae, which one finds in fountains or ponds, that green spirogyra which makes clouds in the water. It consists of microscopic threads and it is indubitably plant, but it produces cells, young spores with a tail which moves like the motor organ of the Flagellata, and they have a little red eye but are not rooted at all. They swim about quite happily and behave exactly like animals; you could hardly say they were plants. They are animals, and they travel about in the water and seek a place to settle. After a while a new instinct grows in them and they sit down upon a rock and make roots and are plants. Then there are many animals that resemble plants and are rooted like plants, like the sea anemones. So animal life and plant life in their primitive stages interpenetrate. This shows that they are not absolutely different, despite the fact that the results of their long differentiation are utterly unlike each other; in their most primitive forms they are one. Therefore, it is not inadmissible to assume that if there are archetypes at all, there are also archetypes of plant life. At all events these archetypes always introduce the idea of an entirely different life of which one has had no knowledge, a life which is in principle utterly different from animal life. So after that chapter on flying, that dangerous attempt to leap off into the heaven of insanity, it is no wonder that we have now the enantiodromia, a chapter about the tree which is rooted in the earth, the absolute opposite.

That loss of the sense of gravity is, as I said, a most alarming symptom; such a condition is an exaggeration of animal life, as if the animal were leaving the earth, overcoming the body. It is an ecstatic condition utterly unlike the life of the plant, which changes only with the seasons, and is extraordinarily slow and static. The curve of animal life is a more restless sort of growth, but it decreases and becomes sterilized a long time before it reaches the end; it ends like the sun or the day or the seasons. The character of animal life is really a curve, while the plant's growth is quite steady, ever-increasing, going on flowering and producing fruit until death suddenly occurs. In the last chapter we saw that these ups and downs are dangerously increasing. When he goes up, he almost leaps into heaven, so we may expect a counter move of the unconscious; if it is not a completely destructive affair, we may expect almost with certainty a compensatory dream containing the symbols that ought to cure this ecstatic condition, which, no matter how beautiful it looks, is abnormal. This is not the philistine conception of ecstasy, but is a fact; leaving the body is always a dangerous enterprise, and making it an ideal or calling it by beautiful names means cultivating a dangerous state of unreality. But of course we have many things in our civilization which help such an attitude; it sounds so marvelous, wonderful, grand. And naturally when we evaporate, or distil, or sublimate, we can be sure that everybody is quite satisfied that somebody else evaporates, because then there is more room for themselves. Schopenhauer says man's egotism is so great that he could kill his brother merely in order to smear his boots with his brother's fat,<sup>3</sup> which is a very cynical way of putting it, but there is something in it; man is nothing very elegant. Now the first sentence of the new chapter is, Zarathustra's eye had perceived that a certain youth avoided him.

This is a drop into a story, as if Nietzsche had discovered a story or a drama unacknowledged in himself and dropped into the midst of it; we have not heard of that young man before, nor that there was any such situation. We have been moving in an almost completely abstract sphere of potentialities where nothing was tangible, and now suddenly he seems to be on earth and a certain young man avoids him.

And as he walked alone one evening over the hills surrounding the town called "The Pied Cow," behold, there found he the youth sitting leaning against a tree, and gazing with wearied look into the valley. Zarathustra therefore laid hold of the tree beside which the youth sat, and spake thus: . . .

Who would that remarkable young man be?

Mrs. Sigg: It might be Nietzsche, because he says to Zarathustra in the same chapter that it is he who has destroyed him; or it might represent in some way the ideal of his mother's and sister's animus.

Prof. Jung: Now keep that in mind; that is not so bad!

Miss Hannah: I thought it was his actual body.

Prof. Jung: Well, if you keep to the old tradition of pneumatikos, psychikos, and hylikos (material man),<sup>4</sup> where would you put the young man?

<sup>3</sup> This is not the first time Jung has thus cited Schopenhauer, but the quotation has never been traced.

<sup>4</sup> The tradition of the tripartite self goes back at least to Homer who spoke of the Psyche, Nous, and Thumos, that is (roughly) spirit, soul, and body, which by the time of

Miss Hannah: With the material man, the body.

Prof. Jung: And where would you put Zarathustra?

Miss Hannah: Up as high as possible.

Prof. Jung: Yes, of course he would be the pneumatikos.

Miss Wolff: I think this would be just the normal young man whom Nietzsche never lived.

Prof. Jung: Presumably something of the sort; therefore, we could easily put him down to hylikos; he lives in muladhara, in this world.

Mrs. Fierz: But could he not as well be psychikos, the one who feels individually about it?—because when Zarathustra flies up so high, then his own soul, his own life, becomes very sad.

Prof. Jung: The two of them might feel sad. The hylikos will feel sad because he is left behind, being the first to notice that something is amiss; and the psychikos will feel sad too because on another plane he feels the failing connection with life and surroundings and other people. So I think we can say it is all the lower parts, for Zarathustra not only leaves the body, but also leaves the human sphere which would be the psychikós.

Prof. Fierz: But why should it be a young man?

Mrs. Fierz: He is young because it is the un-lived life.

Prof. Jung: People who have not lived often remain young. It is thought to be a great advantage.

Mrs. Sigg: I think that if Zarathustra represents the father in Nietzsche, the young man represents the son: there are two archetypes in him.

Prof. Jung: Yes, but Zarathustra, as archetype, is not felt as being the father of Nietzsche; Nietzsche identifies with him as the old wise man. Of course we could say this young man is the son, and that Zarathustra takes him in a paternal way, but that is something else. Zarathustra would be the archetype of the old wise man, and the young man, one could say, would be the inexperienced youth, the disciple.

Mrs. Sigg: The figure tends to be human.

Prof. Jung: He would be the human thing that has not been lived enough, not developed. We will see now how it works out in the text. Zarathustra says,

“If I wished to shake this tree with my hands, I should not be able to do so.

Plato's Republic had become more clearly differentiated into the appetitive, the spirited, and the rational.

But the wind, which we see not, troubleth and bendeth it as it listeth. We are sorest bent and troubled by invisible hands."

What does he mean by that rather cryptic remark?

Prof. Reichstein: I think he describes his own condition.

Prof. Jung: Exactly, that is just his case. The tree, being the tree of life, represents the thing which is rooted in life, which cannot escape from the place where it has been placed; and that life is surely badly twisted and badly treated by the wind, the pneumatikos Zarathustra. It is the condition of the hylikos tormented by the pneumatikos. And where does this sentence come from? It is almost a quotation.

Mrs. Baumann: From the Bible. "The wind bloweth where it listeth."

Miss von König: Formerly it was translated: Der Geist geistet wo er will.

Prof. Jung: Yes, because in the Greek text it is pneuma, the Holy Ghost, so it can be translated either as wind or spirit; they are essentially the same.

Thereupon the youth arose disconcerted, and said: "I hear Zarathustra and just now was I thinking of him!" Zarathustra answered:

"Why are thou frightened on that account?—But it is the same with man as with tree.

The more he seeketh to rise into the height and light, the more vigorously do his roots struggle earthward, downward, into the dark and deep—into the evil."

This is just what we were speaking of: when the movement goes too high, there will be a compensatory movement downwards into the earth. It is the animal type of life that rises, and the plantlike type of life emphasizes itself as going into the dark, even into evil. That throws a light upon the functional meaning of the chapter about the pale criminal, and also on that interesting allusion to the black cloud in the chapter on reading and writing.

Mrs. Sigg: Nietzsche was in criminal depths in the chapter about the pale criminal, and it is a strange fact that in Nietzsche's real illness he behaved in a way like a tree. In December/January [1888-89] he fell ill. He then first had the feeling of being very light and was sometimes in a state of great ekstasis, when he actually danced like a god; and his sister said that for five years Nietzsche always got ill in December/January.

Prof. Jung: One observes that in other cases too. When the energy of the sun is lowest and night seems to prevail is the time of evil ghosts.

The approach of Christmas is particularly haunted and I have seen cases that produced most horrible dreams just then; everything that is characteristic of night, the unconscious, is then nearer to the conscious and threatens to overwhelm it. That probably happened in Nietzsche's case too. But what I meant to point out is that as the tree compensates Zarathustra's ekstasis, its roots must go much further down in order to compensate that height. In the chapter about the pale criminal he begins really to rise and to remove himself from crime and evil; because he is the pale criminal he cannot stand the sight of evil so he tried to leave that sphere; and in the next chapter about reading and writing he already has that dark sphere below his feet, the black thunder-cloud of which people are afraid. Then he leaps up into the air and overcomes the darkness and the heaviness; that falls away from him, and then comes the problem: if one leaps too high, the counter move will follow. Now, you remember that in the beginning of the book we dealt with a particular fateful moment.

Mrs. Baynes: Do you mean the rope-dancer?

Prof. Jung: Yes: "High throweth thou thy stone but it will fall back upon thee." That is the ekstasis, leaping high into the air, and then crashing down. And here the tree appears in order to convey the message to Zarathustra that the higher it grows, the deeper its roots will reach; if he were like a tree, he would not leap into the air because he would think in the same moment of sending his roots deeper down; if he rises to heaven his roots will touch hell. That is exactly what he ought to know and what he does not know. Also the tree carries the message that it is rooted in earth and has to stand every storm, even the storm of the spirit which Zarathustra does not stand—well, one should say "Nietzsche" here, though he is identical with Zarathustra. Nietzsche cannot resist the storm; he is tossed about like a dry leaf, and that is just the danger. But the tree, though badly tormented and mangled, resists it. So the tree says to Zarathustra: "You should resist all the moving powers of the earth and the air in order to maintain your position." But you know when the spirit moves us we think it is particularly fine, highly respectable: everybody wishes to be moved by the spirit. You can read your own story in the Old and the New Testament. And we do not realize that it is a danger at the same time; it is an elemental power, after all. Therefore the spirit is wind and wind is spirit.

Mrs. Sigg: Is the tree not the symbol for the kind of object that takes its nourishment both out of the soil and out of the air?

Prof. Jung: Yes, the tree makes a connection with two worlds; the branches above are the growth in the air through the life-giving breath of the spirit above, and the roots are nourished with the juice of the earth, sucking up all the nourishing minerals and the water. So the tree is a very beautiful and complete symbol. But we must bear in mind that the tree symbolizes life that is utterly strange to the animal mind; when the symbol of the tree appears, it means that a new form of life appears. It is as if within the animal life of man a new type of life would then begin. One finds that idea expressed in every mystery cult; initiation means introducing a man to another type of life which he has not known before, and it is understood by primitives that man is only a man when he has that knowledge, when he knows the other side too. This is called the life of the spirit but it is not only spirit, but also the earth. It is an entirely new attitude to heaven and earth, the relationship of the tree that lives by air or light as well as through the soil. An animal is a parasite on plants, but the plant feeds upon the original elements; an animal is already a derivative, a sort of louse living on plants, and we human beings, inasmuch as we are animals, are also parasites. So we should know the second life; in the new second life we should return to that state of being which assimilates the original elements and can feed from non-organic matter. That is a very important point of view symbolically.

"Yea, into the evil!" cried the youth. "How is it possible that thou hast discovered my soul?"

Zarathustra smiled and said: "Many a soul one will never discover, unless one first invent it."

What does he mean by that?

Mrs. Sigg: Something extremely important, because really what you call discovering a soul can only be done by inventing; our individuality is something you must really invent. Nietzsche was always identified with other people, with his father for instance, and he did not invent his own individuality.

Prof. Jung: You are quite right. You know the word invent comes from the Latin word invenire; venire means to come and invenire means to enter. So to invent a new form of life means to come into a new kind of life. And it is as if that new kind of life did not exist in itself, at least not for you; it is utterly strange, a life you don't know and apparently do not contact. It is so far away that you have to find it, invenire, to invent it; you have to go into it in order to know it. This idea is also expressed in the initiations by the idea of the quest, a sort of voyage of exploration or invention: you seek in order to find that new thing. It may be the quest of a knight errant who seeks the Holy Sepulchre or the Holy Grail, or who seeks dangers in order to develop his courage; or it may mean seeking the hidden treasure, or how to make gold. All these different metaphors mean the same thing, namely, the way of invention, the way of finding, and that finding consists in inventing the thing which has apparently not yet been. But the very word, to invent, means to go into it; when you invent a thing you literally go into something which already does exist though not yet visible. It is as if you were going into a house which you have not seen before, and so you conclude that you invented it, but it was there long before you were born—you simply happened to find it. The German word for invent is erfinden, which means the thorough finding; it was there already and it was just for you to find it; you didn't make it, you simply found it. So the invention of the soul means that you find the soul, that you come into it; but it is already there.

That is what Zarathustra alludes to here—that the soul, meaning of course the secret life of man, always has to be invented or it would not exist. And it is a true psychological statement that there are no psychical contents which have not to be invented, as long as they are unconscious. For when you are unconscious of a thing, it really does not exist for you; it is not in your world. If you want to find it you have to invent it, and then it is. But it has already existed; you cannot invent a psychical thing which has not existed before, but only come into it. Take, for instance, the concept of animus and anima; it is always there, everybody can see it. Only those who are possessed by it have never noticed it. They say, “I have invented it,” and that is right; I came into it and you have come into it too. For one must first invent it in order to see what a thing is.

LECTURE V

5 June 1935

Prof. Jung:

Mrs. Baumann asks what the difference is between the figure of the old wise man in Nietzsche's Zarathustra, and the old wise man in the woman's fantasies which we dealt with in a former seminar.<sup>1</sup> Of course there is a considerable difference between that figure as it appears in a woman's case and in a man's case. In a man it is as a rule the typical archetype, but Nietzsche's Zarathustra is not the typical old wise man; only in certain places is he typical, which comes from the fact that Nietzsche himself is identical with him, thus blurring the picture. Then the archetype gets mixed up with personal traits which ordinarily it would not contain. The figure of the old wise man is much rarer in a woman and not so typical, because wisdom in her case is usually connected with the archetypal earth mother. In the particular case to which Mrs. Baumann refers, the old wise man was not typical, but was falsified, because we had to deal there with a rather formidable animus that was very much against the woman's instincts and interfered with the feminine side of her character. There was a very marked masculine tendency which reinforced the figure of the animus; this is the reason why the wise old man appeared at all. With a very feminine woman, the archetype of wisdom would always be connected with the mother, and the father image would appear in the animus. Therefore, to take the figure of the wise old man in either of these two cases as typical is a mistake. I think we are quite safe in assuming that the particular element of wisdom in a woman's case is associated with the mother archetype, the so-called earth mother, and in a man's case with the fatherlike figure, the typical wise old man. The usual sequence of these images in a woman, the way in which they appear empirically, is, first, the animus as a personification of the unconscious, and then wisdom in the form of the mother. In a man it is just the reverse: the anima first appears as a personification of the unconscious and the element of wisdom in the form of the old wise man. So when we speak of the old wise man we usually mean the figure as it appears in a man, but a certain exaggeration of the animus can produce that archetype in a woman, as the mother archetype may appear in a man. For example, one finds the motif of the earth mother in the Nordic myth of Wotan who goes to Erda in order to inquire about the future, to learn the wisdom of the mother.<sup>2</sup> But the earth mother is a sort of pale archetype in a man which does not function as it functions in a woman. And, though the archetype of the wise old man does exist in a woman, it has little practical importance. We will go on now with the chapter called, "The Tree upon the Hill":

"Yea, into the evil!" cried the youth. "How is it possible that thou hast discovered my soul?"

Zarathustra smiled, and said: "Many a soul one will never discover, unless one first invent it."

"Yea, into the evil!" cried the youth once more.

"Thou saidst the truth, Zarathustra. I trust myself no longer since I sought to rise into the height, and nobody trusteth me any longer; how doth that happen?

I change too quickly: my to-day refuteth my yesterday. I often overleap the steps when I clamber; for so doing, none of the steps pardon me.

When aloft, I find myself always alone. No one speaketh unto me: the frost of solitude maketh me tremble. What do I seek on the height?

My contempt and my longing increase together; the higher I clamber, the more do I despise him who clambereth. What doth he seek on the height?

How ashamed I am of my clambering and stumbling! How I mock at my violent panting! How I hate him who flieth! How tired I am on the height!"

What is the meaning of these paragraphs? What is the youth complaining about?

Mrs. Baynes: I think he complains because he has the sense of not taking the whole of himself along when he tries to climb.

Prof. Jung: But what is it that impresses him obviously?

Mrs. Baynes: That he is completely by himself first of all, and the fact that he is not at one with himself on account of the one-sidedness; he is only on the side of the Geist.

Prof. Jung: Yes, he went up a bit too far and was dancing on clouds, and here comes the recognition which is symbolized by the youth. And who would the youth be?

Miss Hannah: Nietzsche, I suppose.

Prof. Jung: Well, Nietzsche is every figure, as we know, so it can only be a particular part.

Prof. Reichstein: He is the natural part.

Prof. Jung: Yes, he shows a very natural reaction; he is very much in doubt about Zarathustra's leap. Of course he has participated in it, but when Zarathustra was dancing on the clouds there was no youth. Now he appears under the symbol of the tree, and embodies the doubt really. And the fact that he is a youth would symbolize what?

Prof. Reichstein: He is not yet developed; he is young in contrast to Zarathustra.

Prof. Jung: Yes. As the archetype of the wise man Zarathustra is always old, but at times, when he is too mixed up with Nietzsche, he begins to leap like a kitten and then he is absolutely ridiculous. Think of Zarathustra in long robes dancing and such nonsense!—the bad taste is already convincing. If he were young, yes, but one can imagine Zarathustra leaping about as little as one can Zoroaster the founder of a religion: he is obliged by his name to be dignified. So when he begins to dance it is comical; that is a sort of pathological element. You see, if Nietzsche were really insane when he talks in this ridiculous way, no reaction would be visible; it would be repressed. When Zarathustra leaps, he would get stuck in the air from that moment on—remain there and talk probably very high stuff, more and more unnatural, more and more crazy. But since Nietzsche is not yet insane, a natural reaction comes up within him, indicated by the title of this chapter, the tree, which is the symbol of just the opposite, of the thing that is rooted. And if he were insane, the young man would not exist. But Nietzsche cannot deny the existence of a contrasting figure; over against the old wise man there is a young man who is rather grieved with this pathological situation Zarathustra has brought about. It is as if he were taking the situation onto himself.

You see, the one that strove upwards was really Zarathustra. The young man was only tempted by Zarathustra to do something which, to a young man, would not have been so bad; if a young man becomes enthusiastic and loses the ground under his feet for a while, it is not dangerous: he is supposed to do that. But if Zarathustra leaps into the air, it is nonsense. And as the young man is identical with Zarathustra he feels the same compunction which Zarathustra feels. You see, Zarathustra says, "I change too quickly"—namely, Zarathustra came to that symbol of the tree, to the realization which is just in contrast to what he has been before, while the young man talks as if he were Zarathustra, and takes over the bad conscience which Zarathustra ought to feel for changing. Yesterday he danced on the clouds and today he contradicts himself, "My today refuteth my yesterday." Of course if Zarathustra thinks of himself as a hero, naturally he can do anything he wants, but a human being would be accused of absurd, paradoxical, irresponsible behavior. So the young man is that part of Nietzsche which is normal and which is not on a level with Zarathustra; he is a new edition of the pale criminal. You see, as soon as Zarathustra overreaches himself, up comes the figure of the pale criminal, the one who cannot stand the sight of himself, and is unable to remain at his own level because it is really too high. Now Zarathustra, contemplating the tree by which they stood, said:

"This tree standeth lonely here on the hills; it hath grown up high above man and beast.

And if it wanted to speak, it would have none who could understand it: so high hath it grown.

Now it waiteth and waiteth,—for what doth it wait? It dwelleth too close to the seat of the clouds; it waiteth perhaps for the first lightning?"

What does it mean that Zarathustra emphasizes just this particular quality—that the tree stands isolated upon a hill?

Dr. Schlegel: It is the situation of Zarathustra himself.

Prof. Jung: Yes, and inasmuch as Nietzsche is identical with Zarathustra, it is Nietzsche's own situation. You see, this is a very particular conflict; the youth would be the ordinary human being who has common sense and knows quite well that jumping into the air means coming down again, that one will surely have a reaction. But Zarathustra is not an ordinary human being, but something inhuman or superhuman; hence the idea of the Superman. Yet that element which builds up Zarathustra is a living reality in Nietzsche, and it takes him far up into the clouds. Inasmuch as Zarathustra is a real fact in Nietzsche, he is like the tree which stands alone upon the mountain high above ordinary humanity. So here a sort of differentiation takes place; first Zarathustra tries to get higher and higher, and that is criticized by this chapter, which points out that this is unnatural behavior. It is approaching insanity.

That leaping into the air contains a kernel of truth, then. It corresponds to the reality in Nietzsche himself; there is an extraordinary genius in Nietzsche which could be compared to a being high above ordinary mankind. But these comical jumps and jerks are due to the fact that the ordinary man wants to jump up too, and then it becomes grotesque. If that ordinary man could only remain quiet and stay below in the valley, not trying to imitate Zarathustra, the whole thing would be acceptable: that would be the normal condition. The tree can stand up there because it is a tree, not human but a symbol of growth, while the human being is down below in the valley. But because Nietzsche identifies with Zarathustra, it cannot be a tree; it must necessarily be a human being who overreaches himself, and in that act it is like Zarathustra dancing, walking on air, which is absurd. That is all a consequence of the fact that Nietzsche identifies with Zarathustra, and also with the young man, and naturally the young man is identical with Zarathustra and takes over all the compunction Zarathustra ought to feel for that absurd behavior before. So a general mixup is created. To restore the natural and human situation, you must make a difference between Nietzsche and Zarathustra, Nietzsche being the human individual and Zarathustra the archetype that is rooted in humanity since eternity—and because he has roots, he is like a tree.

There are peculiar trees in the Bush which grow to a height of sixty or seventy meters and are considered to be sacred; they reach far above ordinary trees and usually they are haunted by ghosts or demons that have voices, and the voices must be obeyed. In India, certain trees are thought to be inhabited by the trimurti, the Indian Trinity; and usually they have in the villages an asvatta tree, the sacred tree of Buddha, sometimes with a hole in the trunk which is supposed to be inhabited by the deity, or the deity may live in the branches. It is the same idea as the Bush soul, of course with a certain differentiation. The Bush souls of primitives are thought to inhabit certain animals with whom they are then related. If the tiger contains a man's Bush soul then that man is the brother of the tiger—or the python, or the crocodile; and the Bush soul, under a different aspect, lives in certain plants or stones or rivers, and then he is the brother of that river or whatever it is. All that simply means the recognition that a part of the human psyche is essentially not human. It is naturally not what primitives assume it to be, but is a fact which we would call a projection—and we no longer know that projection, we are unconscious of it. I think I have never met a European who was aware of having a Bush soul, but I am a bit doubtful: there are cases that approach it. Then there is another phenomenon of the Bush soul which is very marked with us. Do you know how that is experienced? You see, when the gods disappear from rivers and trees and mountains and animals, they become most banal.

Miss Wolff: Is it when objects become animated, as in occult phenomena, for instance?

Prof. Jung: Yes, there are very obvious cases when pieces of furniture, certain pictures, etc., behave in a very funny way. One sees that in parapsychology, and of course the lowest form is the Tücke des Objekts, when objects play tricks upon you. Another example would be our peculiar dependence upon objects: we are quite unhappy if we are without certain objects which are dear to us—people are sometimes utterly lost without them. You know that famous story about Kant: his Bush soul, outside of himself, which always directed him, was the topmost button on the coat of one of his listeners who attended his lectures very regularly year after year. He used to walk up and down continuously gazing upon that topmost button; he developed all his thoughts out of it, and once when it was missing Kant could not deliver his lecture. He was completely put off because the god was absent. A primitive would have realized it, and would have said, “This button is sacred, a fetish, and please take care to always bring it with you to inspire me or I am lost.” Kant of course never would have thought of such a thing, but it is the truth. It can take many other forms. There is a story that Schiller could not write unless he smelt the peculiar odor of rotting apples, so he always had apples in a drawer of his writing table. And peculiar habits can take the place of such a fetish. We belittle these things because they are so utterly banal; we think it is merely curious, but if we look at them from the functional standpoint, we see that they plan an important part in the functioning of the psyche of those people. For instance, if one of Kant’s audience had been absent, or if instead of having fifty he had had only one or two, he would have been able to lecture—and if he had been ill he probably would have been able to lecture—but when that button wasn’t there, he could not. He had another Bush soul in the church tower which he saw from the window of his study; he was always looking at it, and when it was taken down, he was incapacitated for months because he had no point de repère. Because the Bush soul phenomenon is a sort of point de repère, primitives always have such things—like a shrine or the churinga of the Central Australian aborigines for instance—and inasmuch as it does function, they assume rightly that it is filled with life, that it contains soul. It is the same thing when one can develop a problem more easily when talking to somebody; even if one's partner in the discussion does not fully understand the argument, it is enough that one talks to somebody for things to become much clearer. Sometimes grateful people say, "When I talk to you I always get a new thought, presuming that the partner is producing that thought or has a certain effect upon them."

So our point of view concerning the tree is that Nietzsche has a Bush soul which is identical with the archetype of the wise old man, and this chapter should inform him of the fact that the wise old man is not human, but is also of the nature of the tree, and one therefore cannot identify with him. The Hindus, for instance, think that the gods are more or less identical with trees, or that they live in certain animals, showing that they are not human. Therefore, to dream of animals or impressive plants means dreaming of the deity, because these things are not human. So nothing could inform Nietzsche better than this identity with the tree; the right thoughts are there but the conclusions are wrong. It is true of course that the tree is also human inasmuch as it is Zarathustra who is human-like; it is an account of the human likeness that Nietzsche is tempted to identify with it. As men think they can identify with the anima who is not quite human: she is also a kind of Bush soul; a man possessed by the anima is just a piece of something that you can no longer talk to. And when a woman identifies with the animus without thinking, she identifies with the Bush soul, and then she is not quite human and loses human contact. Any decent discussion ceases instantly when the anima or animus enters the game. Now Zarathustra, inasmuch as he is not identical with Nietzsche, realizes here his own nature. This chapter is like a dream in which Nietzsche, the dreamer, is informed that Zarathustra is a tree and if he only could understand that, he would no longer identify and all these absurdities would come to an end—his conflict would come to an end. It would be better to assume that he was the young man, but he need not descend as far as that, because he was no longer the young man when he wrote Zarathustra. He should be his own age, neither young nor old, neither an embryo nor five thousand years old.

Prof. Reichstein: Would it not be more natural if instead of the young man a woman's figure would come?

Prof. Jung: That would be an identification with the anima.

Prof. Reichstein: Yes, but the young man is a kind of compensation, and the real compensation would be the anima here.

Prof. Jung: No, that would be an entirely different conflict, one between the wise old man and the anima. But you see, that conflict is settled, for when the anima is rescued out of the brothel of the world, she follows the wise old man, as his sibylla, his somnambule. If the anima is in the brothel the old wise man does not exist; he can only appear when the anima is redeemed from the brothel. Of course she would be the complete opposite of the wise old man when she is in the brothel, but then the opposition is so complete that the other part is invisible.<sup>4</sup>

Prof. Fierz: I should like to point out another thing in connection with the big tree. The Sequoia trees in the Yosemite valley, which are the biggest in the world, are considered especially sacred because they have been struck so many times by lightning. And the guide told us that the Red Indians made their fires near those trees in a storm; they believed Manitu spoke to the trees in the flashes of lightning and they were protected. He said that was a very natural superstition, for the trees are so big that they must be struck often by lightning.

Prof. Jung: Well, in the next paragraph you have it: he says such trees are struck by lightning. What does Zarathustra mean by that?

Prof. Reichstein: I think it is inspiration.

Prof. Jung: On one side, it is inspiration. As the archetype of the old wise man is a further bridge to the depths of the unconscious, he is supposed to know the great secrets and to have divine inspiration which could come to him in the form of lightning. As a rule, lightning is dangerous even to a big tree—it can kill it—but if the tree is old enough and big enough it only injures it slightly. But can the human being that is identical with the archetype of the wise old man stand the lightning from heaven?

Mrs. Fierz: No, he will be killed.

Prof. Jung: Of course. One should not identify with such a peculiar old tree; for in such a position it is easily struck by lightning—almost as if it were meant to be struck. One even plants trees as a protection against lightning because they attract it; tree tops are good conductors, real foundations of electric currents. The outpour of electricity at the top of a tree during a thunderstorm is amazing, and under certain conditions one sees the fire of St. Elmo, the strange fire which is sometimes seen on top of the masts of ships.<sup>5</sup> That is merely the current which comes out of the tops of things during an electrically charged condition; of course where the positive current of electricity from the earth streams out, it makes the point of attraction for the lightning coming down from the clouds. The usual danger of this archetype is that the divine inspiration or manifestation, the creative impulse, strikes there first, and therefore wisdom is needed where there are such thunderstorms. People who are not exposed to storms are never in need of wisdom—it is quite superfluous—a mere luxury, but a man like Nietzsche would need it because he is always threatened by storms, having this tremendous opposition in his nature. Whoever possesses such widely separated pairs of opposites will be in danger of the lightning on account of the electrical charges, and it will always hit the topmost point. Then the archetype of the wise old man is animated because wisdom must come to one's aid, otherwise one is insufficiently protected. Now what are the streaks of lightning in our psychological language? Inspiration has been mentioned but inspiration is not as destructive or dynamic as lightning.

Mr. Allemann: An explosion of the collective unconscious.

Prof. Jung: But how does it appear empirically?

Mrs. Fierz: As panic.

Prof. Jung: Yes, a brainstorm, or a sudden most dangerous impulse, an obsession or a possession—or an immediate certainty of what you are going to do. When the collective unconscious comes up and breaks into your life, it is as if it were a thunder-cloud out of which leaps the lightning. That means a tremendous impulse, a dynamic explosion in your system, and if you are lacking in wisdom you meet that tension with a brain box which is much too small, and usually it is isolated against the earth: then you get it! Therefore if you are wise, you will have a wide surface and be well connected with the earth; then you are reasonably protected against the danger of the lightning. Not always though. So, as Mr. Allemann rightly remarked, it is a condition, an assault or an immediate explosion in which one is suddenly overwhelmed by the collective unconscious; to call it inspiration is pretty mild: it doesn't fully describe the danger of such an event.

<sup>5</sup> An electrical display caused by the proximity of a cloud to pointed objects such as a ship's mast. St. Elmo is a patron saint of sailors.

When Zarathustra had said this, the youth called out with violent gestures: "Yea, Zarathustra, thou speakest the truth. My destruction I longed for, when I desired to be on the height, and thou art the lightning for which I waited! Lo! what have I been since thou hast appeared amongst us? It is mine envy of thee that hath destroyed me!"—Thus spake the youth, and wept bitterly. Zarathustra, however, put his arm about him, and led the youth away with him.

This paragraph corroborates what we have been saying. The young man identified himself with Zarathustra. Zarathustra was the temptation for him, he strove to be like him; and then Zarathustra became his danger: the archetype broke in upon him. You see, the ordinary man Nietzsche went too far. That is again a sort of prophecy that in the near future the collective unconscious will send this lightning to destroy Nietzsche. Therefore Zarathustra is compared to the thunder-cloud.

Mrs. Baumann: He also says, "I am the lightning."

Prof. Jung: Yes, and that means the dangerous invasion. You know, the archetype in itself does not mean invasion and destruction; it is eternally quiet unless it becomes constellated, stirred up by the misbehavior of man. If a man leaves too many things to the unconscious and so gets into a tight corner, the archetype begins to stir as if in compensation. And then if he thinks what a devil of a fellow he is to have such a good idea, well, there he is! He is identifying with the source of his idea and becomes too big. The lightning has struck him and he is done for. You see the youth says, "It is mine envy of thee that hath destroyed me!" That is very clear: he wanted to be like Zarathustra but Zarathustra did not allow him to remain normal; the young man did not realize what a terrible danger he was incurring by identifying with an archetype.

Now here is a question by Mr. Allemann, "The problem of the anima rescued by the old man from the brothel of the world, has brought up in me the question of the meaning of the heavenly Sophia. Is she the identification of both old man and anima in the hierosgamos?"

It is true that the conception of Sophia in that Gnostic treatise, the Pistis Sophia, is the identity or the absolute union of the wise old man with the anima. If you study the anima problem you will surely see that peculiar development from Hawwah to Sophia, and such a development cannot be without the intervention of the wise old man. But the wise old man doesn't undergo such a development—he is not included in the world one could say, he is static; while the anima is very much involved in the world. That is the part of man which is partially of this earth—and it can be very much of this earth: she may be in the brothel of muladhara, muladhara at its worst. It is even very important that the anima is projected into the earth, that she descends very low, for otherwise her ascent to the heavenly condition in the form of Sophia has no meaning. There is no point in it. She is the one that is rooted in the earth as well as in the heaven, both root and branch of the tree.<sup>6</sup> The archetype of the old wise man, if looked at from the side of the anima, is always a secondary figure that only appears as the result, or as the divine intercession or intervention in the life and the development of the anima. In the end, inasmuch as the anima transforms into Sophia, there is no longer the wise old man or the anima because they become one. That is the problem of the hermaphrodite in alchemy, the union of the male and the female.

Mrs. Sigg: It seems so strange that Zarathustra does exactly the same thing that the anima does as Salome; it is horrible that the old wise man should be like a female dancer.<sup>7</sup>

Prof. Jung: Yes, it is one of those perversions—that is perfectly true; and it all comes from the fact that we have no anima in Zarathustra. Only very near the end anima figures appear in the erotic poem “Unter Töchtern der Wüste.”<sup>8</sup> We have here the most perverse phenomenon, the wise old man appearing as identical with Nietzsche himself without the anima. So it is quite unavoidable that Zarathustra sometimes shows symptoms of being the dancer, the anima. It takes the whole development of Zarathustra to call Nietzsche’s attention to the fact that there is an anima. Of course that has very much to do with his personal life, and it is of course also characteristic of the fact that the anima problem only reaches about as far as the Rhine. East of the Rhine the problem either of the wise old man or the Puer Aeternus comes up. The whole mental revolution in Germany is chiefly an activity of the Puer Aeternus, but there the wise old man is absent. Nietzsche's Zarathustra was an attempt to foresee and to compensate for the danger that his country would fall a victim to the Puer Aeternus, the boy.<sup>9</sup> That same problem is in Goetz's Das Reich ohne Raum, the kingdom within—of course it has nothing to do with the Christian kingdom of heaven—where there is a revolution of boys.<sup>10</sup> Nietzsche had so much foresight that he tried to compensate the coming events by a book of wisdom, but of course it was in vain. You see, the only possibility by which a Puer revolution can be avoided is the anima; without the anima it becomes unavoidable.

And when they had walked a while together, Zarathustra began to speak thus:

"It rendeth my heart. Better than thy words express it, thine eyes tell me all thy danger."

Here Zarathustra very clearly realizes the situation. He admits that he is having the same conflict as the young man; Zarathustra's heart is torn too: he knows what it means to the young man to be pulled up to the heights and not to be at one with himself. For Zarathustra is also not at one with himself inasmuch as he is Nietzsche. The Alpha and Omega of all the trouble with Nietzsche is of course that he is all the time identical with his figures, never separated from them. He has no psychological critique whatever and so he cannot give them their true value; he cannot conceive of a psychological existence that is not himself, not his consciousness. But that is all a consequence of his time. If he had been more modern, if he had had psychological critique, he would have said, "This spirit of Zarathustra is a tree spirit, but a spirit that takes me up to heaven and then lets me fall again is surely not myself: it is an elemental power to which I have fallen a victim."

Mrs. Adler: How does that agree with the idea of Nietzsche's function?

Prof. Jung: Zarathustra is the greatness in Nietzsche, the demon, and Nietzsche has the mission to write Zarathustra to compensate for the coming events in those people. But the way in which he tries to compensate is utterly inefficient on account of the fact that he identifies with Zarathustra. The prophet that identifies with Jahve makes a mistake; he can say he speaks the word which is given him by the Lord, but he must make a difference between himself and the Lord. When Nietzsche says, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," he means, "Thus Spake Nietzsche."

<sup>9</sup> Jung's large and nationally diverse clientele convinced him that there are cultural influences on the form a neurosis takes: thus, France seemed to produce more men who identify with man's feminine side, while Germany ran more to those who remain boys.

<sup>10</sup> Bruno Goetz's Das Reich Ohne Raum (1919) was interpreted in Jung's 1936 lecture on Wotan as an adumbration of Nazi Germany (CW 10, par. 384). Jung wrote a friend once about having a letter from Goetz, whom he refused to see: "The Herrenvolk has become obsolete; Herr Goetz still doesn't know that" (Letters, vol. I, p. 445).

Mrs. Sigg: In the biography of Nietzsche, I noticed that the minister at his father's funeral compared his father to a tree that had lost its leaves—the family had lost everything. It seems that Nietzsche from the very beginning got into an identification with his father; when he was a boy of four or five he was called the little minister because he was always preaching. He was very serious and behaved like an old man.

Prof. Jung: Yes, that must be expected because he was affected by that archetype from the very beginning, and circumstances helped it to a great extent. The extreme dependence upon authority was a typical German difficulty, however. It has taken an entirely different form now and is said to no longer exist, but it is still there in a different form. That is of course at the bottom of the whole trouble there—it is still the psychology of a young boy who has a father; for a time he pleases the father far too much, and then he displeases him entirely. It is the same mistake: the problem is still the father, and the mother does not exist yet; therefore, there is no anima in the whole game, exactly as in Nietzsche's case. There are surely two things in the world, the Yang and the Yin, the man and the woman, and if the woman is disregarded, it is a mistake. It is said, for instance, that the reason the Mithraic cult did not survive was that women were excluded; the women cultivated the Magna Mater and the men went to the Mithraic grottoes, and that accounts for the downfall. Whereas Christianity won out because man and woman were together in spite of the fact that Christianity is chiefly a masculine religion, a father religion, in which the feminine element, in the beginning at least, was little considered. Later on in the development of the Catholic church, it became much more prominent, but Protestantism has again done away with it. Protestantism generated a secret philosophy, however, where the feminine element was cultivated again, but with a sort of hostility; the main body of tradition in Freemasonry is based on the mother cult and it is therefore hostile to the church.

Dr. Schlegel: Is not the conception in the church itself, the church as the mother?

Prof. Jung: Yes, but that is abstract. The church has nothing to say, it is ruled by the Pope—the Pope and the College of Cardinals constitute the church.

Dr. Schlegel: That is true, but in the unconscious the church is the mother.

Prof. Jung: Well, it was the later psychological thought, the later Catholics, that brought in the feminine element, even using the symbols of the secret philosophy. The Litany of Loreto contains all the symbols of the secret philosophy, the hortus conclusus, and the rosa mystica, and the vas insigne devotionis, for example.<sup>11</sup>

Dr. Schlegel: Has not the church been represented as the bride of Jesus?

Prof. Jung: Oh yes, therefore they made use of “The Song of Songs,” which was originally an ordinary love song; there are a number of songs in worldly literature of the same style. But it was interpreted as a mystical relationship between man and God, or chiefly between man and Sophia. First it was in the secret traditions, and then in the Christian church it was used as a symbol of the relationship between Jesus and the church. You see, the symbols have been used, but all under the heading of the masculine deity; Mary never entered the Trinity, the feminine element was excluded. And even the Holy Ghost, in spite of the fact that it is symbolized by a dove, is made a neuter, a breath that creates father and son, but not the mother: that was refuted by the church. That one exception, the Theotokos, the idea that the mother of God was identical with Sophia, is heretical. Of course it makes a tremendous difference whether the female principle rules or not. The female principle is always contained—even in a male religion it comes in by a side way—but it makes a tremendous difference whether it is actually the ruling principle. If it is the ruling principle, or if there is at least the condominium of both principles,<sup>12</sup> it produces a religious form that is entirely different from the religion we know. If you study the religious psychology of Paul, you find the female principle still in operation, as in the idea, for instance, that those redeemed by love are beyond the Law.<sup>13</sup> That was Christ’s idea too, and that is typically feminine. The masculine point of view is the Law, but the point of view of love is of course feminine. The one is Logos and the other Eros. Well now, Zarathustra here shows clearly that he understands the peril in which the youth finds himself—the youth of course being the part of Nietzsche which simply cannot join in and which will be destroyed if he identifies with Zarathustra. He says,

“As yet thou art not free; thou still seekest freedom. Too unslept hath thy seeking made thee, and too wakeful.

On the open height wouldst thou be; for the stars thirsteth thy soul. But thy bad impulses also thirst for freedom.”

Here, one could say, the whole tragedy of Zarathustra begins. That young man is striving to identify with Zarathustra, to be a dweller on the heights and to be free from the fetters of the earth, but if he escapes the law of the earth he becomes an inhuman spirit: he will be struck by lightning and destroyed. Now why does he want that freedom? And freedom from what? Well, very obviously, as Zarathustra says, there are evil instincts below, the wild dogs:

“Thy wild dogs want liberty; they bark for joy in their cellar when thy spirit endeavoureth to open all prison doors.”

If you have the choice between the beautiful heights and the kennel full of wild dogs, then surely one can understand why a man wants to escape the kennel and make for the heights. It is as if there were an evil smell down below and naturally he seeks the pure light, so it is quite understandable that he would try to be above himself. But then he will identify with Zarathustra—he will be struck by lightning—so if he wants to live at all he must not seek such freedom. For if he contains wild dogs, evil instincts in his system, he is partially a wild dog and he should not try to escape from his own dog-likeness, he should remain there in his kennel. If he escapes the body, he will decay; he simply escapes life if he escapes the kennel. Now, it is most important that Zarathustra so gladly assumes that the thing down below in the valley must be a kennel full of wild dogs, for that is by no means certain. It might be horses and asses and cows, quite lovely things, perhaps some pigs too, and the whole makes a perfectly workable farm, exceedingly useful and also quite nice. Why just wild dogs? Why such a hysterical statement? What kind of psychology does such an assumption imply?

Miss Wolff: Christian.

Prof. Jung: Yes, it is late Christian psychology, or ordinary Protestant psychology—there is his father. To him the body is of course evil; one does not even look at it, but simply assumes it is wild dogs. But even if that were true, these dogs are a part of nature like wolves. Of course they are not just agreeable—there are nice animals and animals that are not so nice—but in themselves they are all right; wolves occasionally eat human beings if they are very hungry, but we also eat animals, and by the million, so we have absolutely no ground for blaming those animals for eating a man occasionally. So there is no reason why we should revile our instincts. They are just the ordinary appetites, just as bad and just as nice as the instincts of all nature. It is that particular moralistic Protestantism which reviles instincts and makes them unacceptable; they get evil because we put the devil into them. We say they are devils and cannot be touched, and naturally they will be bad because we send them to hell. Nature is neither good nor bad, and if we judge nature by our foolish categories, it is as if we put it into a dirty drawer which would make even pure nature dirty. Then Zarathustra goes on,

Still art thou a prisoner—it seemeth to me—who deviseth liberty for himself: . . .

That means he is the wild dog imprisoned in the kennel, and how marvelous that he wants to walk on clouds, to no longer be that awful thing there! Now, what an attitude to life! That is ordinary Protestant morality, poison, and a complete contradiction to what Zarathustra preaches in other places.

Ah! sharp becometh the soul of such prisoners, but also deceitful and wicked.

To purify himself, is still necessary for the freedom of the spirit.

Not enough that you get a free spirit, you have to purify yourself from the dog in you.

Much of the prison and the mould still remaineth in him; pure hath his eye still to become.

The eye means his vision, the way in which he conceives of things and envisages problems. Well, that doesn't need to be clean from the admixture of earth, but very much from the admixture of Protestantism.

Yea, I know thy danger. But by my love and hope I conjure thee: cast not thy love and hope away!

Noble thou feelest thyself still, and noble others also feel thee still, though they bear thee a grudge and cast evil looks. Know this, that to everybody a noble one standeth in the way.

Also to the good, a noble one standeth in the way: and even when they call him a good man, they want thereby to put him aside.

Here again Zarathustra cherishes the aspiration of the young man to become a spirit himself; he lets him feel that his existence in the body and in natural conditions is just a pity, and if he is a noble man he surely will not give up his hope and his love: in other words he will escape his natural existence. Then he says, "Know this, that to everybody a noble one standeth in the way." Sure enough, the one who tries to escape the ordinary human conditions and become an eternal spirit is a stumbling block. It is quite right that he should be considered so; he is really a nuisance and that is not right. Otherwise, the reasonable conclusion would be that the only thing to be done for the world would be for everybody to commit suicide—then all problems would be settled. But that is the cure of headache by cutting off the head. We cannot do away with the living man by making him spirit—he must live here—and we must really assume that inasmuch as there is life it makes sense, and that life is not properly lived when we deny half of life. He calls the belief in a certain tradition and the life of the body in natural conditions, the standpoint of the good people, and he assumes that those people are against the heroes who want to jump out of the body. Yes, happily enough they are against it, otherwise everybody would become lunatics and escape human existence.

The new, would the noble man create, and a new virtue. The old, wanteth the good man, and that the old should be conserved.

Much better that the old things should be preserved than create new things that have no feet and are somewhere in the air, mere castles in Spain. That is just the trouble in creating new things, the necessity that they really live and stand upon the earth within the reach of man. What is the use of creating fantasies which are mere mirror effects in the air?

But it is not the danger of the noble man to turn a good man, but lest he should become a blusterer, a scoffer, or a destroyer.

Sure enough, the danger that he would become an ordinary good man is the thing which is least considered, but that would be the greatest danger to this kind of hero. That he should become insolent, a scoffer and a destroyer would be a lesser danger, for then he could be easily gotten rid of.

Ah! I have known noble ones who lost their highest hope. And then they disparaged all high hopes.

Then lived they shamelessly in temporary pleasures, and beyond the day had hardly an aim.

That is just because they had that attitude, either on top of everything, above the clouds, or in the slime, but nothing in between—as if there were no green earth where things were perfectly nice and sound and balanced.

“Spirit is also voluptuousness,” said they.

This is the standpoint that spirit or mind is either a god, marvelously pure, the stratosphere fifty or sixty degrees centigrade below zero, or it is a hothouse of vices. We have seen all that, first a tremendous exaggeration of the spirit, then nothing but animal voluptuousness.

Then broke the wings of the spirit; . . .

Well, they would break its wings by overreaching themselves.

And now it creepeth about and defileth where it gnaweth.

Once they thought of becoming heroes; . . .

They would have done much better not to think of that.

But sensualists are they now. A trouble and a terror is the hero to them.

Then they are just the contrary of heroes, they become vicious hogs. But then they are simply heroes of the slime.

But by my love and hope I conjure thee: cast not away the hero in thy soul! Maintain holy thy highest hope!

Thus spake Zarathustra.

That sounds of course awfully well, provided you really can fulfil it. But if it costs your body how can you pull it off? You cannot fulfil it if you have destroyed your body. That is the problem with which he ends here, and you see from the title of the next chapter, “The Preachers of Death,” what he has to realize.

LECTURE VI

12 June 1935

Prof. Jung:

What is the connection between this new chapter, "The Preachers of Death," and the preceding one?

Mrs. Baumann: I think the last one also preaches death; there is only the choice between the heights and the kennel of dogs, and if one gives that up, one has no more life in the body.

Prof. Jung: Have you a particular passage in mind to substantiate your idea?

Mrs. Baumann: At the end of the chapter he says. "But it is not the danger of the noble man to turn a good man, but lest he should become a clusterer, a scoffer, or a destroyer." And the last thing of all is, "Cast not away the hero in thy soul! Maintain holy thy highest hope!"

Prof. Reichstein: I should say the young man was meant to be the life, and now comes the contrast: he cannot live his life.

Prof. Jung: You think the connection is really an enantiodromia? Yes, the enantiodromia begins where the young man is struck by lightning. Throughout that preceding chapter Zarathustra preaches the heroic attitude, but he realizes that there is a young man who strives to follow him, and later, on the hills, the young man says: "My destruction I longed for when I desired to be on the height, and thou art the lightning for which I waited." Zarathustra is the thundercloud from which the lightning issues, which means that he is not human, but a spirit, a demon full of dangerous energy; that is, of course, the quality of a being so pregnant with thought. Consequently, when the young man, who is not up to such intensity of tension, comes up to Zarathustra, up to the level of the demon, he is as if struck by lightning. This would be insanity; it is the sudden explosion in the head which many cases of schizophrenia describe. They experience such things in the beginning, saying that something snapped in their head, for instance, or there was an explosion like a pistol shot—and from that moment on they are different. There is a special term for it in French, le trouble cénesthésie. Cé-nesthésie comes from the Greek koinos, meaning general sensation.<sup>1</sup> And these peculiar troubles are particularly in the head. They are sort of preliminary symptoms; the continuity of the mind breaks up into parts like a surface of ice or a mirror. One finds a characteristic symptom in the pictures such people draw, the so-called breaking lines. For instance, they make the picture of a tree, and then some part of the tree is broken off and they substitute a different design, something which does not fit in; it is like a break which goes right through the picture, as if a piece had broken off and another piece, an entirely different construction, joined on there. Such people have at least one breaking line, or even several, in their mental condition. It doesn't mean that they are necessarily insane, for such things also happen with people who only have a neurosis, where they are perfectly capable of improvement.

I remember the case of a woman who was not insane at all although she had an insane sister. She had a neurosis, and drew a picture which contained a number of breaking lines; it gave me quite a shock when I sat it. But she explained to me that it had been made in a moment of terrible emotion and that the chaotic impression it produced was due to that, though she could not describe what the emotion had been. You see, that shows that it was the right diagnosis; a breaking line means that there is a split, and people with bad splits cannot explain it or they come to an utterly irrational conclusion. It is just as if they could not jump across that split; they can explain thus far and then are stopped by an unknown emotion. But this woman was able to explain the breaking lines as emotion. Then I told her she had better try to bring out that emotion, to make another picture that would express it. Now in the first picture she had drawn a human figure, herself, but completely dissolved or exploded by breaking lines, an eye here, a hand there and a foot somewhere else, like a corpse that had been exploded into many parts by a shell or a high explosive—such deep emotions have that shock effect as if a projectile had entered the body and exploded it completely. While in the next picture she represented herself as whole but confronted with a terrible snake, and that snake was the cause of her emotion: it was the Kundalini snake. For when the snake raises its head, the hissing of the snake, as they describe it in the Tantric Yoga, has the effect of a tremendous shock. That is not always true, but in people with a delicate constitution, as she had, it produces a shattering effect. But the fact that afterwards she could produce a picture which was completely composed, where the figures were whole and logical, showed that she could bridge the gap, could strengthen the breaking lines. These are of course not always indicated in the same way; there may be a more or less symmetrically composed picture, and then in a corner there is an intrusion which contains something else. Or perhaps a part of a human figure (or an animal or whatever it is) is dissolved into strange things. So it is not always like split glass, but also can be like a growth, a tumor for instance. When you look at such a growth in the microscope in reality, you see the regular tissue of the body and then suddenly that dissolves into a strange chaotic accumulation of cells which don't show a trace of the former healthy tissue. So you can describe it in different ways. Now you see, that is the lightning which destroys the young man, who is of course, in comparison to the extreme old age of the archetype, always a young man—the wise old man is at the least two million years old.

Mrs. Baumann: In the end of that last chapter I understood that there was a demonstration of Christianity which he did not realize at all, and I was just wondering whether that would not be the disturbing element, whether that might be what I meant when I called it death.

Prof. Jung: Oh yes, that whole preceding chapter, "The Tree upon the Hill," is of course due to the overvaluation of the spirit, as indeed the whole drama of Zarathustra is based on that prejudice. In the age in which he lived he could not help identifying with his figures. First of all, he was suffering from the materialistic and rationalistic attitude of his time, which naturally assumed that one's thoughts were oneself, with no objectivity—as people still identify with their thoughts and think they can manage them as they want, because they feel them as utterly subjective. And then there was the Christian conviction. That was just the paradox of the nineteenth century. On the one side they had a perfectly rational mechanistic attitude, and on the other side they were capable of being good Christians where the spirit was everything. During the week a professor confessed a mechanistic theory of psychology, and on Sunday he went to church and believed God-knows-what. They had two drawers: in the one a materialistic philosophy and in the other the Christian belief; so even if they did not openly believe in the spirit or the Christian dogma, at least in their practical life they followed Christian morality. That can happen to the most enlightened minds. For instance, people adopt an Eastern creed like Taoism or any other Eastern system, and then, quite inconsistently with their conviction, they live an ordinary life fitted to the church. But the two things don't work together. Brahmanism is not meant for good Christians, nor is the Christian life meant for Brahmanism. They simply don't fit, like oil and water. That can cause a tremendous conflict, and it is extraordinary how such a thing can remain quite unconscious.

You see, Nietzsche certainly does not believe in God any longer: he thinks he has done with that—God is dead—and then here is another overestimation of the spirit just as good as any Christian one. Without questioning, he identifies with Zarathustra; he personifies him, calls him a different name. Nietzsche knows he is not Zarathustra, yet he nevertheless identifies, instead of treating Zarathustra as a demon or at least a disembodied spirit. If he would only assume that Zarathustra was really the spirit of the old Zarathustra of Persian times, he could realize that he was speaking and not himself, and then he would never climb a hill to meet Zarathustra—in order to be struck by lightning. But he was a child of his time; he did not know psychology. If he had known what we know nowadays probably his case would have been better, I don't know. We always must recognize, however, that we would not know what we know today if Nietzsche had not lived. Nietzsche has taught us a lot. When I read Zarathustra for the first time as a student of twenty-three, of course I did not understand it all, but I got a tremendous impression. I could not say it was this or that, though the poetical beauty of some of the chapters impressed me, but particularly the strange thought got hold of me. He helped me in many respects, as many other people have been helped by him. Therefore, we cannot say he should have done differently; we only must remember, if we take it to ourselves, that in reading Zarathustra, we must apply certain criticism, for it is very clear where Nietzsche went the wrong way. Otherwise one is simply infected by that identification, because we all suffer from the prejudice of the spirit; of course, it is wonderful to identify with that thing which becomes spiritual, but when we study Nietzsche critically, we see the dangers.

Now, because his teaching is imbued by the identification with the spirit Zarathustra, he really teaches something which would mean a mass slaughter. For by far the greatest majority of people could not stand such an identification, as he himself could not stand it and as nobody can stand it; it can be stood for a certain time but then it is just too much and one collapses: one goes crazy. That realization is not coming to the foreground, however. You get a certain idea, as Mrs. Baumann has rightly pointed out, in the last sentence, where he conjures his audience, "But by my love and hope I conjure thee: cast not away the hero in thy soul." There must be a mighty good reason for casting away the hero; otherwise he would not admonish them not to do so. Sure enough, the hero should not be cast away. It is poison when you identify but it is not if you don't. But Nietzsche had not that point of view; he simply could not think it. His idea obviously was, either you are a philistine or a little bourgeois; you are fat and eat and drink and sleep and so on, or you must be a hero, and he grows afraid, obviously, that man will lose the hero ideal, being threatened by so many dangers. Therefore, in spite of all that could be said as counter-argument, he says, don't give up that hope, don't give up that hero ideal. He is in a way, by his identification with Zarathustra, a preacher of death. That insight slowly dawned upon him unconsciously in the preceding chapter and now he must say something about those people who are preaching death. But since it has been an unconscious thought he naturally projects it upon others; he does not know that he is one of the foremost.

It is the rule that unconscious thought is projected, so you always discover it round you. For instance, people who have erotic fantasies of which they are not aware, must surely become aware of what they must find in themselves through their projections—like those people who join the society for the suppression of pornographic pictures. There was an Englishman who was a member of such a society. He collected all the pornographic photographs he could lay hold of—of course only in order to destroy them. He had five thousand, and then he announced in a meeting of the society that before they were destroyed, he wished very much that the society would take the trouble to inform themselves of the evil of the world by looking at them. And they all stuck their heads together to look at those five thousand pictures, so they had a good meal before the final catastrophe when the pictures were burned. Naturally, nobody in his sound senses would believe that they did not enjoy it. Then afterwards they had the voluptuousness of believing they had done a good thing for the world. As if they had not helped the pornographic business by buying all that stuff—many factories and printing-presses benefitted by that large deal. Well now, this chapter begins.

There are preachers of death: and the earth is full of those to whom desistance from life must be preached.

Who are those people to whom renunciation ought to be preached?

Prof. Reichstein: I think the connection is here with those wild dogs in the cellar. He wants to kill them, and if he is beginning to preach of death, that will be the natural part which must be killed. Therefore, those men "to whom desistance from life must be preached" are the simple men.

Prof. Jung: Well he obviously means that those people who are not able to live up to the heroic idea had better disappear; of course, those are the ordinary people who have no dogs in the cellar. But who has dogs in the cellar? No normal person. First of all, it is against simple decency to lock up dogs in the cellar: you wouldn't do that; you have dogs in your rooms, in your garden. They are nice companions for man, very friendly things; it would be abnormal to lock them in the cellar. So the ordinary normal human being has his dogs on the surface; he lives with them and to a certain extent the master is equal to the dog and the dog to the master. You often notice that peculiar likeness between a dog and his master: they take on the same expression, and you can liken dogs to certain human types. There is an inner relationship between man and dog; therefore an old hunter says it is good for the dogs to sleep with the hunters. The horse is also a friend of man. And Philostratus, in his book about Apollonius of Tyana,<sup>2</sup> says that elephants like man very much; he heard them whispering among themselves in the night, and they were very sad because they were afraid they had not pleased man during the day. They were ambitious to be appreciated by him. This is a very precious piece of animal psychology, inasmuch as our own psychology is similar; many people worry for hours in the night lest they have not lived up to the expectations of others, have not done the right thing by them, have not shown love enough. So you see, the ordinary normal individual lives together with his animals and therefore he cannot and will not overreach himself. Now, those are the people that Nietzsche says are all too many; they are superfluous when it comes to the heroic ideal.

Full is the earth of the superfluous; marred is life by the many-too-many. May they be decoyed out of this life by the "life eternal"!

That is of course a hit at Christianity which preaches the importance of eternal life and the relative unimportance of the temporal life; he says it is quite well for them to die out, to pass away into eternal life because they make nothing of this life.

<sup>2</sup> The Life of Apollonius of Tyana, tr. F. C. Conybeare (London and New York, 1912). Philostratus (a Lemnian, born ca. 170), faithfully recorded the sayings of Apollonius, who was born 3 B.C. and lived a hundred years. Traveller, miracle worker, Pythagorean, ascetic, he did not know of Jesus but was a kind of rival.

"The yellow ones": so are called the preachers of death, or the "black ones." But I will show them unto you in other colours besides.

What are these yellow ones?

Mr. Allemann: They would be Buddhists.

Prof. Jung: Yes, and the black robed ones are usually Christian, Protestant as well as Catholic, because black is the official color, though it originated really in the East where they wore black cloaks. The early Christian monks wore black cloaks, as they still do in the Greek orthodox church; die Trauernden, the mourning ones, was the official title for monks in the second, third, and fourth centuries. So black, which signifies mourning, death, abnegation, became characteristic of the priests. In official functions they used other colors, white expressing innocence, purity, red expressing love; and yellow comes in too, but I think that was a later invention. Blue is not a church color.

Mr. Allemann: Violet?

Prof. Jung: Yes, but violet, purple, and crimson appeared much later; the original colors were white, black, yellow, and red. And curiously enough, these were the mystical colors of the four elements in alchemistic philosophy; they must have to do with some original conception. They would be the colors of the four functions; what we call now psychological functions were originally elements or temperaments. Our four functions are four characteristics of consciousness,<sup>3</sup> but when there was no psychology, when one only knew the differences between human beings, one spoke of temperaments, meaning emotional differences, the melancholic, or sanguine, or choleric, or phlegmatic temperaments. The phlegmatic person is the one with slow cold humors; the melancholic has a very black bile and is very depressive; the choleric is an irritable or irascible personality, easily inflammable or impulsive; and the sanguine is the optimistic, gay, easygoing person. These were explained by a particular condition of the so-called "humor," a fluid, the humidity or the juices of the body. This idea of the four temperaments is of antique origin, the first attempt to classify people on the horizontal, one could say, but there was no particular value attached to it. Another attempt at the classification of human beings in antiquity was the vertical system: the three stages, hylikos, psychikos and pneumatikos—the material man, the psychical man and the spiritual man. The temperaments were linked up with the four elements—fire, earth, water, and air—and they also were often characterized by four colors. In the Eastern Lamaistic mandalas, one again finds four colors—white, red, green and yellow; but in the west green is not a church color because it is the color of vegetation, which has nothing to do with the church and the spirit. It is peculiar that blue was not used but it just wasn't.

Prof. Jung: Yes, in art, but that has nothing to do with the official colors of the ritual; they call them church colors, Kirchenfarben, and they coincide with these very ancient alchemistic colors. There is a passage in one of the Latin pseudo-Hermetic writings where they speak of the vulture as the spiritus volatilis rising from the black mother: Vultur in cacumine montis magna voce clamet; ego sum ater et albus, rubens et citrinus, meaning: "The vulture upon the top of the mountain cries with loud voice, 'I am white and black and red and citron.'" That is, he is the one that unites the four qualities, being above the temperaments, in the language of those days. With us it would mean the one that is neither thinking, feeling, sensation, nor intuition, but above the four functions. The meaning in alchemistic philosophy also was that the four must come together into one, and they tried to express it in the material chemical process by uniting the four elements—fire, earth, water, and air—or more psychically, uniting the four temperaments into one. The one, that central thing, was called by many names, the lapis philosophorum, aurum nostrum, our gold, (which was not the ordinary gold) and many other metaphors. It was very clearly not a chemical body, and one cannot say it was spiritual, because it was as much matter as spirit. It was symbolic, and held a central position; as for instance, the Lamaistic mandala is by no means in heaven, but is always embedded half in the earth and half in the upper world.

The yellow robed ones are surely the Buddhists because the official color is that orange yellow of their robes. It was originally a disreputable color worn by the low castes as a sign of humility and abnegation. The Jews were always characterized by yellow in the Middle Ages; they were made to wear either yellow hats or a yellow ribbon, and in Basel, as late as 1865, Jews had to produce a yellow identification card at the gates of the city if they wanted to enter. Then the quarantine flag is yellow, meaning contagion, look out! Now we will continue,

There are the terrible ones who carry about in themselves the beast of prey, and have no choice except lusts or self-laceration. And even their lusts are self-laceration.

To whom does he refer here? You know, Nietzsche had great historical knowledge.

Mrs. Baynes: Does he not mean those Christians who first sowed tons of wild oats and then went into the desert and mortified the flesh?

Prof. Jung: Exactly. He could easily mean a man like Raimundus Lullus or Ignatius of Loyola or St. Augustine or Tertullian, who first led very wild lives and then suddenly turned against themselves, turned to self-laceration;<sup>4</sup> it was the same wildness of instincts, only it was turned to a spiritual purpose.

They have not yet become men, those terrible ones; may they preach desistance from life, and pass away themselves!

It is a very curious thing, but men like Ignatius of Loyola were really heroes; Loyola died among the Moors as a missionary, died the death of a martyr, and martyrs were heroes—only for the purpose of the spirit, were they heroes. And here Nietzsche sees very clearly to what heroism leads; he himself says to make a god of thy seven devils. He also gets sweetness out of his cruelty, transforms wildness into another purpose. But he only sees that in other people, and he thinks it is there something quite different. But whether it is a Nietzsche or an Ignatius of Loyola or any other who turns round and sacrifices himself or lacerates himself for his purpose, he has a heroic attitude. Nobody becomes a hero without turning against himself to a certain extent, for everybody has that rabbit heart within, which defends itself to the last against the hero attitude; if one has only an inkling of heroism one feels very much how one has to turn against oneself. But otherwise one gets nowhere. That particular reproach, that they have not even become men, shows that he sees the inhumanity very clearly, but identifying with Zarathustra is just as inhuman.

<sup>4</sup> Self-lacerators: Raimundus Lullus or Raymond Lully (1235-1315), Ignatius of Loyola (1491-1556), St. Augustine, Bishop of Hippo (354-430), Tertullian (160?-230). Jung's lectures at the Federal Polytechnic Institute on Loyola were in part published in translation in Spring 1977 and 1978.

There are the spiritually consumptive ones: hardly are they born when they begin to die, and long for doctrines of lassitude and renunciation.

They would fain be dead, and we should approve of their wish! Let us beware of awakening those dead ones, and of damaging those living coffins!

They meet an invalid, or an old man, or a corpse—and immediately they say: “Life is refuted!”

But they only are refuted, and their eyes, which seeth only one aspect of existence.

Shrouded in thick melancholy, and eager for the little casualties that bring death: thus do they wait, and clench their teeth.

Or else, they grasp at sweetmeats, and mock at their childishness thereby: they cling to their straw of life, and mock at their still clinging to it.

Their wisdom speaketh thus: “A fool, he who remaineth alive; but so far are we fools! And that is the foolishness in life!”

To what does grasping sweetmeats refer? That must be a different case. Surely he does not refer to any religious system.

Mrs. Baumann: Eat drink and be merry, for tomorrow you die.

Prof. Jung: Yes, the Epicurean point of view, the ironical worldly standpoint, which is by far the most frequent form of philosophy. Their idea is that it is foolish to live at all, but alas, one lives and makes the best of it. It means nothing but it is a sort of friendly habit to exist. This is an absolutely practical philosophy which has many followers.

“Life is only suffering”: so say others, and lie not. Then see to it that ye cease! See to it that the life ceaseth which is only suffering!

And let this be the teaching of your virtue: “Thou shalt slay thyself! Thou shalt steal away from thyself.”

To whom is he referring here?

Mrs. Crowley: To Schopenhauer.

Prof. Jung: Of course. Nietzsche was a great admirer of Schopenhauer, but later on he became his opponent. Schopenhauer’s point of view became anathema to him because it was very Buddhistic; he was overcome by a great compassion for humanity and the undeniable suffering of life, and therefore said that one should simply cease to will life in order to put an end to that whole phantasmagoria of existence.<sup>5</sup>

"Lust is sin,"—so say some who preach death—"let us go apart and beget no children!"

"Giving birth is troublesome,"—say others—"why still give birth? One beareth only the unfortunate!" And they also are preachers of death.

What famous man would he be indicating here?

Mrs. Baynes: It might be Tolstoi, that was his doctrine.

Dr. Elliot: Not in Nietzsche's day; Tolstoi did not have a philosophy as a young man.<sup>6</sup>

Mrs. Sigg: Malthus?

Prof. Jung: Yes, the birth control man, he wrote before the middle of the nineteenth century, I think between 1840 and 1850, and started a huge noise all over Europe. Of course Nietzsche was much impressed by Malthus because everybody was impressed then.<sup>7</sup>

"Pity is necessary,"—so saith a third party. "Take what I have! Take what I am! So much less doth life bind me!"

Were they consistently pitiful, then would they make their neighbours sick of life. To be wicked—that would be their true goodness.

But they want to be rid of life; what care they if they bind others still faster with their chains and gifts!

Now to whom does this refer? "Take whatever I have. Take whatever I am."

Mrs. Crowley: It could refer to monks.

Prof. Jung: Oh no, they never say to take whatever they possess; they never were quick at giving.

Mrs. Crowley: I thought they gave everything to the monastery.

Prof. Jung: Yes, but they had very good cellars.

Miss Hannah: It sounds Christian. Christ himself preached it.

Prof. Jung: He is not modern enough, and Nietzsche has already will as the source of all misery, in the growing conviction that the will to power is the best, the essential, thing about man.

<sup>6</sup> After establishing his reputation with the great novels War and Peace (1859) and Anna Karenina (1877) Tolstoi's own blend of Freemasonry and Christianity became with the years more hortatory.

<sup>7</sup> Thomas Robert Malthus (1766-1834) argued that since population increases in a geometrical ratio while the food supply grows at no more than an arithmetical ratio, population must be checked by war, famine, plague—or by such preventative measures as abortion, infanticide, or birth control. His influential Essay on the Principle of Population appeared in 1798.

dealt the Christians one mighty blow. After Malthus we must expect somebody a bit more modern.

Mr. Allemann: Marx.

Prof. Jung: Yes, the communistic theory and such ideas, which originated in the second part of the century.

And ye also, to whom life is rough labour and disquiet, are ye not very tired of life? Are ye not very ripe for the sermon of death?

All ye to whom rough labour is dear, and the rapid, new, and strange—ye put up with yourselves badly; your diligence is flight, and the will to self-forgetfulness.

If ye believed more in life, then would ye devote yourselves less to the momentary. But for waiting, ye have not enough of capacity in you—nor even for idling!

What would this be?

Mrs. Baynes: It is the tired business man.

Prof. Jung: Yes, he refers to the main characteristic of the second part of the nineteenth century, industry, business life, and the tired business man.

Everywhere resoundeth the voice of those who preach death; and the earth is full of those to whom death hath to be preached.

Or “life eternal”; it is all the same to me—if only they pass away quickly!

He wipes out practically the whole generation of men; only a few remain and they will be killed by lightning. This is pretty radical: he just takes the sponge and wipes out whatever has been written on the black-board of history, a thorough remedy. This is important. It conveys the idea that everything that exists must be done away with because it is not worth continuing. What does that imply?

Mrs. Sigg: Making a new beginning.

Prof. Jung: Yes, uprooting the whole of actual mankind, producing a complete revolution, in order to prepare the ground for a new world.

Mrs. Adler: It seems to me to be very funny and compensatory, because Nietzsche had in reality absolutely no interest in life; he pictures such things, but people who are very near to life are more careful and conservative.

Prof. Jung: Yes, but Nietzsche is not speaking. Nietzsche is a young man who has been struck by lightning; Zarathustra, the spirit, is speaking. And the spirit is like a mighty elementary phenomenon which comes when it wants to come and destroys what pleases it to destroy. You see, the spirit did not ask whether we were ready to have a new century or a new world, but simply comes when it is ready and destroys whatever resists. So Nietzsche is not moved by human considerations at all; he is simply following the intimations of Zarathustra's spirit.

We come now to the next chapter, "War and Warriors." What is the logical sequence between this title and the preceding one, "The Preachers of Death"?

Mrs. Baumann: Would it be war to destroy the world?

Prof. Jung: Yes, war ever has been the means of destruction, and that is what he is preaching, obviously. The question is, of course, what form the destruction would take, and the unconscious already prepares the answer. It would mean war or at least a warlike attitude which is ready to strike and to destroy, an absolutely reckless readiness, even. Now, here I must speak again about the peculiar prophetic quality of these two chapters. You see, one could say it was not logical; it simply flows out of him, and has obviously the quality thought and imagery. Yet it is just as much fact, because the spirit of Zarathustra is, one could say, the mirror of the flow of events which are potential facts, though they do not yet exist. Our unconscious has two aspects: the one is the past or the remains of the past, and the other is the future, or marks of the future. The unconscious can flow out in a sort of backward flow, to things that reach into the past far beyond an individual existence; as you know, one can go back in time for thousands of years—or one can go forward. Zarathustra is directed to the things which are to come; the past only comes in inasmuch as it is the building material of a new future. He mirrors the images of the potentialities of the collective unconscious—what is likely to be—so when he speaks of death and the preachers of death, it is not mere words; one could designate that as a potential fact, that which the unconscious holds in store for times to come. Whenever somebody speaks directly out of the unconscious, one must always keep in mind that those are mirrored facts and truly prophetic: a true prophet mirrors the flow of potential facts.

So these chapters are pregnant with the future. They illustrate what is going on in our days, for instance; we have had a good deal of wiping out and it seems we are not yet through with it. He says, "marred is life by the many-too-many," and, you know, people talk a great deal nowadays of the overpopulation—and certainly Central Europe is overpopulated. We are deeply impressed in Switzerland with the fact that we cannot possibly nourish our population of five millions; we can only produce food enough for two millions, and what about the other three million if we should have to shut our frontiers, for instance, if we could not buy? It is pretty obvious that they would go by the board. Italy has a teeming population and they are preaching death, sending division after division to Abyssinia to nourish the mosquitos there; that is a serious attempt at bloodletting. So, for the wiping-out idea, war is a matter of discussion in our unconscious as one of the most suitable means of destruction. Our unconscious is full of destructive schemes—that is just the fact; of course, not so much the personal unconscious, but if we go a bit deeper into the truly collective layers, we find such a tendency. Therefore, there is a general veil of fear over Europe of a threatening and very obscure future; one suspects fate of playing a huge trick. Every country is arming to the teeth in order to be ready for peace; because of that fear even most peaceful people are thinking of weapons and fortresses. We see that most clearly expressed in France; the French mentality is filled with fear. On the day when Hitler declared general military service, the Frenchmen did not even go to their beloved cafés. They deserted their habitual places on the boulevards, because they thought in the next moment bombs would be coming down upon Paris. That is characteristic; the atmosphere is electric with fear and with possibilities of war. These two chapters really show the unconscious preparation of the future.

Mrs. Baumann: I want to ask whether you see in the dreams or fantasies of your patients, pictures of general conditions, and if you do see them, how do you distinguish between the personal and the political?

Prof. Jung: As a rule you don't see these things, because most of my patients are not concerned with the welfare of the world. They are much more concerned with their personal welfare, so they produce pictures which have a far more personal significance. Prophetic dreams are rare; prophecies that are merely for the next day are quite frequent, but they are unimportant or only of a subjective importance. The true prophecy demands size always and not everybody can boast of having that quality. You see, Nietzsche was such a fellow.

Mrs. Jung: It seems to me that it is not only destruction that one sees here; it could also represent an attitude to life, linking up again with the hero spirit that he has praised before. So I think it is also a positive thing, a positive attitude to life, not necessarily destructive.

Prof. Jung: That is perfectly true. But it is really destructive here, and then during the course of the chapter the enantiodromia takes place which prepares the next chapter, "The New Idol," where he comes to the idea of the remedy. For the unconscious never sticks to utter destruction. The unconscious is the spirit of life, the stream of events that go on and on. The unconscious does not know death or complete destruction, but only knows change and usually change according to the law of enantiodromia. So it is always a relative destruction, but I think a relatively far-reaching destruction is meant here. If it is only as far-reaching as the world war it is already of a good size!—and the unconscious is envisaging catastrophies which even exceed the world war.

Mrs. Sigg: I think this sentence, “Ye shall be those whose eyes ever seek for an enemy—for your enemy,” could be taken as a prophecy of modern psychology.

Prof. Jung: Yes but wait until we come to it!

Mrs. Adler: In your lecture at the University about the anima, you spoke about a man who heard voices; in that case I suppose the prophecy was spoken; it came through voices.<sup>8</sup>

Prof. Jung: In that case, the voice was chiefly concerned with personal things. There were some general hints, yet with a very personal application not concerned with world events. It was always the personal attitude to a possible change in the surroundings. But the object was not changed in the surroundings, only the change of the personal attitude; and there was little of prophetic material even there.

Mrs. Adler: But don’t you find in many cases of hysteria, for instance, very great suffering in the collective unconscious?

Prof. Jung: Ah yes, that is true, but you find that everywhere; the general situation mirrors itself in every case of neurosis. As everybody has a collective aspect, everybody is suffering in his financial dealings, for instance, from the actual world crisis. That goes very deep in many cases. Everybody is mentally affected by actual events and by the general situation. Perhaps one could say that nowadays one quarter of the Swiss population is affected by mental illness. Insanity is spreading; there are very abnormal mental conditions prevailing in Europe, and everybody is more or less affected by it. But it is characteristic for the ordinary neurotic that to him in the first place it is personal suffering. You see, as soon as somebody is threatened with a loss, even if the loss is worldwide and everybody is concerned with it, that person is concerned personally in it, and handles it as if it were his own case and not a general one. For instance, it is always an enormous revelation to certain patients when they come out of their analysis to hear me talk about other cases. Then they discover that other people have similar symptoms when they had thought that they were the only ones on God’s earth who had had such experiences. It is amazing to what extent people, particularly through suffering, are concentrated upon themselves; they become autoerotic to the *n*th degree and forget all the rest of humanity who might be suffering from exactly the same evils as their own. But it is true as Goethe says in Faust:

On Sundays and holidays what I adore
Is a talk about war, with all of its scare,
Whilst far off in Turkey the foreign folk there
Continue to fight just as much as before.
One stands at the window, sipping one's glass,
Watching the flagged vessels glide down the river;
When night comes, then one is contented to pass
Homewards, blessing peace and our era forever.<sup>9</sup>

But if that same fellow should be hit by a bullet, then the whole world would disappear. This is just human and quite universal. Now we will go on with our text:

By our best enemies we do not want to be spared, nor by those either whom we love from the very heart. So let me tell you the truth!

My brethren in war! I love you from the very heart. I am, and was ever, your counterpart. And I am also your best enemy. So let me tell you the truth!

I know the hatred and envy of your hearts. Ye are not great enough not to know of hatred and envy. Then be great enough not to be ashamed of them!

What does he reveal here? Always in the beginning of such a chapter a thought which has been unconscious before comes to the daylight. You see, when you hear somebody talk of a general wiping out, you may safely take him aside and ask why he wants to wipe out those people, what his personal motive is. You remember Nietzsche was a retired professor who lived by the benevolence and goodheartedness of very nice citizens of Basel. I knew an old lady myself who spent several thousands francs a year to support Professor Nietzsche. And when he lived in the Engadine he emphasized very much how beautiful it was to be six thousand feet above the normal. So what does he reveal here? It is very mean to point to it.

Mr. Allemann: His own hate and meanness against other people.

Prof. Jung: Well, his own hatred and envy of those people who lived in the fact, who could cope with this world. You see, there is no man, even if he is an exceedingly gifted genius, who is entirely free from that very normal envy of the ordinary well-being. And Nietzsche never felt well; he was entirely isolated. Nobody understood him; all his so-called friends stared at him with deep apprehension because they wondered what was coming next. They were afraid of him and felt already the insanity in the things he wrote. So he was really in a position that could not be called agreeable. Nothing is more natural than that he should hate and envy those people who could cope with ordinary life. One sees that every day in neurotic people who are forced through their condition to live a type of life which is not, and cannot be, the ordinary type. How they envy those who can live the ordinary life within conventions, within the ordinary expectations! For instance, the people who can enjoy the ordinary pleasures and amusements of others, who find it a particular pleasure to sit together with all their relatives every Sunday. Or to be in a society where the only link is that they were all born in the same year; or who walk behind a flag with a band, perfectly happy and most serious, enjoying their pleasure. People who are isolated by a particular fate always feel envy and hatred of those who can live the life they find. So it would be more natural if, instead of saying, "I know the hatred and envy of your hearts," he should say, "I know the hatred and envy of my heart." But since it is Zarathustra who speaks—he has not a human heart—therefore, it is projected; to Zarathustra it is they who feel envy. As spirit he does not feel hate nor envy, but just wisdom. Nietzsche on the other hand would feel that he belongs to these people. "Ye are not great enough not to know of hatred and envy," means that he is not demon enough not to feel hatred and envy.

And if ye cannot be saints of knowledge, then, I pray you, be at least its warriors. They are the companions and forerunners of such saintship.

Here, you see what he understands by warriors; they are not beyond hatred and envy, and don't need to be great, but they can be at least warriors of knowledge, even if they are not the saints. Now, of what knowledge should they be the warriors?

Miss Wolff: Of truth perhaps, because he says, "Let me tell you the truth."

Prof. Jung: But what is that truth?

Mrs. Crowley: Does it not mean the prophetic knowledge, those facts that Zarathustra is feeling, sensing in the future?

Prof. Jung: Yes, he means the knowledge he preaches, the knowledge of the Superman. You see, in spite of the fact that they are not saints, not perfect, they are subject to the very human and very personal motives of hatred and envy, they can be warriors. One can win a battle even with bad soldiers.

I see many soldiers; could I but see many warriors! "Uniform" one calleth what they wear; may it not be uniform what they there-with hide!

What does this mean?

Mrs. Baumann: Would that they were individuals instead of a collective group.

Prof. Jung: Yes, in speaking of warriors, he instantly thinks of soldiers naturally; yet soldiers are in uniform, which means absolutely collective with no personalities whatever. They are not responsible man for man, but are only responsible as a body. It is always the danger of such organizations that the individual becomes broken in to such an extent that personality is lost. Of course one called that in German already before the war, Kadaver-gehorsam, which means the blind obedience of corpses; they don't exist in reality. They are only obedient images. So here he hints at the idea of individuation; they should not be uniformed. They should be themselves.

Ye shall be those whose eyes ever seek for an enemy—for your enemy. And with some of you there is hatred at first sight.

What does he mean by that? Now, Mrs. Sigg.

Mrs. Sigg: I should think the important thing in the chapter before is that Nietzsche himself does not see his own individual enemy because he has projected it—does not see his own hostility against life.

Prof. Jung: Well, the idea is that our worst enemy is always our own enemy, the enemy we harbor within our own system; and we should find that enemy and give him a chance to fight us. He is very much in favor of equal enemies, not one to be despised but really hated. So "your enemy" means that you should seek the conflict within yourself; the war here takes on an entirely new aspect. One was inclined to think of this war as a general universal phenomenon, but ere he makes a peculiar break and suddenly the whole thing which seemed to be outside, a political war, becomes a war within the individual. It is not the enemy you shall seek, but your enemy, and that of course gives an entirely different aspect to the whole question of war and warriors. One could almost say that this is the place, as Mrs. Sigg has pointed out quite correctly, where modern psychology begins. It begins with a sort of self-criticism—with the question “What is against me?” If I cannot do what I like then something must be against me, and it must be something strong, at least as strong as myself and perhaps stronger because it really can hinder me from doing what I want to do. And that enemy is nowhere outside.

Of course all neuroses begin with the illusion that it is outside. Somebody outside works tricks against them, people above or below them have sort of electric rays that make them jump; they think that the Jesuits are against them, or the international institution of waiters or porters, as a former patient of mine thought. Every neurotic has a bête noire somewhere, the mother or the father, or this person or that person who has bad intentions. Or if a certain things had not happened, if the circumstances were different, all would be well. But put them in different surroundings and they discover that the same old thing begins again, because they carry the enemy within; they can go where they please but the enemy is always in themselves. Of course it takes a couple of months or even a year in new surroundings to find this out, because they have the feeling that in new conditions everything will be different—all the old worries will be left behind. But then things go wrong and they discover where the devils are, and then they cannot understand how people learned about their secrets and think they must have been in connection with their former acquaintances.

For instance, the patient I mentioned was a lawyer, a highly intelligent man, and he was persecuted by the waiters in cafés; they always stuck their heads together and laughed and he knew they had certain thoughts about him. He had certain thoughts of course—that he was homosexual. So he went to the station and bought a ticket to a small place called Brugg near Zürich, and then he walked over the mountain through the woods to another station on the same line where he took a ticket to Basel. Then by crooked ways he ran through the town of Basel to the German station where he took a ticket to Freiburg; there he hid himself and ten hours later he took a train to Hamburg, and then he knew that he had dépisté<sup>10</sup> his enemies and everything was all right—he had escaped them. But in just half a year he noticed that a waiter winked to another one when he entered a café. Of course he began to think furiously in what way they could have detected his whereabouts. He speculated how they could possibly have found out, and finally he came to the conclusion that there must be an international journal for waiters through which they exchanged news, that they had a secret paper issued in which was a sort of signalement of the people they wanted to persecute. But he never could discover such a paper. That happens to neurotics; usually after a sort of incubation time all the troubles begin in a new place. That is the reason why so many people move continuously. I met a lady who had travelled three times round the world in order to escape circumstances, but she always came to a world where there were still circumstances.

LECTURE VII

Prof. Jung:

We will continue our text.

Your enemy shall ye seek; your war shall ye wage, and for the sake of your thoughts!

Here Zarathustra touches upon an idea which seems to become true in modern psychology, as we said last week.

And if your thoughts succumb, your uprightness shall still shout triumph thereby!

Ye shall love peace as a means to new wars—and the short peace more than the long.

You I advise not to work, but to fight. You I advise not to peace, but to victory. Let your work be a fight, let your peace be a victory!

One can only be silent and sit peacefully when one hath arrow and bow; otherwise one prateth and quarrelleth. Let your peace be a victory!

Ye say it is the good cause which halloweth even war? I say unto you: it is the good war which halloweth every cause.

War and courage have done more great things than charity. Not your sympathy, but your bravery hath hitherto saved the victims.

Much of this sounds rather familiar—you can read similar things in newspapers and in certain modern literature. Now inasmuch as such teaching is understood as the education of a nation, it is of very doubtful value, but understood as educational teaching for an individual it is an entirely different case; it teaches the importance of conflict. War on the objective plane is of course what war is generally understood to be, but war on a subjective plane means the conflict within the individual. What is good within is not necessarily good without, in spite of the fact that Heraclitus said that war was the father of all things;<sup>1</sup> it is a very doubtful father—well, fathers are often doubtful. Nietzsche's sermon is ambiguous here; we don't know whether he is preaching a belligerent attitude which shows itself in the politics of states, or whether he preaches the individual conflict. If it is the latter, I must subscribe to it, because nobody gets anywhere who has no conflict: we need the conflict and the willingness to accept it. For conflict is the origin of our psychological energy—there can be no energy without it. We must have conflict, otherwise we don't live.

We might assume here that Nietzsche hides in this paragraph the intuition of individuation. For conflict is absolutely indispensable for individuation. You cannot individuate as long as you are identical with your aims and activities because they are always only one aspect, and if you identify with only one aspect of yourself you are merely an autonomous function, an autonomous aspect of yourself. But if you accept the conflict between two or several aspects of personality, you have a chance to individuate, because you then need a center between the conflicting tendencies; then individuation makes sense. If you are identical with only one aspect of yourself, you are naturally up against the unconscious, and then it looks as if your enemy were outside of yourself; at least you don't understand why you should be opposed from within because you only see that one tendency with which you are identical, and do not see the opposing tendencies.<sup>2</sup> So you project your aspects into other people who then become your bête noire. They seem to be the cause of your defeat or your neurosis; one likes to accuse father and mother or a wrong education or enemies in order to excuse oneself for one's own defeat. You see, if Nietzsche really means the individual here, this is really good advice; but if he is haranguing a politically excited crowd, then it is cheap stuff—no good, bad filling of newspaper columns.

"What is good?" ye ask. To be brave is good. Let the little girls say: "To be good is what is pretty, and at the same time touching."

I think this "what is good, ye ask" is due to a feeling of ambiguity and doubtfulness. He asks himself, "Is this sermon I am preaching really good stuff?" Then of course he is not referring to real little maidens who are pretty and pathetic. The German text is unmistakable: it means that good is something pretty and pathetic. That is also a certain point of view, exceedingly harmless. He means here that it is good to be brave. He is, as I said, in doubt, so he extracts the idea of being brave from his sermon as having to do with war; the warrior is at least brave. Of course you can also apply it to the individual again and then this little passage would mean: it is a good thing to face one's own problem, one's own conflict, and it won't do to have a sort of sweetish point of view concerning morality, a morality that is just pretty and pathetic. Here my word pathetic has nothing to do with the German pathetisch; it means touching, rührend.

<sup>1</sup> Heraclitus (fl. c. 500), Jung's favorite pre-Socratic philosopher by virtue of the importance he attached to process and opposition, had as one of his dark, gnomic sayings: "War is both father and king of all; some he has shown forth as gods and others as men, some he has made slaves and others free" (Fragment 25 tr. Philip Wheelwright).

They call you heartless: but your heart is true, and I love the bashfulness of your goodwill. Ye are ashamed of your flow, and others are ashamed of their ebb.

Ye are ugly? Well then, my brethren, take the sublime about you, the mantle of the ugly!

Now, this seems to be mighty good advice: cover yourself with the sublime or the austere in order to hide the ugly. If that were possible! In contemporary history you see many such cases, where they have tried to put on the mantle of the sublime over things which are really ugly. And if you think of the subjective application of this sermon, you can see how impossible such advice would be. It would not do to cover up your ugliness by the mantle of the sublime because too many people could see the ass's ears or hooves coming out from under the lion's skin.

And when your soul becometh great, then doth it become haughty, and in your sublimity there is malice [wickedness]. I know you.

This is again a funny thing in Nietzsche. At times he gets quite coquettish—like an old maid, you know—with his own malice. Whenever I read such a passage I think of the bust of Voltaire by Houdon in the foyer of the Comédie Française: that exceedingly malicious and ironical look. It needs a Frenchman—it needs just Monsieur Voltaire—to have that malice, yet Nietzsche is always coquetting with it; but he is much too naive. When you read, for instance, Voltaire's Romans et Contes Philosophiques, then you know what malice is; he is marvelous in that respect. Or when you read the numerous anecdotes from his life—even on his deathbed he had that divine malice which Nietzsche would like to have. You see, in this case he ought to be malicious.<sup>3</sup>

Prof. Reichstein: I was wondering whether it could be taken that the mantle of ugliness itself would be the sublime. It could mean just to cover the ugly, but in the German text it could also mean the contrary, that the mantle itself is the ugly thing, just to keep it round you.

Prof. Jung: Grammatically, yes, you are right, but I am a little doubtful about that meaning.

Prof. Reichstein: If you are ugly, to just say you are ugly and not to cover it would be the best you could do. That would make better sense with all the fighting—not to try to make the ugliness nice but to take it as it is. Then it would be sublime.

Mrs. Crowley: That seems to fit in with the next verse also.

Prof. Jung: But it doesn't quite fit in with the general tenor of Zarathustra. You see, he uses that idea later on in his conception of the ugliest man. There he really speaks of ugliness, and as you know he rejects the ugliest man: there is nothing sublime about him. So I rather think—together with the doubt “what is good?”—it would mean, “Now what is ugly? Do you think you are ugly, or do you appear as ugly? Well then, cover yourself up by the sublime in accepting your ugliness.” For instance, the pale criminal is the one who does not accept fully the fact that he is a criminal; if he could only accept it he would not be pale, and then he would be in a way sublime. So if they accept ugliness they might possess austerity. Certain people are so ugly that they really are austere. Have you ever seen the picture of the ugly Tyrolese Duchess? She was the ugliest woman in history—the ugliest that was ever portrayed; I don't doubt there have been other monsters. She was just a monster, highly interesting, and one could say sublime in her ugliness, a real masterpiece of ugliness. So you see I would rather take it in the same way that we understood the pale criminal; as far as I can make out, the austere or the sublime is a cover for the ugliness. I am glad to accept your idea, but that is the way it looks to me. This verse, “And when your soul becometh great,” etc., would mean, then, that the soul does not hide itself any longer and that is sublimity, austerity. You see, becoming proud or übermütig<sup>4</sup> is like an inflation, and an inflated person surely will not hide his light from other people, but will show his hand, will manifest himself so that he can be seen; he is so filled with the idea of himself that in his own eyes he is perfect or great, and he thinks other people will see him as he sees himself. Therefore, all his ugliness comes to the foreground, and then it could be called sublime; there is an austerity about it. Yet Nietzsche says the austerity is malicious.

<sup>3</sup> This volume of Philosophical Romance and Tales contains Candide and other satires. On his deathbed when the curate of his parish asked Voltaire to acknowledge the divinity of Jesus, he turned away saying, “Let me die in peace,” and he did.

Now, in how far that austerity is malicious is not easily to be seen. You see, Nietzsche has a funny kind of attitude toward the austere or sublime; it is almost as if he were afraid of it. It sounds too good, like the austerity of somebody who has renounced life or overcome himself; that sounds like perfection which has a very bad smell and it had a particularly bad smell in his days. So it is almost necessary for him to put a point on that sublimity which makes it less moral or less beautiful; he cannot acknowledge or recognize it fully without putting a certain sting into it, a certain resentment and that is this maliciousness. Sublimity would be almost too dangerous also, because he has said so many disagreeable things about sublime people that it would mean having to contradict himself. Therefore, he must call it malicious, a Bosheit,<sup>5</sup> a sort of joke, as Voltaire would surely do. You know, when Monsieur Arouet de Voltaire, the father of the French enlightenment, the worst mouth in Europe, came to die, and the Abbé who came to take his confession asked him if he regretted all his sins, he said: "Mais oui, je regrette tous mes péchés, surtout ceux que je n'ai pas commis."<sup>6</sup> That is malicious, the sublime and the ridiculous in one. That is the pathos of Voltaire, that to the very last, with his last breath, he is malicious. But Nietzsche is not, he is pathetisch, an expressive actor of his own tragedy.

Mrs. Sigg: Is it not just the way Zarathustra treated the Jews before? He put on a sublime attitude but he was quite malicious to them.

Prof. Jung: No, he is not malicious, he talks about it, but he is sentimental.

Mrs. Sigg: It is Bosheit.

Prof. Jung: No, read Voltaire. There is really a poisonous sting, and Nietzsche has not that refinement, one could say.

Mrs. Baynes: Nietzsche is much too serious.

Prof. Jung: Yes, and maliciousness is never serious.

Mrs. Fierz: Has this kind of maliciousness a faint resemblance to his dancer idea?

<sup>5</sup> For Bosheit, Hollingdale* also has "wickedness," and Kaufmann*, "sarcasm." Another possibility is "badness."

<sup>6</sup> Voltaire said, "But yes, I regret all my sins, especially those which I did not commit."

Prof. Jung: Exactly. The dancing idea is also a making light of things which are really very heavy. He is much impressed by the weight of things, he is awfully serious, and so he makes light of them. But you don't feel the lightness; you are never really taken off your feet as it were, never lifted from the ground. There is too much pathos in it—it is too heavy, too sentimental. While if you read a good joke in Voltaire you laugh, you cannot help yourself; it is light, liberated. Nietzsche was a great admirer of the French, and of just the French aphorists who had developed this art of turning a whole situation by one word, but he never succeeds; he is a master of language sure enough, and he has also made many good jokes, but he is too German, too serious.

Mrs. Sigg: I think there is no word in the German language that has exactly the meaning of maliciousness.

Prof. Jung: Of course not. Bosheit weighs about ten tons, it is not light: it has not the sting of a wasp. The French malicieux is a Latin word; it is just not German, and it designates something which cannot be translated, as the German word gemütlich cannot be translated. The Frenchman's equivalent for gemütlich is a café with marble tables on a boulevard, or a salon where the Gemüt would freeze to death.

Mrs. Crowley: Is it due to a lack of real feeling in the German?

Prof. Jung: No, it is just the peculiar capacity of the German to pack so many things together in his sentiment, a whole museum of realities; Gemütlichkeit is anything from bacon and beer up to a guitar—it is inimitable. So his idea that in sublimity there is malice is an attempt to make sublimity something light, somewhat unreal, but he does not succeed. If you want to know how a very serious thing can be made light, read Candide by Voltaire, read his talk with Pangloss, the philosopher, who suffers from a very disreputable disease about which he is very optimistic in order to make light of it. See how Voltaire treats that subject and you see what maliciousness is and what making light of a difficult thing can be. You will then understand also that the German language is absolutely incapable of producing such a word. The very words in French are so detached, so abstract, so refined, so definite, that you really can isolate one thing against another. But the German words to designate anything emotional or sentimental are so full of earth that they are just heavy. The lightest things you can find in German are certain light sentiments—a German waltz, for instance, is light—but it is not the lightness of France. It is still a feeling with blood in it and some earth; yes, it is a dance but you see the weight of the sentiment in the dance; it has nothing whatever to do with the French sentiment.

Nietzsche says, then, that in sublimity there is malice—he hopes there is malice—that the sublime is not so terribly sublime. If it really reached the highest stage it would show a hook. It does, mind you; if anyone happens to be sublime then sure enough he is the victim of it. What can he do? He is nothing but sublime. And if anyone is really good, what can he do against that? He is nothing but good and he is a victim of it, for without anything bad he has lost his freedom. Therefore I always fight against it when the theologians say God is good. Meister Eckhart says God is not good because if he were good he could be better. That is true. Moreover I would say he loses his freedom because he is then bound to be good, can do nothing but good, which would be a very grave restriction to his omnipotence and is surely not meant. So sublimity has a drawback somewhere because of its one-sidedness. If you have to do with sublime people you feel the maliciousness; it is a fact that they are victims of sublimity and then they are poisonous bores. But it is a malignity of fate; it is something malign and not exactly malicious, an evil thing because it is so perfect. All the shadow and evil is suppressed and naturally pours forth somewhere else. Nothing is more boring and more destructive for one's morality than a relation to undoubtedly Good People: it is disastrous. Children of very good people must become morally defective in order to compensate for that goodness, and naturally the sublime must be compensated for right away by the unfortunate partners in the game. That is the real malice in perfect sublimity. And the one who can compensate for his own sublimity by a hook or by a flaw, say, is never quite sublime. So you cannot have both. It is a supernatural freedom he aspires to because it is humanly impossible to have both things at the same time.

In wickedness the haughty man and the weakling meet. But they misunderstand one another. I know you.

Ye shall only have enemies to be hated, but not enemies to be despised. Ye must be proud of your enemies; then, the successes of your enemies are also your successes.

Resistance—that is the distinction of the slave. Let your distinction be obedience. Let your commanding itself be obeying.

Again, if this is for the crowd it is hardly worth listening to; if it is meant for the individual, it is something else—then it makes sense. For instance, that you shall not have enemies whom you despise means you shall not despise the enemy in yourself; you may hate him but you must not despise him, for you would then despise yourself. If you hate something in yourself, that is a real conflict. Also you can be proud of your enemy because you can conclude as to your own qualities if you know your enemy; if you have in yourself a particularly bad enemy you know that you have something particularly good on the other side. Then also, "Resistance—that is the distinction of the slave. Let your distinction be obedience." If you apply that to the individual, of course it makes sense—otherwise it makes none; to let your very command be obedience, would mean, obey yourself.

To the good warrior soundeth "thou shalt" pleasanter than "I will." And all that is dear unto you, ye shall first have it commanded unto you.

That is also a very good idea when applied to the individual. If you say "I will," it is usually an inflation because as a matter of fact you don't will it; but if you feel it as "thou shalt," it is in a way easier to accept—also it is more true because the self is not identical with the ego. The ego says "I will," the self says "thou shalt." So the ego feels as if somebody had said "thou shalt"; and that is true—at all events it is more true than "I will," and more efficient. In that sense everybody should be aware of the warrior in his own self, accept his superior insight as a "thou shalt" and never as "I will." If the latter is true, you are in danger of an inflation because you can only carry that responsibility as far as your ego reaches; you cannot carry it as far as your self reaches, because that is beyond your responsibility. Your responsibility is one aspect, one function of the self, but it has other aspects; irresponsibility is also an aspect of the self. Nietzsche means something like that when he speaks of that which is beyond good and evil. The Superman is beyond good and evil but the Superman is the self.

Let your love to life be love to your highest hope; and let your highest hope be the highest thought of life!

Nietzsche says something here which is really a foundation of a new morality, one could say. Formerly the idea was, that whatever was pleasant to the gods was good. Of course a primitive chief would say that what was good for himself was good, and what was good for the other and bad for himself was necessarily bad; he has no other point of view. Later on, as I said, the idea would be that the word of God tells you what is good, and you are bad if you don't fulfil it; you must not stand against that standpoint. Now, inasmuch as these metaphysical concepts have disappeared, we are surely in need of a new foundation. By what standard can we say that a thing is good? We must have some sort of measurement. Well, life would be such a standard: for instance, whatever is vital is of moral importance.

Of course one would refrain from using the word good there because it has acquired a particular quality in the history of morality; you know very well that the vital thing is not just good as we understand that word. But you cannot deny it is vital, and that being the case you can also not deny that it looks to you as if there were something good about it, something worthwhile. Perhaps you would say that to decide a thing in such and such a way would be good and moral, but then you see that it is not vital to decide it in that way; so a more vital solution should be sought, allowing life to be lived. But you cannot call it good, despite the fact that you feel it to be more worthwhile than to seek a moral issue. We call too many things good which have lost their vitality altogether; they are no longer worthwhile, no longer living. And there are other things that never have been called particularly good, but sure enough, they convey more life—are not only vital in themselves but also provide a much better basis for living. They give forms or possibilities which enrich life. We have plenty of moral ideas which impoverish life and we think it is even good to do so, but then we discover that we do it not for any moral reasons but out of sheer cowardice—just cowardice and pretext; we hide our cowardice behind moral laws, and it doesn't help very much to believe in their validity. In modern times, we have therefore become very doubtful about moral standards and the so-called idea that a thing is good or bad. The only question is: "Is it vital? Does it help life?" You see, we have now learned to think of life as a fact, not as a wilful and arbitrary affair of certain individuals. Life in itself is a great fact and we assume that it has its laws quite irrespective of our codes of morality; we feel more and more that our moral code is inadequate to deal with life.

That point of view is not altogether modern; we find it already in the Mandaean Gnosis of John the Baptizer, the initiator of Christ, who was one of the representatives of that secret teaching. In the Book of John one is astonished to find at the end of each chapter that almost epical phrase: "And the Life be praised, victorious was Life." They had the idea that the "understanding of life" was the savior: their savior was that Mandâ d'hayyê,<sup>7</sup> the Gnosis of life. They believed that the understanding of life was the supreme knowledge—that the ultimate decision about human action was given through life itself. So the whole of history, as they saw it, was a question of whether life would be victorious or not, a sort of shout of triumph that life was again victorious.

Peculiarly enough there is the same epical ending in a book by Zola, and he could not have known of the Book of John, because that has only very lately been translated; it was written in the Southern Babylonian Aramaic, a lost language which even existing adherents of that belief were unable to read; a German scholar has deciphered it again only very recently. Yet in one of Zola's books, I think it is Fécondité, one finds exactly the same ending to the chapters, "And victorious was life."<sup>8</sup> Now, Nietzsche says, "Let your highest hope be the highest thought of life." One could say just as well, "Let life be your highest thought of hope." Then you would put nothing above the fact of life, but Nietzsche puts something over or above life, a hope and a concept of life. But life itself should decide, as it always does in reality. We cannot hide the fact any longer from our philosophical consideration that life ultimately decides and that those are the decisions which are valid and always come true, despite all attempts of man to restrict life, to canalize and to organize it: finally life will break through all barriers.

Your highest concept [thoughts], however, ye shall have it commanded unto you by me—and it is this: man is something that is to be surpassed.

Have you any argument against this sentence?

Mr. Allemann: That man has to be surmounted is destructive to life; man is living, man is the highest idea.

Prof. Jung: Yes, if man doesn't live, what else is there?

Mrs. Sigg: I have no sympathy for that sentence, that he will command.

Mrs. Adler: It is just logic that if he commands, it is not our highest idea, and that cannot be accepted. The command of the highest idea of another might be too high for us.

Prof. Jung: Yes, it would be a concept in place of life; that is the thing we cannot agree with.

Mrs. Baynes: It does not seem to me destructive to say that man must be surmounted; it does not mean that humanity must be killed, but should keep on growing.

Miss Wolff: I think Nietzsche means that man must be surmounted in order to become the Superman.

Prof. Jung: Yes, it cannot be taken so literally. But the first part of the sentence, "Your highest concept, however, ye shall have it commanded unto you by me . . ." needs a lot of interpretation. This sentence only becomes acceptable if one assumes that Zarathustra represented the Superman as being the self of everybody. If that were the case, then one could accept whatever is commanded, because as I said, it is true. It corresponds with the actual psychological fact when we accept the command of the self as a "thou shalt," the self being not identical with the ego. So here, if you understand that Zarathustra is the self of everybody, then that self can command us, and whatever it commands is the highest thought. But I don't like that word concept there; a concept is already an abstraction from life; if instead the sentence were, "Ye shall accept your life as commanded by me," I could accept it—naturally with the supposition that Zarathustra is the self of everybody.

Mrs. Jung: In the German text it is Gedanke which is not the same as concept, it is something more living. Would it not be rather translated by "idea"?

Prof. Jung: That is true, Gedanke is milder; concept is much too sharp, too definite. It is less offensive in the German text; you can leave it as it is. Gedanke is wide enough. You see, conceptus means something that is completely caught, a concept, a thing you have grasped, while Gedanke is not necessarily: you can have Gedanke, ideas, which you have not grasped; as a rule our ideas are like free birds in the air which we have not yet caught or grasped.

Mrs. Crowley: It is "thought" in this translation. Would "your highest thought" be the equivalent in English.

Prof. Jung: Yes, "thought" is acceptable.

Mrs. Crowley: May I ask what you mean by Zarathustra being the self of everybody—doesn't that make him collective?

Prof. Jung: Well, inasmuch as Zarathustra is Nietzsche's Superman, or Nietzsche's self, and inasmuch as we accept the idea that man has a self and that "Zarathustra" is an apt expression for the self, we can say that "Zarathustra" might symbolize the self of everybody. For instance, instead of calling Zarathustra the self, call him Nietzsche's genius, or god; then inasfar as we accept the possibility that everybody has a relation to God we can say he is the God of everybody.

Mrs. Crowley: Yes, I can see it that way, but not in the way of command.

Prof. Jung: Well, if there is a god, you will be under a command; otherwise it is not a god. So if you accept the idea of the self you are under the command of the self because your ego is only a part.

Mrs. Crowley: You mean of a self, not the self. How could everybody be under the command of the same self?

Prof. Jung: The point is that we don't know how far that self reaches.

Inasmuch as we agree that Zarathustra is very modern and vital, we can be in doubt whether "Zarathustra" does not express, at least to a certain degree, the self under whose command we are actually living.

The last sentences are mere rhetoric:

So live your life of obedience and of war! What matter about long life! What warrior wisheth to be spared!

I spare you not, I love you from my very heart, my brethren in war!

Now, we come to the chapter called, "The New Idol," and that new idol, as you will have seen in the first verse, is the state. What is the transition? How does the chapter on war and warriors lead over to the new idol, the state? You see, we are just following the steps of history.

Mrs. Baumann: If the chapter we have just finished is dealing with the individual, as it seems to be, then the next thing will probably be a collective consideration.

Prof. Jung: Yes, if it is dealing with individuals, but I am afraid that it is not just dealing with individuals. The two aspects are confusing. You see, Nietzsche's intuition is right as applied to the individual, but through the identification of the human individual Nietzsche with the archetype Zarathustra, it becomes generalized and has also a collective aspect. So he anticipates the possibility, which for us is already a historical fact, that what ought to be taking place in the individual is happening collectively in a nation, and not only in one nation but in several. It is as if the process of individuation, which is now constellated, were happening on a lower story, on the lowest story of collectivity, where it is not the business of one individual but the business of a whole group. We already have spoken of that; it is a sort of compromise between the individual and humanity. You see, humanity is universal, not even a matter of a group; but what actually is happening is very clearly a matter of national groups, namely, the idea of autarkia, the autonomy and self-sufficiency of nations. That has become the leading idea instead of individuation. It is just as if God himself were split up from a universal existence into a national existence, so there is a god of France, a god of Italy, a god of Germany, a god of England. Nietzsche says God himself has become a Jew, and one could say God himself had become German or Italian; that is expressed by a leader, whether they call him Duce or Führer is all the same.

Miss Wolff: War is always made by a state or a monarch, and the warrior means the army, so in the very idea of war the state is implied.

Prof. Jung: That is perfectly true: the very idea of warriors, or soldiers, presupposes a general will above them, a monarch or a general or a state. That would be the cause of the existence of warriors, but the question is, how do we progress from the idea of warriors and war to the state?

Mrs. Fierz: When the kind of individuation which he describes here is taking place in collectivity, the state is a sort of persona, the incarnation of this individuation, and the change taking place will be described as happening within that form or that personality, the individuating collectivity.

Prof. Jung: Yes, but that is all expressed in my interpretation of the chapter about the warriors. I want to know how we can make the transition in Nietzsche's language, and we have always seen that the very end of the preceding chapter is really an answer to the main issue.

Dr. Elliot: One has the sense that in talking about the warriors, one is not clear about the way war is going to happen, whether it would be individual or collective. If collective, the state would have to follow.

Prof. Jung: But why does the state follow? Why nothing else? The state would be the new idol, the thing that is going ahead, but why just the state?

Mrs. Jung: War and warriors mean an outburst of primitive libido which calls for order and law, and that is what the state stands for.

Prof. Jung: Yes, it becomes clear in the end of the chapter that some sort of authority is wanted. And why?

Mrs. Jung: Because the instincts are aroused.

Prof. Jung: Exactly. The chapter is about war and warriors, about people participating in war, and war is disorder, a wild upheaval of instincts, and naturally that calls for order. If it is collective, it must be a collective organization; if it is individual, then what is wanted?

Mrs. Crowley: Individuation.

Prof. Jung: Well, individuation as a condition of order, and how does that express itself?

Mrs. Jung: In limitation.

Prof. Jung: Well yes, that would be a result. But how does it express itself?

Dr. Strong: By the symbol.

Prof. Jung: Yes, the symbolic way; the expression through the symbol is the way of individuation. That is indispensable: it always expresses itself in a symbol, and that is again the ambiguity. Therefore Nietzsche does not call the next chapter "About the State," but calls it, "The New Idol." So what he really means is that this whole situation of war and warriors, of instincts, disorder, conflagrations and catastrophes—all this needs an answer, say a principle of order or control. It would need an idol. And what is an idol? An idol is a symbol which possesses authority, which is mana. In the individual case, if it is a question of individuation, the symbol creates order; but if it is a question of collective events, it must be an organization, and then it is no longer a symbol. Then the symbol becomes an idol. For one only uses the word idol to depreciate the symbol; as long as a picture or a monument is a symbol, it works, it lives, but the moment it becomes an idol it is dead. A symbol that is dead is called an idol and the worship of it is idolatry. But one never would call the symbolic use of such a thing idolatry, because it is working through itself, it is living. That is just the difference between a living symbol and a dead idol. In this title you can see that ambiguity going on; it is as if Zarathustra or Nietzsche were feeling the right thing, feeling that it ought to be a symbol and not an idol. So the New Idol would mean the new-old error, always that collective so-called symbol which is nothing but an idol. And now instead of what we had before, we have a state.

Mind you, we experience history in our time—we are actually living history, and that is no small matter; formerly people read history, now they live it. Of course we always had a state in Christianity, the church, but we did not live in the time when the church was the idol. The church then had the so-called totalitarian claim, she was the ultimate authority, with no authority beyond. As we know, the Catholic church has greater authority than the Holy Scriptures, because there was a church long before the Evangels were written. St. Paul, for instance, lived in a time when the Evangels were not considered to be books of revelation; even after his time they were only thought to be quite useful books. So the church, because she is older, always declares that she is the only competent interpreter of the Scriptures. The worldly power has always tried to liberate itself from the totalitarian claim of the church, and now the church has lost prestige to such an extent that the claim has had to change its abode. You see, that totality claim always exists. That is the need of the symbol, or the idol: somewhere we must have that supreme authority. For a time, it was invisible and we were seeking it everywhere. Of course we had the illusion that people didn't need a supreme idol, but secretly science began to flirt with the idea that perhaps science or rationalism was the idol. H. G. Wells has just published four articles in the Manchester Guardian about his recent trip to the United States, and if you want to read the story of a true adherent to the idol of science and rationalism, read H. G. Wells.<sup>9</sup> He believes that if we had a science of money and property, and if there were better universities, if certain learned men only would speak, then the world could be improved. That is like thinking that if we would only hear the word of God, everything would be all right, as they formerly thought. Now you see that totality claim, after having had a short flirtation with science, has, not very proudly, appeared on the scene of the world in the totalitarian claim of the state, first in Russia to the horror of the world, then in Italy, then in Germany, and perhaps it will go further.

Mrs. Volkhardt: You hear about the Totalitätsanspruch, that “claim of totality,” every day in the street in Germany.

Prof. Jung: Well, it is a fact that this claim was the prerogative of the church in medieval times; then during the time of enlightenment it began to fade away, having made several attempts to identify with science. The enlightenment was based upon the déesse raison—a totality claim of reason—and later on it was hoped that science would be the supreme authority.<sup>10</sup> But lo and behold, out comes the state, that monster, and says that it is the totality, that it can turn the trick. Now, Nietzsche feels very clearly that rousing conflict—wild instincts, preaching war and courage and enterprise—would naturally lead to an anarchic condition which needs a supreme authority; and at bottom he knows it ought to be a symbol. It must be the eidos, the symbol. Yet, inasmuch as the conflagration is collective, it will happen on the level of collectivity, and be the individuation not of an individual but of a group—probably a national group or a tribe—and then that tribe will have supreme authority. Then since there is no such thing as a spiritual organization—since God himself, the invisible king of the church, is dead—the idea of the tribal god will lead into a human organization called the state. With that we return to a sort of tribal organization minus the spiritual element. But they will worship the state as they worshipped God before: if something was the decree of God, it was ultimate, with nothing beyond. Formerly, they said God must help you, but now they speak of the support of the unemployed by the state; the state will look after everything. But what is the state? It is perfectly ridiculous, and that is what Nietzsche felt.

Mrs. Sigg: Is it not really a Protestant ideal that only the individual God should have the claim of totality?

Prof. Jung: Well, the totality claim naturally has undergone many changes in the course of time. It was first the church, but in Protestantism naturally that was no longer true. Luther tried to make the church the supreme authority, but it soon became obvious that after once breaking its authority, he could not make it supreme again. Therefore, he liked to maintain the illusion that his Lutheran church was in connection with the Catholic church. The Lutherans believed in the apostolic succession, in transubstantiation, that only the church could administer the pharmakon athanasias, the communion; and he did not like it at all when the church repudiated him. He tried to save a sort of authority, but you know how little it helped, once the authority was broken through. So the authority within Protestantism had to be God—and the Bible, which is a very bad substitute for authority, being much too contradictory; as you know it is on the index in the Catholic church, and rightly so.

Mrs. Sigg: But I think Luther tried to educate the Protestants to have their own individual God as the highest authority.

Prof. Jung: Not an individual God, but the universal God. The mistake is just there: it is an individual relation to the god but the god is universal. The invisible authority to which you can always have recourse is the Bible, the word of God, and that is a very doubtful authority, since it is man-made. It was assumed that it was made by God himself, yet God obviously contradicted himself several times and said very funny things, so it did not make a good authority after all. That was soon found out in the scientific criticism of the Scriptures; science was the formidable instrument by which the Bible was undermined—and the Protestant creed at the same time: science killed it completely. So the last remnants of the totality claim disappeared and must reappear elsewhere. Nietzsche foresaw that very clearly—he was not in vain a parson's son. That the new idol would be the state was a tremendous intuition.

Mrs. Crowley: Would he not also have sensed it historically through Karl Marx? It was the breaking up of the old system anyway.

Prof. Jung: Yes. And he felt naturally the tremendous need of authority in Germany; this was a fact, and so it was inevitable. I don't say it is a great prophecy, but it was a very true intuition: he foresaw quite naturally the course events would take. At the time he wrote Zarathustra, the socialistic state was already widely discussed, and there the state was the ultimate authority. In the latter part of the nineteenth century the state became personified, and one more and more lost sight of the fact that it was an abstraction. As for instance, natural science lost the understanding of the fact that energy is a concept. We have only recently discovered that matter is a concept; we always thought it was something substantial but it is only a concept. And so we still believe, and the man in the street believes, that the state is something. But it is nothing, a mere illusion, a convention—as a matter of fact it is thinner than air, everybody speaks of it as if it were the subject, but it is simply the illusory object of everybody.

Mrs. Sigg: It seems to be characteristic of the psychology of philosophers that they are apt to write books about the state, and it seems to be true of Nietzsche, too. So I thought it might be a sort of symbolic action; they were concerned with the outer world when really the inner world was more important, when there was a necessity for inner organization, for individuation.

Prof. Jung: Oh well, you cannot say that. For instance, Plato surely did not write his book about the New Republic through any necessity for individuation. That is out of the question. We can only speak of individuation in a case like Nietzsche whose spiritual father was Schopenhauer. He already speaks of the principium individuationis and deals with it largely; his whole philosophy was based upon that.<sup>11</sup> And all that preparation was needed. You find no such thing with the old philosophers because they were at peace with god; the world was quiet and there were only a few amendments to the divine order. Now I think we will begin this new chapter:

Somewhere there are still peoples and herds, but not with us, my brethren: here there are states.

A state? What is that? Well! open now your ears unto me, for now will I say unto you my word concerning the death of peoples.

A state is called the coldest of all cold monsters.

That is pretty strong language. You know, Nietzsche is a great friend of life. He has a pretty shrewd idea of the reality of life, as being the only real thing; so he is quite suspicious as to concepts. All concepts that have become personified, concretized, are exceedingly poisonous, and one of the most poisonous and dangerous concretizations is surely the state, because it is merely the hypostasis of a convention. And if a concept or an idea becomes concretized or personified, there is always a fatal analogy to a very famous historical event, which Nietzsche would say to beware of. What would that be?

<sup>11</sup> Schopenhauer invoked the scholastic "Principle of Individuation" to indicate how the universal will, itself (like the unconscious for Jung) single and undifferentiated through spatial and temporal locations, gets translated into a multiplicity of individuals. See The World as Will and Representation, vol. I, book II, sec. 23.

Mrs. Sigg: The Word that became flesh.

Prof. Jung: Of course, the Word that appeared in the world. You see, if the word of God becomes flesh, you can cope with it—that makes sense since anything that is has been spoken by God. That God has spoken the world is an age-old truth, and we are perfectly familiar with it. This is the way it should be. But when man's words become real, you are doubtful at least; things become rather critical. For instance, would you trust any of the living leaders of the world with speaking creative words? Let us assume that Mr. Roosevelt, for instance, were equipped with the word of power, that what he said must be. Would you submit to it?

Mrs. Baynes: No!

Prof. Jung: Of course you would not, even if you are an American, because we don't trust one single human being with the authority, the competence, to speak the word that is worth being concretized. Yet by whom is that word, the state, spoken? Not even by one decent individual: it is spoken by newspapers—and see what Nietzsche says about newspapers a little further down. The state is a terrible concretization, but if such things begin to concretize it is the very devil, as Nietzsche feels. You see, it is absolutely in keeping with his own development: he says "God is dead," that whatever speaks is man. He does not even take into consideration that he is not the Superman; he speaks with the voice of thunder as Zarathustra, assuming that he is Zarathustra. Zarathustra would be the word, yes, his words might concretize because he is an angel of God, you could say. But surely the state is not the word of God. It is the invention of the many and therefore dangerous and poisonous; it is a devilish invention replacing the eternal plan of God that should rule the world. It is man instead of the divine competence, the limited mind instead of the infinite mind, things based upon temporal assumptions instead of upon eternal verities. So you can understand why Nietzsche calls the state the coldest of all cold monsters. If he still believed in the devil he would say it was the devil's own invention, like a theologian whom I once treated. He had suffered before the war from a very difficult and serious neurosis, but when I met him after the war and asked how he was faring, he told me that he was quite in order. Then I asked him what on earth he was doing with the church, and that theologian cold-bloodedly replied, "Oh, the church is of course an invention of the devil, but if you live in this world you must deal with the devil." The church is an invention of the devil inasmuch as it is man's own work; for man is always a single isolated individual, not the universal man, but only a temporal and very local man, so anything he knows is only locally, temporally true. If he invents anything of a universal character, it is sure to be bad, because it is against this or that eternal verity.

LECTURE VIII

26 June 1935

Prof. Jung:

We began the chapter called "The New Idol" last time. It goes on:

A state is called the coldest of all cold monsters. Coldly lieth it also; and this lie creepeth from its mouth: "I, the state, am the people."

That the state is the people is a very modern consideration. You see, if the state is the people, then the people is the state; you cannot separate the two. But Nietzsche is trying to do so, and people in our days often make that attempt.

It is a lie! Creators were they who created peoples, and hung a faith and a love over them: thus they served life.

Now that is grand, of course; great creators have created peoples, and imposed on them—or tried to impose on them—one faith and one love. Could you give me an example?

Mr. Allemann: Moses.

Mrs. Baynes: Mohammed.

Prof. Jung: Those are very good examples.

Mrs. Adler: And in China, those old kings.

Prof. Jung: Oh no, they were legendary, and they did not make peoples in China, they followed the principles of Wu Wei.<sup>1</sup>

Mr. Allemann: The old theocracies, like Egypt, or the Incas in Peru?

Prof. Jung: But they were impersonal. The Egyptian theocracy was an entirely anonymous body; even the Pharaoh, with his absolute power, or any oriental tyrant, one could say was an anonymous figure, the son of the sun, a divine being, and as such anonymous.

Mr. Allemann: Zoroaster?

Prof. Jung: Well, that is a bit obscure; one could not say he had created a state, though it came to something like that in the course of centuries.

Mrs. Baynes: The popes in the Holy Roman Empire?

Prof. Jung: The Pope also is anonymous; it doesn't matter what kind of gentleman the Pope is. It must be a personal leader.

Mrs. Fierz: Napoleon?

Dr. Strong: Lenin?

Mrs. Sigg: Hitler?

Prof. Jung: Yes, those are creators; they created peoples and imposed on them one faith, but what about the love? One questions whether there is much love in it. Nietzsche apparently feels that his statement is exceedingly one-sided and therefore he continues:

Destroyers are they who lay snares for many, and call it the state: they hang a sword [one could say one sword] and a hundred cravings [lusts] over them [lusts meaning desires].

Here we have an entirely different picture, the reverse of the one he showed first. Now, it is a fact that human beings are never perfect; they may have wonderful and idealistic purposes but they cannot create anything without the black substance included. Whoever creates light must create shadow, and whoever creates shadow creates also light; whatever is created must have two faces—for one it is positive, and for another it is negative. For instance, if you happen not to believe in Islam in a Mohammedan country, you have a story to tell—if you are still alive to tell it. And the same in Italy if you happen not to be a Fascist. Inasmuch as you are a Fascist or a National Socialist, naturally you can be enthusiastic; you have one faith and one love, but if you deviate from that principle, you will feel that it is one sword and a hundred desires. Now to what does he allude here by the hundred desires?

Mrs. Fierz: All the things people ask from the state if they become dependent.

Prof. Jung: Yes, in a communist state, all the lowest desires of man, his avariciousness for instance, are of course stimulated, and those are the moving forces. You see that also in actual German history, and in Italy. And you cannot imagine that the Islamic conquerors were moved by entirely idealistic motives in making the world acquainted with the faith of Allah; they were moved by all sorts of quite ordinary lusts. They pilfered and murdered and destroyed and conquered countries, enslaving whole nations. That is the truth you see, so these two separate aspects of the thing created are really one and the same:

anything that is created has a dark and a bright side and one should have no illusions about it. If it is in any way good and ideal, it is good and ideal only for certain people; for others it is hell. You cannot say the state is the people and then twist it round and say the people is the state. You have read in the papers, perhaps, that Goebbels has recently delivered such a speech, saying it wasn't the state they cared for, but the people. But what is the people? The people is the state. The two are intrinsically the same; only when a state includes several different peoples would it be otherwise. In this case, one people makes the state, so one rightly says the people is the state; but in this case the state is also the people, so the first sentence is true—or may be true. Of course it is by no means certain that the fact of the people being the state has an entirely positive aspect; if you reverse it and say the state is the people, then the second part of what Nietzsche says is true, because the state is an absolutely soulless monster. But inasmuch as the state and people are identical, both statements are true, both are valid. Naturally, they are only relatively true; if a thing is both bright and dark, then it is only relatively bright and relatively dark. So I consider this an insufficient attempt to create a favorable case for the people. Nietzsche provides the Fascists, the National Socialists, or the Communists with a strong argument for the excellence of their idea, but he provides also a very strong argument in favor of the opposite point of view, that the people is the state. As a matter of fact, both statements are true, and therefore the result is only a relative truth. Every word Nietzsche says in this chapter, then, can be used in favor of a Fascist, National Socialist, or a Communist state, and it also can be used as the best argument against all those creations.

This sign I give unto you: every people speaketh its language of good and evil; thus its neighbour understandeth not. Its language hath it devised for itself in laws and customs.

This is nationalism, like the claims of the German or Latin nationalists, the customs and rights of the people, the sacro egoismo and the difference from all other peoples. They have even divided the metaphysical universe: God is now either German or French or Italian, and there is a new German creed. One could speak of a Yugoslavian or a Serbian or a Turkish creed, but the whole world would laugh if we should speak of a Swiss creed or a special Swiss god.

But the state lieth in all languages of good and evil; and whatever it saith it lieth; and whatever it hath it hath stolen.

That is perfectly true. But inasmuch as the state is the people it is true of the people too.

False is everything in it; with stolen teeth it biteth, the biting one. False are even its bowels.

Confusion of language of good and evil; this sign I give unto you as the sign of the state. Verily, the will to death, indicateth this sign! Verily, it beckoneth unto the preachers of death!

All that is true if you really consider the state as absolute, detached from the people, but since the people is the state, it is necessarily true of the people too, and each people is in fact a confounding of languages of good and evil. Collectivity in itself is an evil, a collectivity without evil is impossible; even the best collectivity one could imagine is vicious—at all events a most horrible bore, and to be boring is equal to evil. It is the least, one could say, of positive vices. Look at the great organizations and their morality! We had three great organizations before the war, that famous trinity—the German army, the Standard Oil Company, and the Catholic church. Each considers itself a perfectly moral institution. For instance, Mr. Rockefeller once told me that the Austrians were very bad people, so I thought he must have some fantasies about Vienna, but no, he said: “You know, Doctor, perhaps, of my idea for a standardized price in favor of the Standard Oil Trust; you see what a great advantage it is to pay the same price for oil all over the world—it is for the good of the people—but the Austrians have made a separate contract with Rumania. Those people are very bad.” You see, when a great many people heap themselves up in a sort of organization, their morality deteriorates; mob psychology then prevails and whatever the mob does not want it destroys. So even if a person is fighting with the noblest of motives against an organization, it does not matter; he is the enemy and must be wiped out. Any great organization is a most destructive monster as soon as one goes against it; no matter what one’s character and motives are, one will be destroyed. We know from history that many of the best characters have been wiped out by such organizations; thousands of decent human beings have been destroyed by that Standard Oil Trust. And we know how many of the finest people have been wiped out by the church. For a great organization has to lower its morality in order to cope with the masses; one cannot cope with the masses without making one’s morality of the lowest order, most ambiguous and hypocritical. There are many examples in the Catholic church; it is an old saying that the church has a good stomach. It can digest anything, every vice under the sun, provided it is not against the creed. Inasmuch as one belongs to the church, everything can be dealt with, everything can be condoned, excepting the sin against that organization. Of course, that is what I call a very low, primitive morality. Nietzsche here is quite positive that the state is a great evil but cannot help seeing that we cannot do without it; as soon as a people is living as an organized body, it must be something like a state, and then there is the devil. So he goes on:

Many too many are born: for the superfluous ones was the state devised.

Yes, they are born unfortunately, and they are thus superfluous ones and for them we need a state.

See just how it enticeth them to it, the many-too-many! How it swalloweth and cheweth and recheweth them!

That is exactly what would be expected of a decent state, it chews over the many-too-many and gets them into a sort of shape. We must be grateful that there is such a machine to devour those nondescript masses which otherwise would be a pest. Therefore, it is exceedingly important to have something like the Catholic church with a stomach able to digest even the most indigestible people. We can turn and twist it as we like, we always need something like a state with police regulations in order to cope with the masses. The good things are only for the few. Well, the state says:

“On earth there is nothing greater than I: It is I who am the regulating finger of God”—thus roareth the monster. And not only the long-eared and short-sighted fall upon their knees.

They will fall upon their knees because there is a great truth in what he says—not in what the state says, of course. After all, the state is a great organization, it is an element of order; it is a monster, but humanity is monstrous too, a people is a monster. Twenty people together are already monstrous, because their psychology is no longer human, but approaches the animal. It is not your virtue that is heaped up in a crowd, but what is commonly human, and that is the inferior man; your morality is lowered. In a crowd of several hundred people you are able to commit a horrible crime without feeling it; you don't know what you are doing, but are simply carried away by the enthusiasm around you, and your morality is utterly gone. Under the mental contagion of the crowd you are a herd animal. Now, that great monster, the people, can only be kept in order by another monster, just as a wild elephant cannot be dealt with alone, but only with the aid of other elephants. So against the monster of the people you have the monster of the state, and that is simply a necessary evil; there are no other means. You cannot rule a people by decent means, because that monster fights you with the most indecent ways of a cunning animal; you cannot keep it in order by good intentions and pious words and nice deeds because they won't be appreciated. The people only appreciate it when they beat or when they are beaten. That is a fact, and it is perfectly ridiculous to think of ruling people by kindness and wisdom: that is just air.

Mrs. Volkhardt: There is a rumor that Italy is making this war with Abyssinia in order to deal with the unemployed—as a good means of employing them and getting rid of them.

Prof. Jung: Yes, malaria is an excellent means to get rid of the many-too-many. This is a bit of good statesmanship—if it succeeds!

Miss Hannah: Then why does Mussolini give prizes to big families?

Prof. Jung: Well, there you are! That is this animal inconsistency. If there are many human beings, he has a big army. Italy is then great and powerful and everybody is proud to have such a state; they believe in it, and so they can be kept in order. But if you have too many you must destroy them, must invent a colonial war in a particularly pestilential country where there is a reasonable chance that so many thousands will be wiped out. That is absolutely necessary, because they must go somewhere. It is like the Japanese who are now trying to conquer China, it is not a particularly pernicious country as to malaria, but the climate of Manchuria is a bit rough on the Japanese; I suppose they will run millions of people into that country with the secret hope that the climate will deal with them. Why not? Of course one cannot say they are doing it just in order to wipe them out; if they can live there all the better. One can also say that Mussolini is not trying to kill those people; he must do it in a reasonable measure. He could do it much better by making a war with France, for instance. France is well equipped to destroy, so Mussolini could reckon with a million dead; in these modern times even the civilian population will not be spared. Towns will be bombarded with poison gas and a great many women and children will be wiped out too. That would be business on a grand scale, but it would injure the state, so he can only risk a reasonable loss of blood, a war with a state like Abyssinia. These things are inevitable inasmuch as there is humanity and the state. The state is only man-made; it is the psychology of a people. The state is the order people create for themselves, and if it leads to such issues as war or wholesale slaughter, well, that is what people look for. Because they cannot help themselves in a reasonable way, it must be done in an unreasonable way.

You see, in our mob psychology—which is now called national psychology—we are still exactly like animals. You remember the story of the lemmings, those rodents that populate the north of Sweden and Norway: they are shy, isolated animals, yet from time to time they increase in numbers to such an extent that they form an organization, a state, and then they wander west through villages and cities, eating everything, and finally they walk out into the sea and are drowned. The same phenomenon occurs with a kind of bird in Canada; it is a perfectly nice, civil creature, seldom in large numbers, but occasionally the numbers increase to such an extent that they also wander west and are drowned in the Pacific. That is human psychology; people migrate west if possible, and if there is no place there they wander east, in order to kill off their surplus population. For instance, the Norsemen would surely never have made excursions into Africa if there had not been an increase of population and a desire to do something about it. And once underway, people form a kind of an order, like a parade, and they have leaders to show them the way. So it began. In primitive tribes they have no military leaders except in time of war; then they create a special sort of leader with absolute power to whom everybody submits, and they form a sort of state, so an order is created which leads to a certain amount of destruction. Of course, with their primitive weapons they never could create such wholesale slaughter as we can; when it began to rain they simply gave up the war and went home, like the old Chinese, because the gods were apparently not favorable to a warlike enterprise at that moment. But the white man has built up his consciousness and energy to such an extent that he can produce marvels which the world has never seen before, enormous catastrophes. In Switzerland also, we have no military leader when peace is prevailing; in wartime the Federal Council elects a general, who is the only leader Switzerland ever has, but he is only king during the time of war; when the war is over he goes home and is a citizen again. That is the way it was with primitive tribes, and the modern state has created that need again.

Mrs. Baumann: How was it that China could govern by Wu Wei? Could you call that also a monster?

Prof. Jung: No, because the Chinese were planted firmly in the soil like trees; old China consisted of fields and houses and people living in houses chosen for them by astrologers and soothsayers, and everybody lived for himself and by himself. That is expressed beautifully in the House of Exile;<sup>2</sup> such people make no war and no state. For instance, if a gentleman in a political council utters an opinion which is not heard or appreciated, then he goes home—that is all it needs. Think of a delegate in the Federal Council or in the Chambre de Députés whose advice is not heard! But a Chinaman would not shout and raise hell, he would simply go home. So if the whole Chambre de Députés would go to their respective homes, France would thrive; tous les polissons would go home—Monsieur Doumergue, or Briand, or Laval, or whoever the gentleman is, makes a very nice figure at home with his little belly and good wine—and France would be at peace. China is not a state, but a people—well, not even a people—living and feeding on pieces of ground, exchanging their goods for other people's goods, and having no leaders because everybody remains at home. Nobody wanders about to steal and rob and kill, so why have soldiers? There are petty thieves of course, so there are high walls round the courtyards with a small door through which they communicate with the world. That is Chinese life, and the Emperor is a great gentleman who also lives in such a place; his walls are much thicker and higher than those of the little man, but there he lives with his wives and courtesans and all his apparat, and he is just a gentleman who does not bother. He is nice and polite to people—they pay visits to him and he also calls on them occasionally—and the affairs of the state consist of certain wise edicts, like building canals so that particular regions may be watered better. Then there is also a body of soldiers, say ten thousand men, who are sent into parts of that immense country when certain gentlemen become unruly. But one would hardly need soldiers. Sometimes parts of the country are not in order. Heaven and earth have separated for a while. The ordinances of heaven have not been properly heard and those people are in error; and so they are politely told, perhaps with the aid of a bit of poison, that what they are doing is not nice—it offends the rules of heaven—and then the whole thing is arranged again.

We would say this was most horrible disorder, because they don't discuss matters. There is no parliament, no police; we understand order as a sort of belligerent or warlike action, because we start from the idea that we are wild animals that must be shot down or we would never obey. The Chinese start from the idea that to be human is to be civilized.

Mrs. Fierz: In the House of Exile, when that girl asks what war is going on, the Chinaman answers, "It is not a war, it is an epoch."

Prof. Jung: Yes, that is very good. You see, a modern American girl comes to visit Chinese friends with whom her family has had business connections for a hundred years or more. They meet her at Peking and she accompanies them to their homestead somewhere in the interior, travelling through a devastated part of the country where a revolution is going on, shooting and corpses, etc. Of course, the American girl is frightened but the Chinaman calmly explains that this is an epoch, meaning that such a disturbed period would last seventy or ninety years perhaps and then pass by. People live quietly in their houses, a lot of evil happens, there are bad people, but it is of small importance. That is human. We would react by making a hell of a fuss; we would say this was the first and only war, and it was for the highest good, and never again. But to the Chinaman this is simply an epoch where things are not in harmony and so there is friction, and naturally where there are soldiers, rifles will go off. But I am afraid this very old human way of looking at things is fast disappearing in China; they are getting thoroughly infected by the western poison. I only hope we shall be infected by the Chinese: it would be much better.

You see, Nietzsche is terribly excited here; a Chinaman would not understand his language. But with newspapers counting up every day how many accidents have occurred and how many crimes have been committed, we are naturally impressed with their overwhelming number and can't help thinking in terms of statistics, as if we were the brain of a whole nation of seventy million individuals. Of course we get excited. For instance, if one sees one man that is drunk one thinks, "Oh well, that is just a drunken man, he is probably a bad number." But when we read that every day there are a thousand accidents on account of drunkenness, that any number of children are destroyed by bad parents, bad inheritance, mental diseases, and God-knows-what, we naturally feel that to be horrible. The increase and widening out of consciousness through newspapers informs us of horrors of which we never dreamt before and which really should not exist for us because they happen in the distance; for the thing that is, is here. You see, it is a human point of view, that whatever is in the distance of time and space is not for us because we are not there and don't know of it—yes, occasionally some evil happens of course. Such people have a much better idea of life; they are more positive because they are not so frightened. They see only a relative amount of evil. Of course the one who is actually under the wheel is thoroughly under the wheel because he is the only one under the wheel, but even that has its merits in a way. He has a much fuller experience of life.

If you move for a while among primitives or less civilized peoples, you see how they experience every moment as something total, full—as something which has a complete and absolutely indisputable meaning. For instance, a youngish native comes swaggering along decked in marvelous colors and plumes and a sword and God-knows-what, and he is the cock, he is the bull, the hero—he is a hell of a fellow and has no feelings of inferiority. He is vainglorious and ambitious and a damned fool all over, but he is complete; he is happy for that period of life between twenty and thirty. Then along comes an old man between fifty and sixty—primitives grow old earlier than we do—and he is nothing but old. He is the old man that always has been, has never been young; he personifies old age. In every word he says, in every gesture he makes, he is the old man that always has existed and always will exist. So all those people live as if there were no future and no past, they live now; they have no newspapers, no telephones, they don't know what is happening at a distance of seven kilometers even. There might be a war but they wouldn't know it; perhaps two weeks later they hear there has been a war between two tribes but they are not touched by it in the least: it is an agreeable legend. Of course, if it happens to them there is nothing but war, a complete mania of war, but it lasts only a short time and then they get sick of it, go home, and the war has come to an end. You see, such people have the full human life, can fully experience it; there is no telephone to disturb them in the realization of their momentary life, no invasion by millions of other lives lived on their own planet.

We don't come into our own because we must share the life of China, Japan, America, and God-knows-what; we are not in the here and now. If only the telephone and the newspapers would stop, and people flying from a distance at four hundred kilometers an hour in order to bring a new life, a new existence, into a place where they have no right to be, then we would not share that life thousands of kilometers away; it is artificial and it doesn't exist. We are now radio crazy, we begin to hear voices; we hear the voices of all nations and, God! they are just as human as we are. One was just now in Ethiopia and now one is in Manchuria and now in India, one simply switches off into somewhere else and then one is somebody else, and one cannot help acknowledging that it is real. We even hear the voices of the jungle, hear the lions roaring. I always thought my mother's reaction to the telephone was quite right. She was born in a time when there were no telephones, and I was already a young student when I became acquainted with it. She never would go to the sorcerer's box, as she called it, but once we persuaded her to come when her cousin was telephoning, and she put her ear to the receiver looking hard into that hole, and said, "Yes, yes, I hear you but I cannot see you!" Her cousin wanted to tell her something, but my mother wouldn't listen, and finally she smashed the receiver into the box and said she never would telephone again. This is a sound, natural reaction; it is not right that we should hear somebody speaking and not see them: that is organized madness. We call those people crazy who suggest that they hear voices out of objects, but that is what we are doing; it is unnatural. Man is not up to it and so he loses himself sure enough.

Zarathustra continues:

Ah! even in your ears, ye great souls, it whispereth its gloomy lies! Ah! it findeth out the rich hearts which willingly lavish themselves!

Yea, it findeth you out too, ye conquerors of the old God! Weary ye became of the conflict, and now your weariness serveth the new idol!

Heroes and honourable ones, it would fain set up around it, the new idol! Gladly it basketh in the sunshine of good consciences—the cold monster!

Everything will it give you, if ye worship it, the new idol: thus it purchaseth the lustre of your virtue, and the glance of your proud eyes.

It seeketh to allure by means of you, the many-too-many! Yea, a hellish artifice hath here been devised, a death-horse jingling with the trappings of divine honours!

Well, here Nietzsche mentions an important point which he could not omit seeing: namely, the peculiar, suggestive power which the idea of the state has, even upon people whom one would suppose to be unprejudiced and able to see what a terrible monster it can be. But it is quite understandable that even the best of people are accessible to the idea of a state because, as I said, a state functions as something very real. You see, when the state claims to be like God's finger creating order out of chaos, it is true to a certain extent; it is monstrous, not human, but a people in its wholeness is not human. It is a big animal, and therefore it needs another monster to tame it. And because that is an inexorable fact, even the finest people are accessible to the idea of a state, they must admit that it functions as something and they must even pay homage to it. For they feel very clearly that if they don't, they are lost; they are surely much weaker and if they are not careful, they risk being trampled to death by that monster. As important people are very often reasonably intelligent too, they cannot fail to see that. They surely will be aware that it is much better to cope with the powers of the world than to neglect them; only very stupid people neglect obvious dangers.

So quite against his liking, Nietzsche has to admit that even the good people, as he sees them, cannot help acknowledging the existence of the state and the necessity of paying homage to it, even if they see that the state buys them for the loss of their virtue as a sort of advertising. The state is like any big organization; when an important person has joined it, they will print it in huge letters as a good advertisement. It always needs advertising because it needs the faith and confidence of the masses; a state or any other organization will point to the fact that there are very big men in it for the sake of its own existence. If it should become clear that only nondescripts, very unimportant people, were members of that organization, it would lose all its prestige and no longer be able to function. So it is absolutely out of the question that a man of a certain importance should be able to keep entirely clear of that monster. If he wants to deal with the world at all, it means dealing with the monster; and since it is so much stronger than he, he must behave in such a way that it does not get excited. He has to feed the monster and to please it, to give it sugar now and then, in order that it may treat the poor worm of an isolated individual more or less decently.

The thing is only wrong when a man loses the idea of himself, when he sells his soul to the organization. But it is then bad for the organization too, for the good influence he could exert becomes a bad influence; he is the shining example of one who has sold his soul, and other people imitate him right away. They will sell their souls all the more readily. To be soulless is of course the great danger of any large organization, and it only has a soul inasmuch as a few individuals within it are brave or courageous enough to retain their own souls; if there is only one human soul in it, it has at least that human soul, which is always better than none at all. And isolated souls outside the organization have no power whatever, because they don't deal with the monster. Even the God of Job, as you remember, had not only one monster but two with which to rule the world, the leviathan and the behemoth; the leviathan fills one third of the ocean and is the ruler of the seas, and the behemoth rules the earth. Now, if God himself cannot do without two monsters—acolytes—how can man do without them? It is perfectly true that the state baits its hook with names of important figures to catch the many-too-many, and that is right: the state is there for that purpose, as any organization is there for that purpose.

I would even defend the Standard Oil Company; as a matter of fact it is a great convenience since small companies could not afford to establish pump stations in any odd place: they would not have the capital. But a great organization can do so, and one cannot deny that a standard price for oil has a certain value. The Catholic church also has a standard price in a way; it affords an easy access to so many people who are utterly unable to imagine what spirit could be. There are images and attractive ceremonies, and there are most understanding and urbane priests—the Franciscans for instance, who bring things very close to the understanding of the ordinary people. Protestantism suffers from the fact that we have no such organization. The Catholics surely fulfil an extraordinarily important task in that they keep so many of the unruly chaotic masses in check. They isolate them against each other, and they influence the newspapers, comb the material very carefully so as not to let the wrong things get through, and they paint certain things in becoming colors in order to make them acceptable. They create very useful illusions; if such an organization really works, many an evil can be avoided.

I always say we would not have such organizations if there were not a vital need for them; therefore, we should not feel above them, but be grateful that they exist. But one should see their danger, and the danger always comes in where the individual is selling his soul. If you sell your soul you have done the worst service to the state, as the state naturally—inasmuch as it tempts you to sell your soul—is committing a crime. But you cannot say the monster commits a crime. That is no point of view at all because a monster is amoral; it cannot commit crimes, as it cannot do anything good. Good and evil are considerations for the individual but not for a monster. What can a monster do with good and evil? If you judge it by moral considerations, as Nietzsche judges it, then naturally it is a thing which has an exceedingly low morality, as a rhino or a hippo has a very low morality. Humanity is just that, a huge amphibian.

Yea, a dying for many hath here been devised, which glorifieth itself as life; verily, a hearty service unto all preachers of death.

He really makes too bad a case for the state; but, you can say the same of people.

The state, I call it, where all are poison-drinkers, the good and the bad. . . .

But why do they drink the poison? They don't need to.

the state, where all lose themselves, the good and the bad: the state, where the slow suicide of all—is called "life."

Why do they lose themselves? You can be part of a thing without losing yourself in it. Of course, there our education plays a trick on us in inculcating our so-called honesty, that seeming honesty which tries to persuade us that if we eat the bread of somebody we must also sing their song; the idea that if we serve the state, we must also believe in the state. This prejudice comes from religion, from the quite illegitimate claim of the Protestant church of being the whole thing: the so-called totalitarian claim. As you serve the church you must believe in the essential doctrines of the church. If you are part of the church you are wholly in the church. You have to sell your soul to the church, and consider it to be a mighty good work to do so. But you only need to sell your soul externally to Catholicism, and don't need to believe the dogmas, not one of them. I know a man who informed the priest that he could not possibly be converted because he could not believe in the dogma of eternal perdition in hell. And the priest said, "Oh, that should not be a hindrance, I don't believe it either." "But how is that—can you be a priest and not believe in the dogma?" "Well, of course the dogma is true—there is eternal perdition—but when people die they see at once the purpose of God and what a mistake they have made in the world, so they repent instantly and never get into perdition. It is just as if it did not exist." That is the exceedingly smooth way the Catholic church operates.

I once had some interesting talks with a very able Jesuit and I brought the discussion to the belief in the dogma: then I saw that I was discussing that old matter in the way of a true Protestant—we are fools enough to believe that Catholics believe in the dogma. He said, "Of course the church must have a dogma which is the absolute truth, but the dogma lives. It grows in the course of centuries; certain dogmas have not always existed and some have been added. At any time the Pope can declare a new dogma to be authoritative and then that is a new truth. If you don't agree with it, that is your individual freedom; you don't need to agree with it, but only must not say it aloud; you make a fist in your pocket and wait. For instance, we Germans are of course rather strange birds to those Roman Cardinals. They don't understand our psychology, so it often happens that we have different views—they may become dogma later, but the Pope does not at present see his way to adopt them, so for the time being, such people declare pater peccavi and they will receive absolution provided that they don't talk." I also asked him about a recent case where a Catholic professor made some criticism of certain historical facts, nothing bad, but it was against the instruction of the bishop; and he said that of course one had to reprimand such a man because the young students whom he was teaching were not able to judge the thing properly, to see it in the right perspective. Confusion was created which was not good for their spiritual welfare. I said, "Right you are, one has to be careful what one says; to guide great masses one must avoid confusion and contradictions." Therefore, a general rule must be established to cling to, and the leader also must cling to it. Otherwise, one upsets the church; for the life of the church one has to be careful, one has to shut up. The Catholic point of view is that it is far more important to them to be in the church than to believe in the church; to believe in it means precious little. They talk of it but it does not mean so much.

This is an antique idea. To be in the sacred place is the essential religious observance. The church is full of mana and if you are in the same room where transubstantiation takes place and follow the Mass more or less, you receive part of the grace; you can discuss business between times while people pray, but if you hear part of the Mass and are impregnated with that particular smell of the eucharist, you have it on you—whether your mind has been there or not. That is the real conception. Of course, we make great mistakes in judging Catholicism; we are no longer aware of that very primitive and antique point of view in Catholicism which is simply necessary to hold the masses. You cannot expect all those primitive people to have a spiritual attitude. They don't know what it is, even, but if they are in the sacred place, they are sanctified somehow; they see it, they hear it, they smell it, they are under the same roof—and that is enough. As, for example, it is quite enough for most people to feel very distinguished by having one or the other distinguished person for a friend. They don't need any particular distinction themselves, but are in contact with that person and so they are right. And in the eyes of the world, they are. The Catholic church deals with the point of view of the world, and therefore it catches the world. While Protestantism doesn't catch the world, of course; it has developed that most laudable point of view of entire conviction and entire self-sacrifice—entire devotion to a certain spiritual principle. But what happens when the spiritual principle dies out and disappears? Then they seek something which has an equal totality claim and that is the state.

So instead of the church the state has now the totality claim, because people need that feeling of totality. If anybody is not for the state, he is against the state, as if the state were Christ himself; if anybody belongs to the state without believing in it, he himself thinks it is hypocritical. But that is not true, because you cannot trust that monster the state; you can only trust it as far as the intelligence of the monster goes but no further. And as you are not in any human relation with it, you cannot say the monster behaves disreputably or that it is a nuisance and vicious: those are no considerations for a monster. For instance, if a rhino behaves as a real rhino is bound to behave, it is in order, not a bad animal; a domesticated rhino that did not take you upon its horns at sight would be the bad rhino. You see, the Protestant is quite particularly exposed to that danger of thinking his highest duty to be the belief in the organization by which he is employed; he thinks he should believe in the state whose employee he is, for instance, and that is a great mistake. Through a kind of idealism he sells his soul without knowing it, devotes his soul to the state as if it were a god. It is even a dangerous thing to devote one's soul entirely to God, since we are living in the world. Do it and see where you land. You get out of the world and might as well be an eternal ghost—you don't live any longer and are not in time; you cannot devote yourself to the nowhere because you are here. So it is impossible for the human being to devote himself entirely to God. The mystics knew that the remoteness from God was an intrinsic part of the union with God.

Just see these superfluous ones! They steal the works of the inventors and the treasures of the wise. Culture, they call their theft—and everything becometh sickness and trouble unto them!

Just see these superfluous ones! Sick are they always; they vomit their bile and call it a newspaper. They devour one another, and cannot even digest themselves.

Just not, that is the trouble.

Just see these superfluous ones! Wealth they acquire, and become poorer thereby. . . . and jump into the open air.

Nietzsche loses all inhibitions here. He only sees the state as a swamp full of vipers and evil. But that is humanity, those are human beings. The state doesn't even stink, because it does not exist. The state is a convention, an abstraction; only very stupid people think that the state exists. It is a mere imagination, a conventional term for a certain number of individuals; the only reality is in its being a convention, a sort of agreement, of so many people. If anything really stinks, it is humanity. Come into a room where many people have been, and you smell humanity right away, and it is nothing very nice: it smells like an animal. The negroes say that wild animals shun man because his smell is like the smell of lions, and it might be that inasmuch as we eat meat we do smell like animals of prey. We are impressed by the smell of negroes because it seems to be quite different, a bit more pronounced I should say, definitely "inhuman," but it is not so different from a European smell when there are a number together. You can confirm mob psychology through the psychological smell of a great number of individuals: they smell exactly like their psychology. Smelling is a half psychological function, one could almost say; you can smell things which you really cannot smell: you intuit through smelling. Sometimes you get an impression through smell which surely has not been transferred by an actual odor. It is as if you had smelt a peculiar quality.

Do not go out of the way of the bad odour! Withdraw from the idolatry of the superfluous!

Do not go out of the way of the bad odour! Withdraw from the steam of these human sacrifices!

Open still remaineth the earth for great souls. Empty are still many sites for lone ones and twain ones, around which floateth the odour of tranquil seas.

You see, this could be just as well an admonition, not to the state but to the people, collectivity; therefore, he speaks of hermits. For he feels very clearly that if he has such a resistance against the state, he has it against humanity, and he must exclude himself from humanity if he is to land where he wants to land finally. So a great soul does not belong to the crowd, but must necessarily be outside the crowd; he is positive in that respect. And he says the world is still open, with many places where great souls can live in isolation. Now, here is a point which has always been a sort of question mark to me: I never know exactly what Nietzsche means when he says here "one or two." Who is the other one? It is a funny kind of hermit who lives with somebody else. I suppose he had a peculiar feeling of duality, as if there might be another one. There are plenty of reasons for that. Zarathustra and Nietzsche are two, for instance. I think this is the most probable explanation.

Mr. Allemann: Is it not because he cannot do without somebody who listens—without an ego?

Prof. Jung: Exactly, and the question is how that appears to him. Is it the intercourse between Nietzsche and Zarathustra, or is it an entente with somebody else? It might be the anima, but he discovers anima psychology only at the end of Zarathustra and in the years afterwards when he was becoming crazy; up to then it was entirely a question of his relation to Zarathustra. You know, he belongs to the people living east of the Rhine where there is no anima psychology yet; masculine psychology, the Puer eternus psychology, prevails there on account of the youth of those tribes. In the older civilization west of the Rhine the anima problem comes up, but east of the Rhine there is generally the problem of the relationship between man and the subordinate principle—an idea or an enthusiasm, for instance, or a big enterprise. It is entirely the psychology of the youth who is entering life where the world consists mainly of men. There are female appendages who serve a certain purpose, for the propagation of the tribe or for romantic feelings, but there is no other use for them. Therefore, you actually see the idea spreading again that a woman belongs in the kitchen and is only useful to produce children—that she has no psychological problem, and no potentiality for soul-development.

Open still remaineth a free life for great souls. Verily, he who possesseth little is so much the less possessed: blessed be moderate poverty.

“Moderate” yes, better than real!

There, where the state ceaseth—there only commenceth the man who is not superfluous: there commenceth the song of the necessary ones, the single and irreplaceable melody.

There, where the state ceaseth—pray look thither, my brethren! Do ye not see it, the rainbow and the bridges of the Superman?

Thus spake Zarathustra.

Well, it is perfectly true that the man who is not superfluous, the man who is needed, is the one who has not sold his soul to an organization, who is able to stand by himself and for himself. Such a man is always necessary just because most people don't stand alone; they sell their souls, and then there is no freedom. The only trace of freedom and the only hope is, of course, in the one who is not devoured by the monster, who can deal with it, who can ride the monster. Therefore, the old Chinese represented their heroes or their great sages as riding the monster. When Confucius was asked what he thought of Lao-tse, whom he did not know personally, he said he didn't know whether he was an expert at weapons, or at driving carts, but however that might be, he knew he was an expert at riding dragons. He knew how to deal with the monster, that is.<sup>3</sup> Now, the dragon is of course the symbol for the collective unconscious; the state is simply the outside appearance of the thousand-headed monster. In the Book of Revelations, the monster with the many heads and the many horns means the nations, the Romans for instance. Any organized body of men is a huge snake; one dreams of such things in that form, and one finds it in historical dreams. Hannibal, for instance, as a young man had a prophetic dream of conquering Italy; he saw that a huge dragon was on his trail, following him and devastating the whole country, which meant of course his army that followed him and devastated the country.<sup>4</sup> It also means the crowd within, the collective unconscious; it is the crowd soul, the collective soul of man. So over against that monster is the man who doesn't sell his soul to it, and he is needed. He should be careful and even should seek a certain amount of solitude in order to maintain his isolation. But he would also be lost if he didn't know how to deal with the crowd. For instance, he might then have to face not only a moderate poverty but extreme poverty.

<sup>3</sup> Of these two sixth-century sages, Jung rarely quoted Confucius, the particularly social philosopher, but the more introverted Lao-tse was a great favorite of his.

<sup>4</sup> In Hannibal's dream he was led by a god-like youth who said he was sent by Jupiter to lead Hannibal into Italy, and cautioned him not to look aside or back, but of course curiosity won. "Then he saw behind him a serpent of monstrous size, that moved along with vast destruction of trees and underbrush, and a storm-cloud coming after, with loud claps of thunder; and on his asking what this prodigious portent was, he was told that it was the devastation of Italy." Livy, tr. ## LECTURE I

Prof. Jung:

We are continuing to plow through Zarathustra. But before beginning I want to tell those among you who have not been in our former seminars that Zarathustra is a very particular case. It is not a case in which we can expect a differentiation of consciousness from the unconscious; on the contrary, we find a considerable identity of conscious and unconscious. Nietzsche's unconscious being activated, he is therefore identical with all its contents, especially in the very first indications of the onslaught of the collective unconscious, which eventually was his undoing. He is identical with the anima and with the archetype of the old wise man and with various other figures, particularly the self, which naturally has then not the quality of a psychic self, but rather the quality of an ancient rather primitive god. That is, of course, at the bottom of his famous Dionysian experience. Now, this very peculiar psychical condition is exceedingly difficult to deal with, because it always must be kept in mind that there is such a complete identity. It is a condition which we hardly ever find in practical analysis. We would find it naturally in creative people in a creative mood, but such cases are very rare because, when in the creative mood, they surely would not care to be analyzed. All our ordinary expectations are baffled by this condition, and that makes it particularly difficult to understand his peculiar psychology. But I must say again that you have brought it on yourselves. I would not have chosen it. Of course, it is very interesting, but you must cock your ears and work in order to understand this very involved tangle. And I would call your attention again to the report on the first seminar about Zarathustra, where I tried to clarify this strange psychology in the form of a sylogismos, a diagram which shows the identity of all the figures that turn up in Zarathustra.<sup>1</sup> Now we will take up the chapter called, "The Flies in the Market-Place."

Flee, my friend, into thy solitude! I see thee deafened with the noise of the great men, and stung all over with the stings of the little ones.

Admirably do forest and rock know how to be silent with thee. Resemble again the tree which thou lovest, the broad-branched one—silently and attentively it o'erhangeth the sea.

You remember, the principal contents of the preceding chapter, "The New Idol," are his ideas about the state; it is as if he had foreseen modern developments. He speaks of the state as the great monster that takes on an extraordinary importance: namely, the wave of collectivism which begins to sway the world and to drown the individual. And as he is fighting for his ideal of the Superman, he naturally tries to assert the right of the individual to live. He sees his Superman in absolute contrast to the state. The state is the archenemy of the Superman, and because the state is the enemy, it is the equivalent of that individual who strives to assert himself and become a Superman.

You see, what has happened there is that the idea of the Superman, or the differentiated individual, having not reached the surface of consciousness, remains in the dark, and therefore it is everywhere; it is in everybody, and everybody becomes so individualized and also so inflated in consciousness that they needs must make a state in order to be able to live. For, when everyone has an inflation they are no longer able to understand one another, and the human and social organizations will disintegrate. Then one sees that it is absolutely necessary that even the most paradoxical standpoints shall be united in order to maintain a sort of order; so all the inflated individuals will form a state in which nobody has any meaning. Naturally, such a condition is quite against the differentiation of the individual; differentiation would be even a danger. That kind of state, which is a sort of compromise between inflated individuals, is afraid of an individual who shows his differentiation; it would mean that the compromise did not work because an individual was sticking out in some way, and the whole compromise was made with the purpose that this should not occur. Such a state is of course the guarantee that no individual shall be able to stick out.

That was the situation in Nietzsche's case, and for quite a while after Nietzsche, until things became so impossible that suddenly individuals began to stick out very badly, especially in certain nations. The world is quite doubtful in regard to that however; some think it is all wrong, others that it is just right. But at all events, that has been the development in our conscious world. Now Nietzsche, being chiefly confronted with a state which was a guarantee against individuals who might stick out, felt that pressure tremendously, which explains why he condemns the state as being the absolute caricature of the idea of the Superman. You see, it is invariably the case when such an idea is hovering above mankind—or is happening in the fundamental structure of the unconscious mind—that it is then everywhere: everybody is infected by it, and everybody has an inflation over it; everybody is an unconscious Superman. And since the individual is unconscious of it, the state has to voice it. All the inflated individuals are anarchistically set against each other, and therefore the state has to assume authority in order to hold them together. So people are invariably forced into a sort of society which guarantees a certain amount of life to every inflated particle under the condition that nobody sticks out.

Miss Wolff: I would like to read to you what Jakob Burckhardt says about the new state.<sup>2</sup> In a letter to a German friend, Friedrich von Preen, he gives a prophecy of future conditions. He says:

Oh, how many things dear to educated minds they will have to throw overboard as mental “luxury.” And how strangely difficult to us the new generation will grow up. It may happen that we shall appear to the younger ones as wholly based on luxuries as the French emigrants appeared to those people to whom they fled.

The essential political nature (commonwealth) of people is a wall, in which this or that nail still can be driven, but the nail has no hold any longer. Therefore in the agreeable twentieth century, Authority will again raise its head, and it will be a terrible head. At last the taking of everything as merely provisional, this right to every wilful innovation, this privilege of every cupidity, will come to its end.

Alas, what will happen to so many interests dear to us? To science, for instance, which is so used to take the back seat on the car of “Progress in general”! How little will the new authority care about science.

<sup>2</sup> Burckhardt wrote further: “It has long been clear to me that the world is moving towards the alternation between complete democracy and absolute lawless despotism. . . . Only people do not like to imagine a world whose rulers utterly ignore law, prosperity, enriching work, and industry, credit, etc. . . .” (Basel, 13 April 1802). The Letters of Jacob Burckhardt, ed. Alexander Dru (New York, 1955).

Prof. Jung: That is a very remarkable prophecy. It must have been written before the end of the eighties because Nietzsche “died” then.

Miss Wolff: Then when Nietzsche was sending Zarathustra to Gottfried Keller,<sup>3</sup> he wrote him a letter (Rome, June 1883) describing his condition while writing the book as follows:

How strange! Out of a very abyss of feelings in which I was thrown by this past winter, the most dangerous of my whole life, all of a sudden I rose and for ten days I was as if under the brightest sky and high over lofty mountains. The fruit of these days is now lying before you.

Prof. Jung: That is a valuable contribution. Well, the feeling of such a condition brings up the realization of what the differentiated individual must feel when forced to live in such a state, and that we now find in the chapter on “The Flies in the Market-Place.” He admonishes his friend to flee to solitude, to nature, to be like a tree, because, he goes on:

Where solitude endeth, there beginneth the market-place; and where the market-place beginneth, there beginneth also the noise of the great actors, and the buzzing of the poison-flies.

In the world even the best things are worthless without those who represent them: those representers, the people call great men.

He says that the best things are of no account in the world characterized by such a state; because no individual is allowed to stick out, the best things can hardly exist. If they do exist, they must be shown, and for that demonstration there are special individuals like actors. So if the role of a king is to be demonstrated, an actor is needed who demonstrates a king—or the hero, or the god—and then people call those showmen or actors the great men.

Little do the people understand what is great—that is to say, the creating agency. But they have a taste for all representers and actors of great things.

<sup>3</sup> On Keller, see above, 16 Oct. 1935, n. 3. Nietzsche sometimes wrote to Keller in a way both intimate and complimentary. He wrote to Hippolyte Taine of the one among the “Swiss whom I consider the only living German poet, Gottfried Keller” (4 July 1887; N/Letters/Fuss).

The great things come into the world through people who are invisible, and then they must be shown by people like playactors, who have just as much relation to the great things as a playactor has to his role. You know that famous passage in Hamlet, "What is Hecuba to him, or he to Hecuba, that he should weep for her? . . ." <sup>4</sup>

    Around the devisers of new values revolveth the world:— invisibly it revolveth.

Here he describes the very important fact that when a great thing is created, it is in the world; but since it is unconsciously in the world, since it is not visible, it is only known by the collective unconscious. It is in the collective unconscious of everybody, and therefore everybody will turn to it; they are made to turn to it quite against their conscious will perhaps. And they don't know to what they turn—if they notice at all that they are turned!

    But around the actors revolve the people and the glory; such is the course of things.

They are turned to the real thing, yet what they discover is the playactors who show it, so they see the mere outer appearance of the thing.

    Spirit, hath the actor, but little conscience of the spirit.

He can act it as if it were his own product, as if it were really himself, and that could be called a lack of intellectual conscience.

    He believeth always in that wherewith he maketh believe most strongly—in himself.

If he does not believe in himself, he is a bad actor. He must believe in himself, must believe that he is the very thing he represents—or he does not represent it. While the one who invents it always presents it in a way which is inspired by intellectual conscience; he doesn't say: "This is myself," and so people don't see it. They cannot, it is too subtle. They only see the man who is acting it.

    Tomorrow he hath a new belief, and the day after, one still newer. Sharp perceptions hath he, like the people, and changeable humors.

To upset—that meaneth with him to prove. To drive mad—that meaneth with him to convince. And blood is counted by him as the best of all arguments.

Here we come to modern history.

A truth which only glideth into fine ears, he calleth falsehood and trumpery. Verily, he believeth only in Gods that make a great noise in the world!

Nowadays, you hear many such great noises. A noise is the evidence that it is something; the more one makes a noise about it, the more one convinces people. We have it in our ears in recent events in Switzerland. That should be an argument.

Full of clattering buffoons is the market-place.

The playactors who identify themselves with the best thing.

and the people glory in their great man! These are for them the masters of the hour.

But the hour presseth them; so they press thee. And also from thee they want Yea or Nay.

Those people are also in a hurry, speak of conquest and cannot wait: This is the day of the Lord! Now is the time! Step up to be a witness! Don't wait any longer because we are in a hurry to secure our success!

Alas! thou wouldst set thy chair betwixt For and Against?

On account of those absolute and impatient ones, be not jealous, thou lover of truth! Never yet did truth cling to the arm of an absolute one.

That hardly needs any comment.

On account of those abrupt ones, return into thy security: only in the market-place is one assailed by Yea? or Nay?

Slow is the experience of all deep fountains: long have they to wait until they know what hath fallen into their depths.

Away from the market-place and from fame taketh place all that is great: away from the market-place and from fame have ever dwelt the devisers of new values.

Flee, my friend, into thy solitude: I see thee stung all over by the poisonous flies. Flee thither, where a rough, strong breeze bloweth!

Now what does he mean by poisonous flies? Why just this peculiar figure of speech?

Mrs. Fierz: Could they not be words which are in the air, stinging and poisonous?

Prof. Jung: Well, swarms of flies are poison in the air, so it might mean the thoughts that are flying about, the rumors, the newspapers, or a slogan of the day. And from poisonous flies one gets terrible infections like blood poisoning; they are an awful pest. This symbol of blood poisoning or infection often turns up in dreams where a collective infection is meant, frequently represented as a venereal or tubercular infection, or any other contagious disease. You see, the one on the way of individuation is naturally exposed to collective infection; all the obvious truth he hears out in the marketplace is decidedly poisonous because it is absolutely against his way, his attempt. It tells him how wrong he is and how things ought to be done, which is all against his grain. If he allows himself to be infected by such views, he will soon die as an individual and be part of a flood or a great river; he will rush along and think himself a great fellow, but he is only one fat sheep perhaps in a whole herd, no more. So it is an almost mortal danger to expose oneself to the flies of the marketplace. Of course one could ask, is there no possibility of immunity—a protection against this infection? Should such a differentiated individual not be particularly protected just by his differentiation? And I should say, yes he ought to be protected: I don't think differentiation is of any use if one is simply more exposed to such dangers than before. But this danger of infection comes from a certain condition. Do you know what that is?

Mrs. Baumann: By being in participation<sup>5</sup> through his unconscious.

Prof. Jung: Yes, and by his likeness to the flies in the marketplace. Nietzsche is a fly too, and he forgets all about it when he aims at the Superman. You see, identifying with the Superman means that he is no longer a fly in the marketplace. If he could only realize that he is just one of those ordinary people, he would be aware that it was quite natural that he should participate in that movement, and then it would not be dangerous. He would say, "Naturally, the collective man in myself is feeling for them or against them, but inasmuch as I am not a collective man, I don't mix in with all that." One could say, "Inasmuch as I am a body I am in the same swing; yet inasmuch as I am human I am out of it. I don't identify with it as I don't identify with my body or with the lower layers of my psyche." So the danger Nietzsche describes here is only valid inasmuch as he has an inflation; he identifies with the Superman and leaves the ordinary man behind, as we saw long ago. And naturally he has then no longer the protection of the collective being that surely would allow him to be one of the crowd in the marketplace without getting a dangerous infection. Such infections only happen when one is not humble enough, when one immodestly and immoderately identifies with one's ideals or the ideals of the Superman; then naturally one has no basis, but is suspended in the air, only to come down and wake up, perhaps, having fallen into a deep black hole.

Flee into thy solitude! Thou hast lived too closely to the small and pitiable. Flee from their invisible vengeance! Towards thee they have nothing but vengeance.

That would not be the case if he could accept his shadow, the collective man in himself; inasmuch as he cannot, naturally he will have the whole world against him.

Raise no longer an arm against them! Innumerable are they, and it is not thy lot to be a fly-flap.

You see, he should accept the fact that he is one of the flies; he cannot wipe out the ordinary man because he is one of them, and if he tries to do so he simply creates a hysterical dissociation in himself.

Innumerable are the small and pitiable ones: and of many a proud structure, rain-drops and weeds have been the ruin.

If you don't take care of it, sure enough that will come.

Thou art not stone; but already hast thou become hollow by the numerous drops. Thou wilt yet break and burst by the numerous drops.

One can only say, don't be a stone because you are human; if you are a stone as well as a human being, you will hollow yourself out by your own raindrops: your own life will hollow you out. You should not be stone, you should be flexible.

Exhausted I see thee, by poisonous flies; bleeding I see thee, and torn at a hundred spots; and thy pride will not even upbraid.

Blood they would have from thee in all innocence; blood their bloodless souls crave for—and they sting, therefore, in all innocence.

But thou, profound one, thou sufferest too profoundly even from small wounds; and ere thou hadst recovered, the same poison-worm crawled over thy hand.

What does he mean by this peculiar figure, the poisonous creature, der Giftwurm, in the German text?

Mrs. Fierz: Did he not once dream that he had a toad on his hand?

Prof. Jung: Yes. Bernoulli published the correspondence between Nietzsche and his friend Overbeck, a professor of church history in Basel—it was he who fetched Nietzsche back from Turin to Basel when he broke down.<sup>6</sup> Now in this correspondence, he mentions the fact that Nietzsche always suffered from the peculiar phobia that when he saw a toad, he felt that he ought to swallow it. And once when he was sitting beside a young woman at a dinner, he told her of a dream he had had, in which he saw his hand with all the anatomical detail, quite translucent, absolutely pure and crystal-like, and then suddenly an ugly toad was sitting upon his hand and he had to swallow it. You know, the toad has always been suspected of being poisonous, so it represents a secret poison hidden in the darkness where such creatures live—they are nocturnal animals. And the extraordinary fact is that it is a parallel to what actually happened to Nietzsche, of all people—that exceedingly sensitive nervous man has a syphilitic infection. That is a historical fact—I know the doctor who took care of him. It was when he was twenty-three years old. I am sure this dream refers to that fatal impression; this absolutely pure system infected by the poison of the darkness.

But that kind of thing happens to such people; I don't say it is always venereal disease—any other infection or injury may happen to people who are too intuitive, who live beyond themselves, without paying attention enough to the body, to the reality of life. We of course hate to talk of disgusting or evil or dangerous things; we are like primitives in that respect. It is unfavorable to mention them. Yet we cannot live in a world which is not, but have to live in a world which is. If Nietzsche had paid attention enough to the reality of his extraordinary sensitive nervous system on the one side, and to the fact of the world on the other side, he would have been very careful to avoid situations in which he could have gotten such an infection; he would have known the effect it would have in his life. Such a situation is not unavoidable. But it is to just those people whose reality sense is defective that those things do happen. To anybody else it would not be so terrible, but to a nervous system such as Nietzsche possessed it was a horrible fatality, and I think that this dream expresses it. Sitting beside that young woman the fact came back to him unconsciously and he felt forced to tell her of the dream in order to inform her: Don't touch me! I am unclean—marked by my fate. He had to give her full information. People do that when they talk to you unconsciously; they always provide you with the necessary information about themselves. It often happens that perfect strangers tell you all about themselves, provided you cock your ears and provided it is important to them to do so. So I think the poisonous creature that creeps over his hand is really the quintessence of what the world did to Nietzsche. But it could do such a thing to him only through the fact that he did not pay attention. He was not aware of the world, did not see it as it was, because he did not see himself as he was. In this way it could happen.

Too proud art thou to kill these sweet-tooths. But take care lest it be thy fate to suffer all their poisonous injustice!

They buzz around thee also with their praise: obtrusiveness, is their praise. They want to be close to thy skin and thy blood.

It is perfectly true that as soon as somebody sticks out—when he goes ahead, for instance—many leeches try to get to the foreground by drinking his blood; but they can only do it when such a man is absolutely unaware of his body, of his real existence. If he is aware of it he simply brushes the flies away.

Miss Wolff: The flies could get at Nietzsche, also, because he was too isolated. He frightened his friends away, being very intolerant with them. Yet, even if they did not understand him, they were really very good friends. He was too much alone, and because he did not attend enough to his relationships, that amount of psychic energy which is to be applied to them was being sucked out of him by collectivity. So he could not just brush off the flies.

Prof. Jung: Well, if he had known the collective man in himself he would have been protected, but he was too much alone and so was separated from the open door to himself through which all the leeches could creep in.

They flatter thee, as one flattereth a God or devil; they whimper before thee, as before a God or devil. What doth it come to? Flatterers are they, and whimperers, and nothing more.

That that flattery is another source of the infection is of course perfectly obvious. You see, projections can happen through hostility or a negative attitude as well as through a so-called positive attitude; those are simply two different ways of carrying projections or infections.

Often, also, do they show themselves to thee as amiable ones.
But that hath ever been the prudence of the cowardly. Yea! the cowardly are wise!

They think much about thee with their circumscribed souls—thou art always suspected by them!

Well, he describes here the condition of a general idea which had not yet reached consciousness, which is in the collective unconscious, causing as I said, an infection of consciousness which can show, for instance, in a peculiar inflation. You know, when a person has an unconscious content—say a certain archetype is constellated—then his conscious, not realizing what the matter is, will be filled with the emanation or radiation of that activated archetype. And then he behaves unconsciously as if he were that archetype, but he expresses the identity in terms of his ego personality, so that everybody who is clear-sighted and not prejudiced will say, “Oh, well, that fellow is just inflated, he is a pompous ass, he is ridiculous.” For he unconsciously plays a role and tries to represent something which he has taken to be his own self—of course, not the self in the philosophic sense—but merely his ego personality exaggerated by the influx and emanations of the unconscious archetype.

You see, the unconscious, activated archetype is like a rising sun, a source of energy or warmth which warms up the ego personality from within, and then the ego personality begins to radiate as if it were God-knows-what. But it radiates its own colors, expresses the archetype in its own personal way, and therefore it appears as if the ego were all-important. Whereas the ego is of no importance at all in reality, but is simply urged from within, pushed forward and made to perform as if it were important. The importance is the greatness that is behind. For instance, you find in the Upanishads the cosmogonic myth of Prajapati, the first being who, when he found that he was all alone, that there was nothing which was not himself, began to talk to his own greatness, or the greatness within himself spoke to him.<sup>7</sup> You see, the original philosophic mind makes that difference—the ego thinks, “I am all alone," a pretty miserable condition. But there is also a greatness which is peculiarly myself, yet it is not myself; it speaks to me and even tells me that which I did not know. So this is merely a projection of that original mind which knows very clearly that the opinions of consciousness are of little importance, and that it is a greatness behind that consciousness which speaks the truth. But if one is unconscious of it, then naturally one has an inflation and behaves as if one were the greatness.

Now, when you see people who obviously have an inflation, of course you can blame them for having it, for being pompous asses, ridiculous playactors; but you can also understand them as being motivated, as being a symbolic expression of an underlying importance which they do not see. And you make no mistake if you assume that those people have obviously touched upon something of great importance which works upon them and pushes them into an importance which perhaps they themselves have not sought. But it is so sweet that when you get it you won't let go of it—you cannot say no. If somebody says, "Are you not grand, a wonder character?" you say, "No, no!"—but push the crown a little nearer and you will take it.<sup>8</sup> So these things happen from that infection.

Then in the paragraph. "They think much about thee with their circumscribed souls—thou art always suspected by them!" he speaks of people finding a fellow who represents the thing which causes their inflation. You see, the cause according to Nietzsche is the all-pervading archetypal idea of the Superman, the greatness of man—and his idealism or ambition is to attain to that greatness. And one cannot say this is not legitimate; it is a fact that there are philosophies, religious systems and so on, which hold such a conviction: they even teach it. The idea that we should overcome, that we should be good, is all the Superman in different editions. That we should try to attain a state of Nirvana, not desiring this or that, being free of the opposites, being beyond good and evil, is simply the Indian edition of the Superman. To be in Tao is the Chinese form. Those are all very difficult appearances of the same idea. So his aspiration to become his own greatness is legitimate. It is clear that this idea becomes conscious in Nietzsche and therefore, inasmuch as he identifies himself with the Superman's greatness, he is that which moved everybody else at that time. For instance, how did Jakob Burckhardt know about the future? Through his own unconscious, by his own psychological condition. How could he see the role authority would play? Because those chapters were in Jakob Burckhardt as they were in everybody, so much in everybody that now they come off in reality: we see them performed before our eyes on the stage of the world.

Now, if Nietzsche is conscious of this idea and identical with it, it is quite to be expected that he will become suspect, for when people meet the apparent carrier of the source of their inflation, they naturally will immediately try to suppress that individual who sticks out, just because he threatens that inflation. For then they are no longer the only sun in heaven—there is another sun, and that should not be. That is not legitimate. Naturally, they will say he apes something, aspires to something, and should be suppressed, because he threatens to take the value out of their pocket which is the happy cause of their most cherished inflation. That is of course disagreeable and therefore people suspect the one who is perhaps conscious of that value. Well, that of course must be. You see, they are not conscious of it, and to be conscious of the idea which causes the general inflation is already an asset; that is more than to be merely unconsciously filled with it.

So Nietzsche, in having a conscious idea of the cause of his inflation, is in a better condition. He is ahead of his time, and therefore he is naturally the object of envy because they all crave the consciousness of their possession. They are the people who have a hundred dollars in their pocket without knowing it, and Nietzsche is the one who is conscious that he has that hundred dollars: that is just the difference. But no more than the people of his time, did he know that the hundred dollars were merely a loan; the hundred dollars' worth belongs to the greatness. So naturally, those people would suspect him of thieving, of being a cheat and a liar. Then it is also a fact that ordinary people are so deeply convinced of their nonentity, despite their inflation, that they are quite sure that in the street, or even in the town in which they live, there never has been and never will be a great man. They cannot assume that a great man would live in a street with an ordinary name; the great man lives in a faraway country where streets have very peculiar names, where the houses look very peculiar, and where they are all peculiar people. They even assume that great men never sleep and eat; that they have wings or something of the sort and can fly.

Whatever is much thought about is at last thought suspicious.

That is true because their thoughts are made to turn round the thing which causes the inflation; so when they meet the carrier of that source of inflation, the idea, they naturally begin to think—but how they think is the question.

They punish thee for all thy virtues. They pardon thee in their inmost hearts only—for thine errors.

It is of course a great relief to the ordinary man when he sees that the suspected Superman makes mistakes. That alleviates their task and gives them a certain rope by which to hold on to their inflation.

Because thou art gentle and of upright character, thou sayest: "Blameless are they for their small existence." But their circumscribed souls think: "Blamable is all great existence."

This sounds almost grotesque, yet it is a great truth. All greatness that comes into being is guilt, because it destroys the ordinary man. You see, the invisible things cannot come into being without torture and destruction for the collective man, for the unconscious natural existence; you always kill and destroy in order to bring something into existence. Whatever you do, if it is of any importance, also means destruction. It is the tragic guilt of Prometheus who brought the fire to mankind. It was a very great advantage to mankind, yet he stole it from the gods and they were offended. So the idea that man has greatness, that he is in touch with greatness or that he might attain to greatness, is a theft, because it is stolen from the unconscious and brought within the reach of man. And then the ordinary man is in a very dangerous condition; the neighborhood of the archetype causes an inflation, and the man is mad: his whole world is filled with madness. Such an archetypal presence should be withheld as long as possible therefore, for it causes no end of disturbance in the world. Of course, even the creator or inventor of such ideas is moved by the archetypes; the only difference is that his nervous system is so sensitive that he cannot help realizing it. He sees it, he understands it. So he is not at just the same disadvantage as everybody else, but naturally he will be made responsible for all the destructive effects that come out of such an idea.

Even when thou art gentle toward them, they still feel themselves despised by thee; and they repay thy beneficence with secret maleficence.

Thy silent pride is always counter to their taste; they rejoice if once thou be humble enough to be frivolous.

What we recognize in a man, we also irritate in him. Therefore be on your guard against the small ones!

In thy presence they feel themselves small, and their baseness gleameth and gloweth against thee in invisible vengeance.

Sawest thou not how often they became dumb when thou approachedst them, and how their energy left them like the smoke of an extinguishing fire?

Here is the observation that as soon as he approaches the ordinary people, their inflation naturally collapses, because it becomes visible that he carries the value, and the ordinary people thus lose a certain thrill or a motive power they had apparently possessed: they lost the hundred dollars. For instantly the imaginary hundred dollars they carry in their pockets disappear, and then they discover that he has the hundred dollars really in his pocket and can put them on the table. So everybody thinks that by some unknown trick he has robbed them, has taken all that value out of their pockets. Naturally, they hate him and they will take their revenge. Of course they don't realize that even his hundred dollars are not his property, but are a loan; he has just as little as all the rest of them.

Yea, my friend, the bad conscience art thou of thy neighbours; for they are unworthy of thee. Therefore they hate thee, and would fain suck thy blood.

Thy neighbours will always be poisonous flies; what is great in thee—that itself must make them more poisonous, and always more fly-like.

Naturally, but he makes the mistake of thinking that he is great, not seeing that he is one of them. When he shows his hundred dollars, he says, "Now look at what I have, this is my own!"—and that is the lie. There he cheats them. So when Nietzsche comes out and says, "This is my idea, I am identical with that Superman," he deserves his fate: he really identifies with a thing which is not himself. But it is quite natural—anybody would act like that, and everybody expects a fellow who has an idea to instantly identify with it. For instance, no ordinary people would assume that a first-class tenor could be anything but a great man; they even think he must have a wonderful character because his tones are so high. And all the young girls are in love with him, thinking he is up there in his high tones. Then of course, when his voice has gone, if he is fool enough to identify with it, he is utterly gone too. Where are the tenors? You must seek them with lanterns. Like the great cocottes, very beautiful women: when their beauty has gone, where are they? When the face withers, they disappear altogether because there was nothing behind the face. Where is Cleo de Mérode, or La Belle Otéro?<sup>9</sup> They have vanished. Perhaps La Belle Otéro is Frau Meier and lives in a back yard somewhere. So all the poison which comes from the flies is caused by that inflation of the apparent owner of the hundred dollars.

Flee, my friend, into thy solitude—and thither, where a rough strong breeze bloweth. It is not thy lot to be a fly-flap.

There is something positive in this advice; there he would have a chance to realize that he is not the greatness. But he never would be able to realize that he is like the ordinary people and he should realize that too. For instance, if he were really a sage, he would say to himself, “Go out into the street, go to the little people, be one of them and see how you like it, how much you enjoy being such a small thing. That is yourself.” And so he would learn that he was not his own greatness. Or he might say, “Go away from the little people and disappear into your mountain vastnesses; try to identify with that greatness, and you will see that you cannot identify with it, and so you will learn that you are not that greatness.” You see, there are two ways of realizing it. But to disappear into solitude in order to be desirous, to be longing for friends and recognition, effect, and so on, does not pay. Then one never realizes that one is not one’s own greatness.

Mrs. Sigg: I don’t know what this means: “What we recognize in a man, we also stir in him.”

Prof. Jung: Well, it is a great truth that when you perceive something in a person, you also bring it out in him. When you see a certain quality in a person, it is a sort of intuition, and that is not an indifferent fact: it works upon him. When somebody has a bad intuition about you, you feel it without knowing it; you feel suppressed because that intuition is a fact which takes its way through the unconscious. We don’t know how an intuition comes, but it always has to do with something in the unconscious; and since the unconscious is in you both, you also get a shot from it. It will most certainly come out in you, and it all depends upon the character of the intuition whether you are favorably or unfavorably impressed. If somebody has an intuition that you have a certain thought, you are most probably made to think that thought. Intuition seems to work through the sympathetic system, and being a half-unconscious function, intuitions also bring out an unconscious effect in the object of the intuition. In dealing with intuitives, you notice that they can intuit a thing in such a way that it is shot into your back bone, into your spinal cord, and you must admit that you thought it, though afterwards you will realize that the thought was surely not your own.

There are very curious examples. For instance, certain salespeople read from your eyes what you apparently want; you buy the most amazing stuff and cannot understand afterwards why the devil you ever bought it, whoever put it into you! And Eastern sorcerers put things into you so that you naively step into their trap. A sorcerer tried that once with me and I stepped into the trap; he had such amazing intuition that he was able to twist a cell in my brain. The famous rope-trick is done in that way; it is a sort of projection. I heard a story about a sorcerer who worked the rope-trick in a garrison in India while all the officers, the whole mess, were gathered round. And when the thing was already in full swing, another man who had been delayed came to watch the performance. He stepped up to the circle of men who were all gazing into the air at the boy climbing the rope, but he saw nothing there. He only saw the boy standing beside the sorcerer and the rope lying on the ground, and he was just about to shout when the sorcerer caught him, saying, "Look at that man, he has no head!" And he looked and the man had no head, and then he was all in—and there was the rope and the boy climbing up it. The sorcerer saw of course that the man was not in the circle and that he had to put him on the spot, and he got him. Intuition does work like that in certain cases.

You can observe very clearly that certain thoughts come into your head which afterwards you clearly feel have not been your own: you were infected by something. One calls it magic but it is simply an effect through the unconscious, coming from the fact that the three other functions—perception, thinking, and feeling—move as if in consciousness; but intuition makes a way through the deep unconscious where you are one with everybody. So when such a thing happens, everybody is stirred. If I move on my chair you are not disturbed, but if the soil upon which you sit is shaken, you feel an earthquake and are disturbed. Intuition is like a thing which goes through the floor and shakes everybody. This is one of the important sources of mental infections and there is no defence against it; you cannot suppress the effect, it will happen. The only thing you can do is to make up your mind as soon as possible whether this thought or effect or feeling is really your own. But if you leave things, as most people do—just let them go from a sort of moral laziness—you undergo an infection. It gets you by the neck.

The analyst is in a particularly disagreeable participation; for the sake of his own mental health he should clean himself every day from the intuitions of his patients in order to avoid mental infection. If you let things go on, their accumulation eventually causes an inflation; you will one day wake up with a big inflation which will soon make you fall into a hole. Analysts have to be very careful. Nietzsche, of course, is not in that position: he is naively identical with his greatness. And people like him swallow doses of poison with pleasure. They are sort of morphine maniacs or alcoholics, but of a mental kind, and they do it in order to maintain their happy condition. An inflation is a wonderful thing: you are lifted up from the earth and fly in heaven, looking down benevolently upon the masses.

LECTURE II

23 October 1935

Prof. Jung:

We come now to the chapter called "Chastity."

I love the forest. It is bad to live in cities: there, there are too many of the lustful.

As the title of this chapter denotes, Nietzsche is now going to talk of sexuality. For those who were not here last term, I must repeat again that the series of chapters consist of a series of images. He starts with a certain picture or a thought—a thought picture—and then towards the end of the chapter he usually arrives at the possibility of a new picture; a new problem opens up which will form the contents of the next chapter. So the whole of Zarathustra is a string of pictures, each one a problem, and all hanging together with one logical undercurrent. We were concerned before with the "Flies in the Market-Place." Now, how do you suppose Nietzsche arrives at this chapter about chastity?

Mrs. Crowley: You were speaking about his dream of a toad in the last discussion.

Prof. Jung: Yes, we have decidedly a cue in that worm, which referred to his dream that a toad was sitting on his hand, spoiling his beautiful system. But the toad had to do with his infection, and that alone would not explain why he arrives at this chapter.

Mrs. Baumann: I thought he was running away from people to escape that infection—in order to find chastity through solitude and so avoid the toad.

Mrs. Crowley: I would not have thought it was to escape infection, but rather that the presence of other people made him more conscious of it.

Prof. Jung: One of the personal reasons for his peculiar sensitiveness might well be the feeling that he was somewhat marked by fate by his syphilitic infection; that would probably give him a certain amount of self-consciousness. Or of course it might link him up instead with the lower strata of mankind; people often don't mind and don't become particularly self-conscious on account of such an infection. In Nietzsche's tremendously sensitive structure, we could expect that it would have that effect, however. But we should know just what problem was raised concerning the "Flies in the Market-Place," which would lead Nietzsche to this new aspect. In how far would the development in the former chapter make it almost necessary that a chapter on chastity should follow? Mrs. Baumann has already referred to something.

Dr. Bertine: The marketplace is the place of the collective, and sexuality is the bond of the collective; he rejects collectivity and therefore he rejects the cohesiveness of it.

Mrs. Fierz: It is running away from the lower man.

Prof. Jung: Yes, one can also put it like that. You see, flies would mean an extraordinary collectivity of small beings, and Nietzsche never tires of speaking of ordinary men as being sort of vermin whose only excellence is their remarkable fertility; practically the only quality he gives them is that they are many, a multitude of vermin. So he excludes himself and is a Superman who has overcome that awful crowd-man. This we shall see even more clearly towards the end of Zarathustra when he rejects the "ugliest man." The man that makes for growth is the ugliest man, the inferior man, the instinctive collective being, and that is exactly what he loathes the most. You see, to lift himself out of that layer of the ordinary collective man would mean reaching a height which is superhuman, and how can man be above man? Inasmuch as he is a living man he is just man. So what is bound to follow in such a case?

Miss Hannah: An inflation.

Prof. Jung: Well, he has an inflation already—therefore he bounces in the air like a balloon. One needs an inflation to rise, and one can stay in the heavens by the fact of that inflation. But then what is the mental condition of such a person?

Mr. Allemann: He is torn to pieces.

Prof. Jung: He might explode, but that would be schizophrenia.

Prof. Fierz: He becomes neurotic.

Prof. Jung: Nietzsche was neurotic of course, but when you analyse the dreams of such a case, suspended above the earth in the super condition, what will you find?

Mrs. Crowley: The earth problems coming up.

Prof. Jung: You find probably the earth problems, the earth man, heavy like lead, absolutely identical with the lowest things. And since it is one and the same man, there must exist a bond between the two. And what is that bond? Where is the connection, the umbilical cord between the body, the lower man, and the balloon up there?

Mrs. Fierz: Conflict?

Prof. Jung: But what would the conflict be? In the end of Zarathustra you find the interpretation very nicely. Because it is a self-analysis, it comes out.

Miss Taylor: Is it not sexuality itself? That would function as a sort of bond, because it is very deep.

Prof. Jung: Well, the lower man, being deprived of that part which went off in a balloon, is left to his instincts only, and so he can only express a lowdown sexuality. Of course sexuality is not necessarily lowdown, but in this case it is lower because the higher part has gone and knows nothing of what is happening underneath; so a very inferior sexuality goes on as an expression of the lower man. And the man in the clouds has some feeling of it, for that really binds him together with the lower man and he feels the corresponding resistance. But that resistance is to the sexuality of the lower man, only a connection through conflict. If the lower man has a lustful kind of sexuality, the man in the clouds has the corresponding lustful resistance against it.<sup>1</sup> You see, whether you hate a person or thing, or love it, is in natural psychology exactly the same. Of course, to the human being it makes all the difference in the world whether you like a thing or not, but in psychology it is the same; you are bound to a thing just as much by hatred as by love, sometimes even more, because the bad qualities in people are stronger than the good ones. The real strength in a man is by no means his strength—it is his weakness, because weakness is much stronger than the greatest strength.<sup>2</sup> So Nietzsche loves the high mountains in order to be excluded from the lower man, and so he says it is bad to live in cities where there are too many of the lustful, But his own ordinary man is in the worst parts of the town.

Is it not better to fall into the hands of a murderer, than into the dreams of a lustful woman?

There you are! He doesn't even live in towns, but in the dreams of a lustful woman. Now who is that famous lustful woman?

Mrs. Fierz: His anima.

Prof. Jung: Of course, because she always tried to persuade him to come down from the balloon and look after the inferior man; in such a case you can expect that kind of lust. Later, we find a hymn to that anima. And when he became insane he wrote a lot of erotic stuff which was so crude that his highly respectable sister knew no better than to burn it up. We know definitely that he was filled with sexual fantasies, and there are some rather crude allusions in letters to his friends. As is always the case when a man has gone up in a balloon, his anima is of course on the side of the shadow, the inferior person in himself: she is even married to that man, identical with his shadow. You see, the idea is that he is very high and in danger of falling down naturally, and then he would land in the dreams of the lustful woman, his anima, who is the wife of that awful creature, the shadow. But he does not know that he has a shadow because he has lost his body; he is a ghost and a ghost casts no shadow. So he naturally thinks that the woman down there, whose touch he feels, is a strange woman who has nothing to do with him; she is perhaps the wife of somebody. Because he does not recognize himself in his shadow she is projected and he has nothing to do with her. Yet he feels her touch. So the thing which always binds the two things together, the one above and the one below, is not exactly sex or the conflict over sex: it is the anima. But the anima means a conflict. Therefore, woman is always represented as a paradoxical being; very often she appears as split in two, an upper and a lower, a fair and a dark anima. And that is so real that men fall in love accordingly; they fall in love with fair animas and with dark animas and they appear as real women on the stage of reality. When Nietzsche notices that these terrible women are connected with men equally bad, he says:

And just look at these men . . .

Keep in mind that this is his shadow, which is like all the rest of those flies in the marketplace!

their eye saith it—they know nothing better on earth than to lie with a woman.

That is the inferior sexuality of his shadow, but it is only inferior because he went away in a balloon; if he had stayed below, it would not be inferior. For sexuality is always what the person is, not something detached from man, a thing in itself. It is an activity in man and it is always what the man is.

Filth is at the bottom of their souls; and alas! if their filth hath still spirit in it!

Exactly. His mind went away in the balloon, so naturally there is no mind in the filth; it would not be filth if the mind were down there, but would be a decent human body.

Would that ye were perfect—at least as animals! But to animals belongeth innocence.

That is perfectly true. If he were a beast he would be completely unconscious; he would not have a mind and he would not have a chance to go away in a balloon. Of course, if you have a mind you are tempted to identify with it, because consciousness is such an autonomous system that you can almost include yourself in it; with a certain amount of autoeroticism you can include yourself, defend yourself against surrounding conditions and lock yourself up in your consciousness, to the extent that you become identical with it and at any time may fly away. You see, this autonomy of consciousness is a great asset; if that were lacking we would not have will. Willpower is the expression of the autonomy of consciousness: you can choose; otherwise, there is no freedom of choice. You can only have free will—independent of environmental conditions of any kind—inasmuch as your consciousness is autonomous. So the possibility that consciousness can detach itself from its basis is not a disadvantage if it does not go too far. It is even a necessary condition for the existence of free will; inasmuch as consciousness is detachable from conditions, we have free will. Now, free will is surely the basis of ethics; an ethical attitude is only possible inasmuch as consciousness is detachable or autonomous. But if you go too far, if you increase the imagination, the autonomy of consciousness, by assuming too much responsibility, you go up like a balloon. You think you can triumph over natural laws which are the real basis of your life if you follow them; you increase your responsibility for things over which man cannot and should not assume responsibility, and off you go above the clouds. And then you are confronted with a situation like Nietzsche's. For whatever curses he shouts down from the stratosphere, they are simply curses about himself. Those filthy beasts down there that sleep with each other are the other side of himself; he has cleared that vermin out of his Superman's consciousness and he imagines that he is well above it. But he is far from it, for nobody can do that. He himself has a doubt here. He says:

Do I counsel you to slay your instincts? I counsel you to innocence in your instincts.

Do I counsel you to chastity? Chastity is a virtue with some, but with many almost a vice.

You see what good advice he can give out of the clouds—from far away.

These are continent, to be sure: but doggish lust looketh enviously out of all that they do.

Even into the heights of their virtue and into their cold spirit doth this creature follow them, with its discord.

He confirms exactly what we were saying.

And how nicely can doggish lust beg for a piece of spirit, when a piece of flesh is denied it!

Ye love tragedies and all that breaketh the heart? But I am distrustful of your doggish lust.

Ye have too cruel eyes, and ye look wantonly towards the sufferers. Hath not your lust just disguised itself and taken the name of fellow-suffering?

In this admonition or exhortation to the poor vermin down below, he unveils his own psychology; it all happens in himself. The cruel eyes are very much his own eyes because he speaks out of the coldness of the mind, spying. And as for that “look wantonly towards the sufferers,” well, who is a great sufferer? Who is pitying himself and taking care of himself, avoiding everything which could cause upset to his poor nervous system?

And also this parable give I unto you. Not a few who meant to cast out their devil, went thereby into the swine themselves.

This is a very general and a very great truth. There are many people who try to give good advice to other people, try to rescue them or to help them, and in the end they are drowned in the mire; that is eventually the place they were really making for under the disguise of pity, compassion, and understanding. And it is Nietzsche's own fate. In the end of Zarathustra we come to passages which are very much on the line of the pathological eroticism he showed when his insanity came on.

Mrs. Crowley: You said in a former Seminar that a prophet has to have the collective experience in order to speak from his own experience. So that might be a natural cause.

Prof. Jung: Quite so, but the prophet is a different case. We are speaking now, not of the prophet but of the psychology of the man Nietzsche. You see, I would be a Superman if I dared to speak of the psychology of the prophet. I could not possibly do that. I doubt even whether the prophet has a psychology—only man has a psychology.

Mrs. Crowley: But in this instance, as he assumes the role of the prophet, he has to go through this experience.

Prof. Jung: But that is Nietzsche's psychology as a prophet. Insofar as he has a prophet's psychology he is bound to have that experience, sure enough. If you assume yourself to be a prophet, then you are in a balloon; to be a prophet is of course his special balloon. Zarathustra is his balloon.

To whom chastity is difficult, it is to be dissuaded: lest it become the road to hell—to filth and lust of soul.

Do I speak of filthy things? That is not the worst thing for me to do.

Not when the truth is filthy, but when it is shallow, doth the discerning one go unwillingly into its waters.

That is also a great truth.

Verily, there are chaste ones from their very nature; they are gentler of heart, and laugh better and oftener than you.

They laugh also at chastity, and ask: "What is chastity?"

Is chastity not folly? But the folly came unto us, and not we unto it.

We offered that guest harbour and heart: now it dwelleth with us—let it stay as long as it will!"—

It is quite obvious that those wise ones who don't know what chastity is are the brethren of Zarathustra; Zarathustra is one of those. And here one sees where Nietzsche is identical with Zarathustra; that is the way in which the Superman—if such a thing did exist—would speak. So you can say that this is the way in which the prophet Zarathustra speaks, and inasmuch as there is such a thing as a prophet, he has of course my permission to speak like that. But inasmuch as the man Nietzsche speaks, what does it convey?

Prof. Reichstein: It is as you said, he makes now a lust of his chastity.

Prof. Jung: Well, he makes a very particular point of it, even to the extent of asking what chastity is. That means that he has no such problem at all; it means a superiority to his earthly being which is wellnigh impossible.

Dr. Bertine: It is a disembodied statement.

Prof. Jung: Completely, and therefore exceedingly improbable. Of course if the prophet speaks like that, it goes: there is no argument against what a prophet says, as you know. But inasmuch as the man speaks, it is simply neurotic. So there is very good reason for not identifying with the prophet.

Well, I am going rather quickly through these chapters because, though they are important inasmuch as the psychology of the man Nietzsche is concerned, they are to my mind not particularly interesting. We come now to "The Friend":

"One, is always too many about me"—thinketh the anchorite.
 "Always once one—that maketh two in the long run!"

I and me are always too earnestly in conversation: how could it be endured, if there were not a friend?

The friend of the anchorite is always the third one: the third one is the cork which preventeth the conversation of the two sinking into the depth.

Ah! there are too many depths for all anchorites. Therefore, do they long so much for a friend, and for his elevation.

Now how does he cross over the gulf from chastity to the friend?

Mrs. Fierz: The chapter on chastity was the anima aspect and now it is the aspect of the shadow; he and his shadow make the conversation.

Prof. Jung: That is what one would hope for.

Mrs. Fierz: But it is very painful.

Prof. Jung: Yes, and therefore that conversation does not happen.

Mrs. Fierz: And therefore he needs another person and that would be the Puer Aeternus.

Prof. Jung: Well, yes, in many cases. You see, it is very obvious that he has rejected the relation to his anima because she is impolite enough to link him up with the awful men down below who do such terrible things. And as the rejected relation to the anima is heterosexual, what remains is homosexuality, so he discovers the friend. The real friend he would need would naturally be his own inferior man, and the conversation he should have would be with him; but that is excluded, so he is all the more in need of a human relation, which he hopes to find in the friend. Now when Nietzsche was all alone in the Engadine, he had the experience of suddenly feeling double—it was he himself and Zarathustra—and he felt that it was almost like talking to a friend.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Nietzsche sometimes spoke of himself as a doppelgänger: "This double thread of experiences, this means of access to two worlds that seem so far asunder, finds in every de-

And now he says that "I and my self"—Zarathustra being the self as you know from a former chapter—are ever too hot in converse. "I and me are always too earnestly in conversation; how could it be endured, if there were not a friend?" To the hermit, a friend is ever a third because the hermit is double, and that he cannot stand, so he needs a human friend: "The third one is the cork which preventeth the conversation of the two sinking into the depths." That is, the self being greater than his consciousness, he is naturally drawn into the eternal abyss of that which is greater than man; through his own conversation he simply disappears. He falls into a complete identity with the self, his consciousness gets a horrible inflation, and there is no chance whatever of any connection with the earth. That is the psychology of a man who is completely isolated, and who therefore would naturally try to link up with the earth again. But since the contact with the earth is infamous and poisonous, he cannot touch it, and the necessary link would be a man friend who would represent the heights over against the depths. The self would draw him into the abyss of eternity whereas a friend would keep him in the surface reality.

Our faith in others betrayeth wherein we would fain have faith in ourselves. Our longing for a friend is our betrayer.

And often with our love we want merely to overleap envy. And often we attack and make ourselves enemies, to conceal that we are vulnerable.

Here he describes a very peculiar type of relationship to a friend, which is a system of many neuroses. What do you think about it?

Prof. Reichstein: I think that Nietzsche is quite incapable of having a friend at all, and therefore he makes such a figure of it.

Prof. Jung: Yes, he is obviously trying to create a fantastical friend, the friend he imagines he ought to have. Naturally, if he is in the condition that we have described, he would need the friend that he imagines. But no human being could be his friend under such conditions; that is well-nigh impossible. Nobody can adapt to a double, and Nietzsche has in that case a double aspect: he is himself and he is identical with the self—on the one side the regrettable victim, and on the other side a very peculiar prophet. How could an earthly normal man adapt to such a condition? Let us assume that a real man turns up, what tail its counterpart in my own nature—I am my own complement: I have a 'second' sight, as well as a first. And perhaps I also have a third sight" (Ecce Homo, "Why I am so wise," sec. 3). See also the letter to Peter Gast, 14 August 1881.

would happen to him? Nietzsche had a friend, do you know anything about him?

Prof. Fierz: Peter Gast.

Miss Wolff: Peter Gast was an unimportant person. Nietzsche could not accept a man who was his equal as his friend; he was a human being who just needed to be alone. If he had such a friend, he was a rival at once, it was too much on the basis of competition.

Prof. Jung: The friendship with Peter Gast was rather an unhappy story. Peter Gast felt terribly emptied and found it exceedingly difficult, and everybody else who had to deal directly with Nietzsche found it difficult. You may remember that little anecdote about Nietzsche: Once when he was talking very enthusiastically about Italy in his lecture at Basel, he happened to catch the eye of one of the young men in his audience, and Nietzsche instantly imagined that there was a friend for him. So after the lecture he said to him, "We will go together to Italy!" But the young man had no money and naturally thought of his empty pocket. "But Herr Professor!" he stammered, and then the bottom dropped out of the world and Nietzsche simply made off disgusted. That is Nietzsche. He did not think of the reality, that the poor student had not the necessary money to take a trip to Italy, and of course he never would have thought of paying for him. If the young man has said, "Yes, I am coming with you," of course Nietzsche would have been delighted, without thinking that the fellow had no money to do it; you see, the reality which presented itself at that moment was enough to put him off completely, and the man was simply lost to him. That was his kind of friendship. The friend ought to exist, and then in the right moment he ought to disappear, and then he should be there again—that is exactly what Nietzsche expected of him, and that of course is the inevitable result if one is identical with the self.

"Be at least mine enemy!"—thus speaketh the true reverence, which doth not venture to solicit friendship.

If one would have a friend, then must one also be willing to wage war for him: and in order to wage war, one must be capable of being an enemy.

One ought still to honour the enemy in one's friend. Canst thou go nigh unto thy friend, and not go over to him?

In one's friend one shall have one's best enemy. Thou shalt be closest unto him with thy heart when thou withstandest him.

This is surely very wise and in a way very true, but it is again a truth which is too high. It is so exaggerated and so paradoxical that it cannot be believed in a human atmosphere of human feeling; the ordinary feeling simply does not stand such a strain. This is tremendously exaggerated because of the utterly overwrought feeling.

Thou wouldst wear no raiment before thy friend? Is it in honour of thy friend that thou showest thyself to him as thou art? But he wisheth thee to the devil on that account!

Exceedingly true. Out of sheer politeness one should not show oneself as one is; it is always reckless and shocking. Of course he means here not exactly as one is, because there are always two sides; everything has two aspects—one doesn't consist of the worst side only. But if you make it an ideal to show yourself as you are, you show the evil things definitely and not the good things, because you are deeply convinced that showing what you are must mean showing something unfavorable. Whereas to show yourself as you really are would mean to show the two sides, one mitigating the other, the two things in one; then you could safely say friendship was only possible when you show who you are and what you are. You should never use such terms as "going unclad" because that means naked, with the assumption that you are ugly, which is not true. A man is not ugly when unclad, he may be quite beautiful, or at least he is as he is, not too bad, not too good. But if the two aspects are torn asunder, if one part is in heaven and the other in hell, then naturally you needs must show the side that is in hell, which of course will be a bad side. Therefore, Nietzsche says that you should be very careful to conceal yourself from your friend. Then he feels afterwards—this is very important:

He who maketh no secret of himself shocketh: so much reason have ye to fear nakedness! Aye, if ye were Gods, ye could then be ashamed of clothing!

He thinks that if he could show himself as the Superman, it would be of course acceptable, most agreeable, because that is the side of the God; but since we are not Gods, we would show our inferior side, which is too lowdown in his case. So he is naturally quite reasonable not to show it.

Thou canst not adorn thyself fine enough for thy friend; for thou shalt be unto him an arrow and a longing for the Superman.

The German text is particularly characteristic: Du kannst dich für deinem Freund nicht schön genug putzen. You see, we never would use that expression sich putzen for a man, only a woman putzt herself—when she does her hair, and sticks a flower behind her ear, puts on some jewels, a nice costume, and so on.<sup>4</sup> So Nietzsche clearly has in mind a womanish sort of man—one could safely say a homosexual who even paints himself, puts rouge on his lips and cheeks in order to appeal sensually to his friend. Here we see very definitely where Nietzsche is identical with the anima; this is the anima talking out of him, not the way in which a man would speak, but definitely feminine. The idea that he should adorn himself for his friend is an idea which never enters the head of a real man. “For thou shalt be unto him an arrow and a longing for the Superman,” means that he will adorn himself in order to appear to his friend as if he were the Superman and to instigate the same desire to be above the clouds in his friend, so that they shall not be bothered by the shadow. That would of course be an utterly unreal relationship, which would not be possible for one minute; in the next minute something would happen and they would come down to earth.

Sawest thou ever thy friend asleep—to know how he looketh?
What is usually the countenance of thy friend? It is thine own countenance, in a coarse and imperfect mirror.

Therefore one does better not to see him asleep, one would say.

Sawest thou ever thy friend asleep? Wert thou not dismayed at thy friend looking so? O my friend, man is something that hath to be surpassed.

In divining and keeping silence shall the friend be a master: not everything must thou wish to see.

Here are his postulates and expectations. The friend cannot be an ordinary friend, but must be a master in divining, always knowing ahead what Nietzsche is expecting of him. “And in keeping silence.” He mustn’t even talk—of course not in the wrong moment—and he must never say anything which is not pleasant.

Thy dream shall disclose unto thee what thy friend doeth when awake.

That means that one may dream of him when he is at his best, not otherwise.

Let thy pity be a divining: to know first if thy friend wanteth pity. Perhaps he loveth in thee the unmoved eye, and the look of eternity.

<sup>4</sup> Hollingdale*, like Common, renders putzen as “adorn.” Kaufmann* has it “groom yourself.”

This is the eternal man again; only for his sake should there be friendship.

Let thy pity for thy friend be hid under a hard shell; thou shalt bite out a tooth upon it. Thus will it have delicacy and sweetness.

Again terrible exaggeration. If you show the hard shell to your friends all the time, why the devil should they feel friendship for you? They don't come to you in order to lose a tooth.

Art thou pure air and solitude and bread and medicine to thy friend? Many a one cannot loosen his own fetters, but is nevertheless his friend's emancipator.

Art thou a slave? Then thou canst not be a friend. Art thou a tyrant? Then thou canst not have friends.

This is an exaggeration also, the pairs of opposites dissociated; either a slave or a tyrant, and where is the human being in between? It is perfectly obvious that only the human being in between can be a friend, not the one above and not the one below. Now he begins to question himself in a way. Why is there such a separation of pairs of opposites? Why is there such a fuss about the friend, why all these expectations and demands?

Far too long hath there been a slave and a tyrant concealed in woman.

You see, he is going to make a discovery. Not that he would realize it—we must discover the anima for him. The anima is the trouble—the womanish side of him is slave and tyrant. It is the anima that separates the pairs of opposites, because the anima itself is a pair of opposites; it is fair and dark, tyrant and slave; it is She-who-must-be-obeyed and at the same time a prostitute, the victim of everybody.

On that account woman is not yet capable of friendship: she knoweth only love.

Instead of saying that the ordinary man who is not too high and not too low is capable of friendship, he says no, that cannot be, because he is not a Superman. And then he projects the whole thing into the woman, not knowing that he himself is that woman. He begins to discourse about the advantages and disadvantages of women, instead of seeing that there is a woman's side to himself and a hysterical woman at that, with a dissociation between the pairs of opposites. That woman is the reason why he cannot have friendship or give friendship; he is always in danger, either of being in love with a friend or hating his friend, because he is a woman.

In woman's love there is injustice and blindness to all she doth not love. And even in woman's conscious love, there is still always surprise and lightning and night, along with the light.

Here he describes his anima reactions. He is an intuitive thinking type, so his anima would naturally hold the inferior functions feeling and sensation, and those two functions taken together would mean a valued reality, a reality equipped with feeling. You can have a reality without feeling, which is not differentiated, not chosen or characterized by feeling; but if the two functions are together there is a sort of feeling reality. For instance, that anima side of him would choose a world consisting chiefly of personal relations, and inasmuch as he is introverted his anima would have an extraverted character. So he would move in a world of very personal relations among real people. Now, the real people in Nietzsche are suppressed, depreciated as the flies in the marketplace; therefore his anima would like to be a fly too in order to be able to move among those ordinary vermin. That, of course, he simply cannot see. But when he says, "In woman's love there is injustice to all she doth not love," he gives an exact description of what his feeling-sensation is doing. You see injustice means giving the wrong values, and blindness means not to see things as they are.

As yet woman is not capable of friendship: . . .

He is not capable of friendship; nobody is capable of friendship with him because he is dissociated, but he projects it into the woman.

women are still cats, and birds.

Well, those animals are hostile to each other; the birds are the victims of the cats, so that means a dissociation. The spiritual form of the anima is a bird up above, and the other is a cat living down below on the earth.

Or at best, cows.

That is the only middle ground, as if, when you put a cat and a bird together, it made a cow. Now this is hardly probable. So he depreciates his anima as one would expect him to do, because the anima is the weight of his feeling sensation that pulls him down to the real man whom he despises; therefore, she must needs be depreciated.

As yet woman is not capable of friendship. But tell me, ye men, who of you are capable of friendship?

There you have it, men are not capable of friendship either.

Oh! your poverty, ye men, and your sordidness of soul! As much as ye give to your friend, will I give even to my foe, and will not have become poorer thereby.

If he gives to his friend what he gives to his foe, it is a pretty bad bargain. I would not wish for a friend who gave as much to his foe as he gave to me.

There is comradeship: may there be friendship!
Thus spake Zarathustra.

I must say I should prefer comradeship, because that is just and generous and human above all; I care not at all for a friendship that is such a hysterical and unvalued thing. You see, this chapter allows us a rather interesting view into the soul of the neurotic.

Miss Wolff: Of course he tried to have reasons for his projections onto women. He put too much feeling into his men friends so he wanted a woman friend, but she had to be a disciple. He always wanted to be accepted with his ideas. That is of course why it did not work with women; they didn't want to be mere disciples.

Prof. Fierz: Did he have any experience with women of society, a worldly friendship?

Prof. Jung: I happen to know a woman who tried to get at him, but I always thought she was trying to catch him just as a cat catches a bird; she was after his biography.

Miss Wolff: That was Lou Salomé; she told him she would be a wonderful disciple; he wrote and tried to give her his ideas.<sup>5</sup>

Prof. Jung: Well yes, but she had nothing of the sort in her mind, she was trying to catch a bird.

Mrs. Jung: I think one should consider the time in which Nietzsche wrote, I think it was not merely his own psychology. That was the time when everybody left too much to the persona and did not realize the shadow side, and Nietzsche was the first to point to this background. In this chapter on friendship, there is a lot of ordinary psychology and I think it was very important that somebody said it. For instance, where he speaks of the woman here, I think it is because she, the anima, represents the relating function, and when he speaks of friendship he must have this function, so he has to bring in this anima psychology here.

Prof. Jung: That is surely true. He could not form any kind of relation without considering his anima: that is the conditio sine qua non. Therefore, he had to consider this psychology which was unknown in his days, as you rightly say. The psychology of the eighties when he wrote Zarathustra consisted of bourgeois ideas, of persona ideas—it was all on the surface—though I should say it was known before that time that man had a shadow. But the nineteenth century began to forget it because the intellect became so all-powerful through the development of science and technique; consciousness attained to such autonomy that it really could walk off the earth and leave the shadow behind—ape a sort of perfect man with perfect ideas—until that whole fantastical show broke down utterly with the world war. But to the people of that time it was a valid psychology.

Mrs. Jung: Then I also wanted to point out that it appears to be somewhat prophetic, as in Germany now friendship between men plays such a role.

Prof. Jung: Yes, it looks exactly as if Nietzsche had anticipated a great deal of the future of his people, and that he faced problems which were the problems of his nation. It is a most remarkable characteristic of modern German psychology that the Puer Aeternus motif plays a much greater role than the anima. Very characteristic literary manifestations have appeared representing both kinds of psychology. In the West, Benoit's L'Atlantide is the most conspicuous example of anima stories, but there are lots of others, such as Rider Haggard's in the English language. There are certain anima figures in German literature naturally, but none is any way comparable to the English or French examples. But one finds there very conspicuous examples of the Puer Aeternus psychology—Das Reich Ohne Raum, the kingdom without space, by Goetz, is the most characteristic one I have come across. Then that psychology is marvelously organized in the school of Stefan George, the poet, which is imbued with a kind of homosexuality.<sup>6</sup> For the Puer Aeternus always contains homosexuality, real or imaginary: it is the psychology of the enterprising youth. The woman only plays a role as wife and mother and appears to be thoroughly unproblematic. While in the West woman is most problematic, and the friendship between men seems to have attained the unproblematic level—I mean as a social phenomenon, not as a personal problem or phenomenon.

Miss Wolff: I think many women have almost a Puer Aeternus psychology; they are men's comrades or friends, but they are not women, but sort of boys.

Prof. Jung: Those are more modern developments.

Miss Wolff: Yes, there is a great difference between the women in the time of Nietzsche and women of today.

Mrs. Sigg: It seems to me that Nietzsche had very good friends, at least until he was thirty-five. He wrote Zarathustra in '83, which was before his friendship with Peter Gast, when of course he was in a terrible state of mind. But before that his relation was very good with Overbeck, and with the two friends of his youth, Wilhelm Pinder and Gustave Krug.

Prof. Jung: If you study those friendships carefully you will see that they were very far away; they wrote nice letters to each other. Overbeck always handled Nietzsche with gloves; I knew him. He was a typical, refined historian, a very learned man, and in all his ways exceedingly polite and careful not to touch anything that was hot; he appreciated the great genius in Nietzsche, but the man Nietzsche he handled most carefully. Of course Nietzsche called anybody a great friend of his, and people were very polite naturally, but they could not touch him. For instance, I knew a man whom Nietzsche considered one of his great friends. He was a professor of internal medicine, a highly educated man, very musical, and Nietzsche would often go to his house—one never knew exactly when; he would appear suddenly and sit down at the piano and play for hours on end. He spoke to nobody and nobody could speak a word to him. And then he went away and said what a nice evening it had been. Exactly like those two men from the Canton Grison who had not seen one another for twenty years: they said, "Ciao" and made a movement suggesting that they might go to the inn, so they had their wine together and stayed until twelve o'clock, speaking not a word, till when they left one could not portrayals of anima figures. For Goetz, see above, 5 June 1935, n. 10. Stefan George (1868-1933) is an important German poet who was made into a cult figure by young Nazis, but who exiled himself to Switzerland in protest of totalitarianism. See Jung's account of Stefan George in his essay on Wotan in CW 10, par. 375n.

help saying, "Wasn't it a nice evening?" So if you surrounded Nietzsche with care and let him enjoy himself, you were a great friend, but woe unto you if you had some impulse of your own. Overbeck was really a loyal friend: he went to Turin when he heard that Nietzsche had gone over the border and fetched him back to Basel; he was the only one who took any care of him. But in his personal relation I am quite certain that he had to be very careful with him. So I think those good friendships are doubtful though there was a great deal of appreciation.

Prof. Fierz: It is said that Nietzsche's psychology is expressive of his time, and I suppose Richard Wagner's was also. He ruined his milliner, did not pay his debts to Meyerbeer, wrote a most impertinent letter when he wanted his five hundred francs. He was the Superman and he was a most disagreeable fellow.

Prof. Jung: Oh yes. For instance, when he invited friends, they had to bring the wine, and woe unto them if they did not. And he adorned himself—had a long correspondence with a milliner in Vienna about pink silk ribbons for his nightgown. You know, when Wagner was composing that aria where young Siegfried is forging his sword with a hammer and anvil, he was sitting in his study on silk cushions with millions of ribbons, in a silk dressing gown and a velvet cap. The air was filled with perfumes and he was adorned exactly like a woman, the most grotesque sight you could imagine. That was his reality, he was completely identical with the anima, he was a transvestit which means a man who conceals himself in women's clothes, enjoying playing the role of a woman. There is no English term for that I think.<sup>7</sup>

Prof. Fierz: In an article published in Basel about five years ago, it was said that over his bed in Paris Wagner had a silk canopy with roses and a mirror in which he could look at himself. And he never paid for it; Meyerbeer had to pay for it. Then five weeks later Wagner wrote Das Judentum in der Musik.<sup>8</sup>

Prof. Jung: Isn't that marvelous? Well, Nietzsche also had a peculiar mannerism: he sort of imagined himself a lord. You see, in those days it was thought that all Englishmen who came to Switzerland were lords, and that they always wore grey top hats and grey gloves and spats and so on. Also they usually wore a veil round the hat to denote that they were travelling and apt to get suddenly into a tropical climate; and they were always queer—nobody could understand them. That is the way Central Europe understood the psychology of the English race; very few people could speak English then. So Nietzsche walked about in Basel with a grey top hat. He did not wear a veil, but otherwise he was a complete English gentleman from the storybook, a perfectly ridiculous sight. That was adorning himself! For nobody in Basel ever dreamt of walking about like that. It was the time when they had very sloppy neckties and collars and horrible trousers like accor-

<sup>8</sup> Wagner's Das Judentum in der Musik, an 1850 work of some fifty pages but supplemented by as many again in 1869, was a scathing attack not only on Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Meyerbeer, but on Jewish poets and other artists as well. An English translation, Judaism in Music, by Edwin Evans, appeared in New York and London in 1910.

LECTURE III

30 October 1935

Prof. Jung:

The next chapter is called "The Thousand and One Goals." What do you think about this title?

Mrs. Fierz: If a man has rejected his shadow, or his human being, then instead of one goal, he must have a thousand goals because he does not know where he belongs; it is a sort of Zersplitterung.<sup>1</sup>

Prof. Jung: Yes, but what does he retain when he has rejected the shadow?

Mrs. Fierz: The wise man.

Mrs. Sigg: His anima.

Prof. Jung: You forget the most important thing. In rejecting his shadow, he rejects merely the inferior man, and a part of the unconscious represented by the archetypes of the wise old man and the anima remain with consciousness. Then what does he retain besides these two archetypes?

Mrs. Baynes: His superior function, his ego.

Prof. Jung: Exactly, his ego, which is identical with the superior function, in this case with intuition and intellect. So in rejecting the shadow he rejects his inferior personality, minus the archetypes of the anima and the old wise man, and he retains his superior function: he is identical with it. Now what about the superior function under these conditions? What is the matter with it?

Mrs. Sigg: It acts like a tyrant sometimes because there is no balance.

Mrs. Fierz: It becomes quite collective.

Mrs. Crowley: There is no check, no balance, no opposite.

Prof. Jung: That is all true, but why—what is the matter with that ego?

Mrs. Sigg: It gets inflated.

Prof. Jung: Yes, it is like a balloon because it is filled with the vapors and very light gases of those archetypes; the ego is carried off its feet—somewhere suspended in space, and under such conditions it would be, as has been rightly said, collective. And what is the actual psychological reason why a person with such an inflation is always collective?

Mrs. Jung: Because of the identification with the archetypes they are inflated by the collective unconscious.

Prof. Jung: Exactly, the collective unconscious represented by those archetypes, the wise old man and the anima. That is the reason why an inflated man is nothing but collective; even the ego is so thinned out, evaporated, that it is nothing but collective. The result is that such people become utterly identical with the collective movements of the time. They are no longer human. Therefore, the idea of the Superman is inhuman, because he is an idea, and an idea of everybody—he even should be. There the tyrant comes in saying, “My idea should be the idea of everybody.” Nietzsche is not satisfied with the fact of enjoying the vision of the Superman: he must preach it. Everybody must become a Superman. It is a new value which must be believed and carried out by all; he feels his idea to be all-prevailing and valid for everybody. Now, the dangerous thing is that, to a certain extent, it is perfectly true. So the question is: Is such a thing as the Superman possible and, if so, is this the way by which it can be reached? And the answer would be rather negative; as he conceives of the Superman, it is utterly impossible because it is beyond the human. But do you see any possibility in the idea of the Superman?

Mrs. Crowley: Yes, if it is applied subjectively and symbolically for the self.

Prof. Jung: Yes, and in that case in what kind of relation would the Superman be to the individual ego?

Mrs. Sigg: It could be a father and son relationship.

Prof. Jung: Yes, and that is a symbol which can be substantiated by historical and recent material. Or you might also use another symbol.

Miss Hannah: The leadership would have gone over to the self, and then the ego would be in the relation of the earth to the sun.

Prof. Jung: That is another simile, a planet revolving round a central star or sun, which again would be father and son; the sun would be the father and the planet the offspring of the sun. It was in fact the original theory, that the planets were torn away from the sun. Are you aware of any other symbolism?

Miss Wolff: The symbolism of man and God.

Prof. Jung: Yes, again God the father and man the son, or God the sun and man the earth, the planet.

Mrs. Fierz: Could one not include the leader or the Führer idea of the present time?

Prof. Jung: Exactly, the idea of the Duce, a Führer, is the same expressed on the plane of concrete objectivity—a non-psychological level. So we have brought it down to the earth and to the experience of today. You see, the contents of the chapters before have shown us how Nietzsche rejects the inferior man and builds up this particular condition of inflation, thereby naturally becoming more and more collective, more and more identical with the humanity that consists of innumerable units, and inasmuch as every unit of humanity has its goal, there is an extraordinary plurality of goals. Now, there is a peculiar choice of words here, the “thousand and one” goals. Where does he find that?

Mrs. Baynes: In The Arabian Nights.

Prof. Jung: Yes, it is a sort of allegorical or symbolical indication of very many. Thousand already expresses the idea of an unimaginable quantity, and on top of the many there is one more. So if such an inflation takes place, one would feel at times that one consisted of a thousand and one individuals with a thousand and one values or goals. Now if that is the case, what would follow? A person in such a situation would realize a very particular need.

Mrs. Crowley: Valuation.

Mrs. Sigg: It would be the actual need of his people in that time.

Prof. Jung: Well, yes, if he is identical with his people, but that is a question. He might be identical with humanity, and that would of course cause the great turmoil inside, what the old Latin languages called the turba, which means a great noise and confusion; the church fathers used that word to designate the approach of the devils. In dreams it is represented by a swarm of ants or gnats, innumerable little animals; that is always the beginning of that peculiar phenomenon in psychopathology, schizophrenia. If the dissociation into units keeps on, the mind will be dissolved; so it may happen that an inflation gradually worked over into a dissociation. It is usually the case in a real schizophrenic that an archetypal situation comes up—an archetype of any kind—which inflates the individual's consciousness till it expands over the whole of humanity; and when that suddenly begins to decay into many units, it has become a case of schizophrenia. It is like an explosion. Inflation works like a gas pressure, say, where the pressure is caught in a hollow space, till it suddenly explodes the walls of the space into many fragments.

Now, in schizophrenia you observe that many of those units produce voices; they all have a little ego, with different personal characteristics: each voice says, "I" and denotes a particular tendency or goal. But because it is only a matter of fragmentary souls, or fragmentary psychical entities, the goal is never arrived at, and also the amount of affectivity or emotion which would allow an intention to be carried through is lacking. So the whole individual consists of many little psyches with purposes of their own. You find a description of that in the book by Schreber, who I believe was the son of the founder of the Schreber Gardens which you may have heard of; they are sort of nurseries for little children. The Schreber of whom I am speaking was a lawyer living in Leipzig who became a schizophrenic, and when he was interned he wrote a book called: Denkwürdigkeiten eines Nervenkranken,<sup>2</sup> in which he described peculiar phenomena. Amongst others he said that at times a multitude of little fellows were all over him—tiny creatures were walking on his eyelids for instance; or they were flying about and setting down upon his skin like mosquitos. And sometimes they disappeared into it shouting, "Damn it, I go in!" They obviously tried to get integrated into him again; you see, those were parts of his split mind which still were capable of integration. For at times when the conditions are good—of course we know very little of these things—it seems that certain parts are united once more, like splinters of ice which freeze together in the night, and then split again when the wind comes.

One can even observe how large areas of a broken-up continuum congeal again and become coherent. Such cases give one the impression of being fairly normal, but here and there you meet a chasm, a split which goes right through. You can see this in the drawings made by those people. They make a perfectly well-composed picture till suddenly an angle is cut off, or an irrational line strikes through where the theme changes, and very strange contents come into the broken-off area. In that picture<sup>3</sup> you see a demarcation line where the neighboring ice-field has not joined up with the main body, and there are quite a number of such patches. There are several breaking lines; the splintering is pretty bad. And if you compare the bottom of the picture with what is above, you see that there is really no connection, but rather a jumble of dissociated units carefully stitched together by his mind. He has a mental superstructure which probably allows him to behave in a fairly normal way, yet the real material of his psyche is all splintered, and then stitched together and framed, he makes a heavy framework round the picture with magic conjurations, and he even tries to put a top upon the whole thing as a substitute for an ego, and he gives it four corners to make it static. But it is no longer a natural continuity; it is a mind that is thoroughly splintered and probably there was once—I am not informed of the actual history of this case—a moment of complete turmoil where the turba got hold of him. Then, with a remnant of himself he could gather up a certain number of splinters, as if they were pieces of a broken glass which one put together with glue, so that it looks like a glass, yet it is all broken up and full of the traces of the former catastrophe. Usually you can see those breaking lines much better in a picture with flowing curving lines; occasionally a sharp chasm goes through the whole thing.

Mr. Baumann: Pictures by insane people sometimes have the same motif many times repeated, small people or dwarfs, for instance. Is that the same idea?

Prof. Jung: Oh yes. You know those dreams in which many little units appear, little animals all of the same kind, beetles, and such things, are sort of semi-organic dreams. Therefore, you find them chiefly in cases of alcoholics, delirium tremens; they have such hallucinations. For instance, they see coins on the floor and try to pick them up; or they see thousands of rats and mice or birds or other animals all over, in the most impossible places. This is also a sort of splitting up. I have mentioned before that particularly funny case of a very educated man who drank too much. After a very strenuous night he fell into a delirium and when he woke up in the morning he saw that pigs were in all the trees on the boulevard in front of his house. He thought that there had been a stock-market nearby, and that the pigs had run away and climbed up the trees, so he laughed and laughed and shouted to the people in the street to look up at them too. Naturally the police caught hold of him for making too much noise.

Mrs. Jung: Cannot this phenomenon of the turba denote a very deep layer of the unconscious? It seems to have a psychophysical character. One finds this dream with children.

Prof. Jung: Yes, it is the archetype of the many, and this dream is found with very young children. In my seminar at the Hochschule<sup>4</sup> I am now dealing with a dream of a little child where there are many such units, little animals, swarms of ants or mosquitos or mice, or simply little objects. I think it is a perception of the original multiplicity of the human mind. You know, our bodies consist of such units, the so-called Mendelian units, units of inheritance. For instance, in a family, perhaps the mother has blue eyes and the father has dark eyes, and they have quite differently shaped noses. Obviously some of the children inherit the blue eyes from the mother and others the dark eyes from the father; some have the mother's nose and others the father's nose; and these peculiarities follow certain laws, the Mendelian laws; the accumulation of certain units causes either physical or mental peculiarities.

These laws also explain why, in one generation, there may be only people of a certain type, and in another a different type occurs, both types being contained in the families of the ancestors. Among the Spanish Hapsburgs of the Middle Ages were quite a number of mental-disease cases; then for two hundred years there were none. And the protruding lower lip of the Hapsburgs which the emperor Maximilian had first, has been inherited in many cases; Alphonse of Spain has it: it is very typical. Our bodies consist of such units, and it is the same with our minds; our conscious mind originated and is based upon the psyche which also consists of many inherited units. They are what the primitives would call ancestral spirits, remnants of ancestral lives, and since we have many ancestors, we have many thousands of units in the basic psyche, and they are liable to dissociate. If we knew more about these things, I am firmly convinced that we would be able to show, in a case of schizophrenia, that the units into which the mind breaks are ancestral units, Mendelian units. For instance, one often observes that if the father and mother are not well matched, the first child is a particularly difficult character; the two rows of ancestors don't join, so they create a difficult disposition in the child. Where the ancestral units don't fit, where they are not well glued together, there is danger of a dissociation. I have seen that frequently.

There is also that danger in the mixture of races, against which our instincts always set up a resistance. Sometimes one thinks it is snobbish prejudice, but it is an instinctive prejudice, and the fact is that if distant races are mixed, the fertility is very low, as one sees with the white and the negro; a negro woman very rarely conceives from a white man. If she does, a mulatto is the result and he is apt to be a bad character. The Malays are a very distinct race, very remote from the white man, and the mixture of Malay and white is as a rule bad. It is the same with animals: mules have peculiar, vicious qualities and are not fertile. They may have intercourse, but often it is mere friendship between the male and the female; and even if they conceive they have abortions. They cannot carry the young, gestation is interrupted. It is the same with butterflies; some very interesting experiments have been made with the species from the northern shore of the Mediterranean and the same species from the southern shore. The southern variety is much bigger than the northern, and together they bring forth beautiful specimens, yet they die out in the third or fourth generation because they can't propagate, they don't really mix. So with a great effort you can bring oil and water together for a while: you make a sort of foam, an emulsion, but then it separates again. That is the cause of many cases of insanity. A great difference of race nearly always causes a certain fragile, sensitive disposition because the units are not well glued together—that is at least a way of expressing these very difficult problems of psychopathology.<sup>5</sup>

Now, as you see, we encounter the same thing in cases of inflation; when the inflation reaches a certain culmination, there is an awareness of the multitude of units, and I should say that we had reached such a culmination here. That has been anticipated by the increasing amount of pathological passages in the text before; those chapters were not very sympathetic, and one can take that as a sign that we are approaching the pathological sphere. Then we shall probably have a reaction which tries to mend the trouble. You see, we now come to this realization of the thousand and one goals, which would be, as I said, the goals of the many in the individual.

Many lands saw Zarathustra, and many peoples: thus he discovered the good and bad of many peoples. No greater power did Zarathustra find on earth than good and bad.

The real Nietzsche did not see many lands and many peoples; he only knew Germany, Switzerland, and a part of Italy. Those are lands in himself demarcated by frontiers, continents demarcated by seas, units inhabited by the smaller units called "peoples." That is the structure of his mind, of his basic psyche. And then he made a discovery: the good and evil of many peoples; he saw that there were certain values, merits and demerits, among those different peoples, and that good and evil were the most powerful agencies. Now, how does he arrive at the question of values? Well, as Mrs. Crowley suggested, in order to deal with that dissociation, one should establish a scale of values in order to be capable of preferring and rejecting, of making a choice; one should make a sort of hierarchy in these masses, put on top a king, or a leader, and then the others who depend in various degrees. That would be order. So he arrives at the idea of values, and he finds that there is no greater power than good and evil. Now, that obviously has to be understood in this way: it is not exactly good and evil as we would understand it in ordinary language, moral good and moral evil, but means simply the existence of values: namely, values are categories which tell what should be done, for instance, what should be chosen or rejected. To value a thing means a statement about certain contents of the psyche being particularly energetic, strong, suggestive; other contents being sympathetic and recommendable; others objectionable; and others even having the value of leading ideas, royal ideas, which decide ultimately. You really find everywhere that there are certain temperamental ideas which decide ultimately, and nearly every country has such ultimate ideas.

It is a bit difficult to demonstrate them because they always touch upon national prejudices and susceptibilities; they are often a matter for jokes, so it is better to keep away. I might mention one very simple example, which is not particularly offensive, from a nation that has always made it a particular point to be capable of ridiculing itself, England. There the decisive idea is the idea of the gentleman; a man may be rich, he may be intelligent, he may have extraordinary merits in different ways, so that other nations would call him a great fellow. Not so in England. The one ultimate and decisive value there is, "and he is a gentleman." That settles it. If the last judgment is negative, then the case is settled in a negative way. It does not help him in the least to have any amount of merits; if he is not a gentleman he will go to hell. You can read that phrase in newspapers, and more than once it has happened to me that some one said, "This man is a wonderful scholar, you will enjoy very much talking to him"—and then a slight hesitation. "But?" "Well, he is not a gentleman." So one knows what to do with such a man irrespective of anything else he has done.

Mr. Baumann: Could you give a definition of a gentleman?

Prof. Jung: Oh, we leave that to the English; they are responsible for this idea. Otherwise I would be forced to go into a discussion of the ultimate values of other nations and then things would become a bit ticklish.

No people could live without first valuing; if a people will maintain itself, however, it must not value as its neighbour valueth.

What he understands here by value is of course such a leading idea. A nation must have a leading idea, as it should have a leading political body or leader or king. There must be a sort of hierarchy. Otherwise, a nation is not an individual, but merely a heap. One often speaks of an ant-heap, but mind you, an ant-heap is a wonderful organization: the termites form a marvelous hierarchy with everything in its place! A people without a leading idea embodied in a leading body never makes a nation; it is simply an accumulation, a herd. Even the animal herd has a leader. There really have been cases in the history of mankind where large societies were a mere accumulation, and that was always a time of anarchy; with no leading principle there is confusion, a time of catastrophe and decay. As soon as people begin to live again there is a leader or a leading idea, a leading slogan; it doesn't matter what it is, it is simply necessary. That is the value which Nietzsche means here, and without such a value people would surely not survive. And it must be different from the values of surrounding nations, or they would not be differentiated. They wouldn't know one from the other and would simply get mixed up. The society without a leading idea is the victim of the surrounding societies that have leading ideas. It is only an accumulation which will be torn asunder because it belongs to nobody—to no principle and to no princeps, to no leader.

Much that passed for good with one people was regarded with scorn and contempt by another: thus I found it. Much found I here called bad, which was there decked with purple honours.

This is of course self-evident. It is an illusion to think that values are the same; things that are of highest value to us mean nothing at all in other countries. For instance, in the actual religious life of other countries, you see the most amazing things; what is blasphemous to us may be the ordinary thing in other countries. To us it would be shameful if a man discussed business transactions in church; not so in Catholic countries—in Italy, for instance. Of course the church would condemn it, but that does not matter, because to them the church has no particular meaning apart from its being a magic place. It is enough if you have been there; you don't need to participate in the performance. You need only to be in the neighborhood of the performance of grace and you get a touch of it—just as, if you fall into the water you get wet,—no matter what is going on besides. I don't mean that in a derogatory way; it is just another level of religious experience. That was the antique idea. There was no particular morality about it; you attended a magic performance and got a shot of it—got the medicine. All those complicated moral structures of doing it in the right way, of being conscientious about it, are Nordic superstructures.

Never did the one neighbour understand the other: ever did his soul marvel at his neighbour's delusion and wickedness.

A table of excellencies hangeth over every people. Lo! it is the table of their triumphs; lo! it is the voice of their Will to Power.

This is Nietzsche's point of view, he makes morality dependent upon the power instinct. He says the morality of nations and of individuals chiefly lacks that aspect of adaptation; to be moral is to be something useful—a way to success. This is of course one side of the problem.

It is laudable, what they think hard; what is indispensable and hard they call good; and what relieveth in the direst distress, the unique and hardest of all—they extol as holy.

Whatever maketh them rule and conquer and shine, to the dismay and envy of their neighbours, they regard as the high and foremost thing, the test and the meaning of all else.

That comes from the fact that the leading idea of a people, the chief value, embodies their chief psychological quality, and therefore it is the way to success. For you can only succeed in your own way, never in any other way; you will succeed in your superior function. So if a nation has a certain leading idea, it is a manifestation of a certain temperament, of a certain superior function, and through that superior function those people make their success. That bears out the following:

Verily, my brother, if thou knewest but a people's need, its land, its sky, and its neighbour, then wouldst thou divine the law of its surmountings, and why it climbeth up that ladder to its hope.

Take, for instance, the idea of the gentleman in relation to the climate and the geographical position of England. You know it is a land surrounded by sea, and it was formerly fairly inaccessible. Now of course with airplanes it is a different proposition, and as a matter of fact the gentleman idea is declining. It was originally a feudal idea when England was an isolated island, and it is declining in the age when airplanes easily fly across the Channel. The gentleman is the isolated island. Until comparatively recently any noise started on the Continent simply did not touch England. The principle was: business as usual—that noise over on the Continent or anywhere in the world does not concern us. “The splendid isolation of England” is a slogan of English policy. But it is no longer true since the great war. So the peculiar geographical position of England accounts for their peculiar ideal, and it is the same with other countries. For instance, take the ideology of Bolshevik Russia or Czarist Russia, and compare it with Russia as a country, and you see immediately the analogy, the absolute likeness. Not to speak of Switzerland!

Mrs. Baynes: We have taken this as though Nietzsche had identified with the thousand goals, but it seems to me that he took great pains to show that he did not identify.

Prof. Jung: But he is forced to do that just because he is identical. You see, whoever has an inflation is identical. Otherwise he would make a clear difference between himself and Zarathustra, between himself and his anima. But because he has that identification, he tries naturally to work out of it. That accounts for his idea of the Superman. This identity is an extraordinarily powerful motive to create something which is unlike anything else, and you will see in this chapter a tremendous effort to create something that will lead him out of this identity. Even the chapter before, “The Flies in the Market-Place,” was an attempt to work out of this condition, to liberate himself. Of course the inflation shows in that he tried to do it in a collective way: namely, as he is trying to wriggle out of his identity condition, so everybody ought to in the same way, quite irrespective of what they want. It is a great question whether people want that ideal of the Superman. It was his particular ideal and as subsequent events have shown, this idea seems to be particularly evident in the collective unconscious; but it is a great question how it will work itself out, whether it will be to the advantage of the world or not. I am quite certain that such a time condition always has two sides; to the one it is favorable, to the other utterly unfavorable. This idea may produce and has already produced most peculiar things—the mass movements of today for instance. Though the idea itself is the opposite of a mass movement, yet when it reaches the surface in an unconscious way, it produces mass movements, which are absolutely against this idea of the distinction of the self.

Mrs. Crowley: You were speaking before of the mixture of races producing something that was rather quasi in effect, and I was wondering whether it was too far afield to question this thing in Nietzsche himself. The archetype Zarathustra is of a foreign race, the Iranian Zoroaster, so do you think that the selection of this archetype could have any influence on his psychology—the fact that this power, this unconscious force in him, does belong to another race?

Prof. Jung: Inasmuch as we speak to Iranians in themselves, Zoroaster is an Iranian and Nietzsche is one too inasmuch as he identifies with him. But there are no strange archetypes. They are generally human, everybody practically contains the basic psyche and therefore the same archetypes as other races.

Mrs. Crowley: In this case the Iranian race has that enormous will to power.

Prof. Jung: Not more than other nations.

Mrs. Crowley: Not more than the Chinese for instance?

Prof. Jung: It simply took another form there. The Chinese were not nomadic. The Iranians were horse people and travelled a good deal, whilst the Chinese were cultivating their fields.

Mrs. Crowley: Would that not make a different attitude?

Prof. Jung: Ah well, they would not have been Taoists if they had not also the power instinct; they had such a wonderful philosophy in order to combat it.

Mrs. Crowley: Yes, but they had such an ideal too; Tao as an ideal accents the self.

Prof. Jung: These things can be explained out of the life of those nations. The Persian naturally developed a different kind of philosophy and religion from the Chinaman. The one was sitting upon his land and the other was travelling about, so they developed different ideas. In Persia the important idea was purity, the opposites were “above and below,” “light and darkness”; while in China there was not the fight between moral principles, and there was no question of purity. It was rather a question of reconciling two opposing principles, a far more static vision. The fact that Nietzsche chose the archetype of Zarathustra has nothing whatever to do with the Persian archetype; one finds precious little of Zoroaster in Zarathustra.

Mrs. Crowley: I thought that the pair of opposites, good and evil, might indicate it here.

Prof. Jung: Well, it is true that in Zoroaster’s teaching, good and evil are most important, and Nietzsche thought he was called upon by fate to mend the trouble Zoroaster had originally made in the world. Nietzsche was still on that euhemeristic point of view that man could invent values, which of course is a tremendous error; it was that old euhemeristic hypothesis that man has invented the gods. So he followed on in the idea that man has invented morality. That was the materialistic view of his age. And you see, that is Freud's chief prejudice. He thinks man has invented something which can repress an instinct.<sup>6</sup> Of course nothing can repress an instinct except another instinct; it is a conflict of instincts. The power that can suppress an instinct is surely as strong as a man and a bit stronger. Well now, Nietzsche goes on to specify his idea of the ideal.

"Always shalt thou be the foremost and prominent above others: no one shall thy jealous soul love, except a friend"—that made the soul of a Greek thrill; thereby went he his way to greatness.

This is the way Nietzsche formulates the essence of the Greek ideal. Perhaps it was so.

"To speak truth, and be skilful with bow and arrow"—so seemed it alike pleasing and hard to the people from whom cometh my name—the name that is alike pleasing and hard to me.

Here he alludes to one of his favorite ideas, that the name Nietzsche is Polish; he played with the idea that he was of wonderful Polish descent.<sup>7</sup> It is a little like Benvenuto Cellini who also assumed that he was not the son of his parents, that there was somebody big and unknown behind the scene.<sup>8</sup> It is always the prejudice of heroes, that they are the outcome of a little mistake of the gods.

Dr. Bertine: Could he not mean Zarathustra by "his name"?

Prof. Jung: Well yes, the Persians use the bow and arrow, that is perfectly true, but Nietzsche himself is behind it. To my idea, it refers more to Nietzsche than to Zarathustra because of his notion of being of some unknown noble Polish descent. You see, Zarathustra is nowhere in the book characterized as a person, but there are any amount of hints about Nietzsche in the disguise of Zarathustra, as well as his own confession that Zarathustra was a split, the other one in himself, his own self.

<sup>6</sup> Jung has in mind "the super-ego," which Freud regarded, in Jung's words, as "the representative of the parental authority, as the successor of the Oedipus complex, that impels the ego to restrain the id," wherein are located the instincts (CW 18, par. 1152). The super-ego was also regarded as the basis for belief in a divinity.

<sup>7</sup> As Nietzsche wrote in 1883 to Georg Brandes, "My forebears were Polish aristocrats (Niezsky)" (Letters/Middleton). Biographers agree that this is a fiction, presumably stemming from Nietzsche's wish to dissociate himself from Germany. He often spoke admiringly of the Slavs.

<sup>8</sup> In his celebrated autobiography (1558-1566), Benvenuto Cellini does not renounce his parents, but he did with scant evidence say, "I believe that our family is descended from a very great man." Autobiography, tr. George Hall (Harmondsworth, Middlesex, 1968), p. 17.

“To honour father and mother, and from the root of the soul to do their will”—this table of surmounting hung another people over them, and became powerful and permanent thereby.

That would mean the Jews.

“To have fidelity, and for the sake of fidelity to risk honour and blood, even in evil and dangerous courses”— . . .

This would refer to the Germans. “Honor and blood” is the German slogan; you can read it in the newspapers today.

teaching itself so, another people mastered itself, and thus mastering itself, became pregnant and heavy with great hopes.

Verily, men have given unto themselves all their good and bad. Verily, they took it not, they found it not, it came not unto them as a voice from heaven.

Here you have it. You see, he really thinks that people have made it. He does not see that man doesn't invent those values, but they are invented for him. All the values that we have inherited or that have been handed to us by well-meaning teachers, go by the board inasmuch as they don't agree with the instinctive pattern. They simply won't work, but cause awful conflicts and are cast out as soon as possible. For the real foundation of our values is our family temperament, our national clan; ultimately our morality is not an invention, but an instinct. Yet it is the materialistic prejudice that once a man called Moses unfortunately climbed Mount Sinai, and there he felt queer, so he said: “Now you people must get it in the neck; I will show you what you must not do.” And if Moses had not done that there would be no morality in the world at all: the instincts would blossom unashamed. Everywhere, in every country, there was a Moses; every decent nation has a Moses, and even if we cannot establish the historical existence of such a man, at least there are the laws, and very severe laws at that. And where did they come from? They came from another instinct. Freud does not see that however, on account of the materialistic prejudice that there is nothing but human consciousness; that consciousness does the trick. But laws and values and so on are temperamental dispositions which exist before consciousness. We wake up in the morning and say, “Is the sky not beautiful?” That is made for us; we simply find it there as a beautiful thing. Or we say, “Isn't the coffee good?” Well, it is good for us because it has been made good before we ever tasted it, so it was our disposition to say it was good. Otherwise we would have considered it bad or indifferent. Naturally, our taste and such things can also be greatly influenced by a sort of tradition; certain idiosyncracies, for instance, have to do with certain prejudices by which we have been poisoned. If we are descended from parents who were convinced that an onion was made by the devil, we shall labor for quite a while under the impression that any man who eats onions is a great sinner and, inasmuch as you remain in your mother's womb forever, that only very bad people eat onions—or play cards or something of the sort.

Values did man only assign to things in order to maintain himself—he created only the significance of things, a human significance! Therefore, calleth he himself “man,” that is, the valuator.

The measurer rather. It is probable that the word man really has to do with the measuring one; “to measure things” is simply another word for being aware of things and naming them, giving them value, giving them a number and a significance. That is surely true to a certain extent, but for the fundamental values it is also not true, because the meaning of things, the value of things, the numbers of things, have been established before consciousness. They simply forced their way into consciousness, and so they became. The first ideas of man were always sort of revelations. Suddenly, the name of a thing was revealed unto man; one spoke the secret sacred names of deities that revealed the significance of things. The better part of the decent philosophies in the first centuries of our era were revealed. The Gnosis is a revelation for instance, and the Corpus Hermeticum<sup>9</sup> begins with a revelation, and the New Testament (which is also a philosophy) is a revelation; the orthodox still believe it was dictated by God the Father himself, despite the very obvious fact that he made numerous mistakes. And it is a truth. They would not believe such obvious nonsense if it were not true in a way, a temperamental truth. We are still inclined to believe that the real truth can never be known if it is not revealed. If somebody asserts seriously that something has been revealed to him—well then, it is true. Of course, that concept of revelation has fallen into disrepute in the last century, but temperamentally we are apt to believe anybody who turns up with the claim of being a miracle worker, even if it is the most elementary nonsense. Like Mme. Blavatsky—she was a miracle worker. She was a medium no doubt, but that would not have counted in the least if she had not been a miracle worker at the same time. And the old reformers or prophets in the beginning of our era were always miracle workers and teachers of revelation.<sup>10</sup> The man Jesus was a miracle Rabbi who was travelling about the country, and very probably Simon Magus also, and Apollonius of Tyana, and the Gnostic Fathers—they were all of that band.<sup>11</sup> It is really a truth that powerful ideas always have the character of a revelation. So Nietzsche here falls into the materialistic mistake.

<sup>9</sup> Jung may well have taken this etymological derivation from Nietzsche's observation that man (manas) suggests that man sees “himself as the being who measures, the ‘assaying’ animal.” The Genealogy of Morals, tr. Francis Goffman (Garden City, N.Y., 1956), p. 202.

Jung often drew upon the Corpus Hermeticum, a medieval collection of alchemical and other Hermetic works. See especially CW 11 and the alchemical volumes, CW 12, 13, and 14.

Valuing is creating: . . .

Here you have it! Only people with an inflation can assume that they create. You don't create, you are created; in creation you are created. Something makes you do it, something is working through you, you are most tremendously instrumental. Try to stop creation and see what happens. If creation were our own doing, we could say yes or no, but it is a well-known fact that the creator cannot say yes or no; he has to create, and woe unto him if he does not.

hear it, ye creating ones! Valuation itself is the treasure and jewel of the valued things.

Well, that is true. If you understand the valuation process as an instinct in man, as a preconscious fact in man's unconscious that produces the gold, then that is the treasure. Therefore, it is always symbolically expressed as the treasure guarded by the dragon, or the precious stone, the jewel hidden in the cave at the bottom of the sea or in the lap of the mountain, etc. Those are all symbols of that dark power in our unconscious which produces the value, and producing the value means a valuation. The substance is always the same, but a new value is given to it, and the new value is the treasure. That is the secret of alchemy for instance.

<sup>10</sup> The Russian Elena Petrovna Blavatsky (1831-1891), the founder of Theosophy, and author of Isis Unveiled (London, 1877). Though she had a considerable following in Britain, the U.S. and India, she was not one of Jung's favorites. See Dream Sem., pp. 341-42.

<sup>11</sup> On all of these see Jonas on the Gnostics, as in 5 June 1935, n. 4.

Through valuation only is there value; and without valuation the nut of existence would be hollow. Hear it, ye creating ones!

Change of values—that is, change of the creating ones. Always doth he destroy who hath to be a creator.

Here the process of thought turns into an enantiodromia. All that he has said has been true with the sole exception that Nietzsche takes it as the action of consciousness, while we know that our conscious valuation means just nothing. Try it on your children or on other people, and you will see it is all bunk: it simply won't work. If you say to a child, "My deepest conviction is that this soup is very good," the child doesn't think it is very good: he won't eat it. When my parents told me that something was very good and wonderful, I thought, "Not a bit of it, it bores me." "Always doth he destroy who hath to be a creator" is true. You cannot put something on a table which is already laden; you must first clear those things away in order to put new ones in their place. And to build a house where an old house stands, you must first destroy the old house. We must go a bit deeper and realize that with the instinct of creation is always connected a destructive something; the creation in its own essence is also destructive. You see that quite clearly in the moment when you check the creative impulse; nothing is more poisonous to the nervous system than a disregarded or checked creative impulse. It even destroys people's organic health. It is dangerous because there is that extraordinary destructive quality in the creative thing. Just because it is the deepest instinct, the deeper power in man, a power which is beyond conscious control, and because it is on the other side the function which creates the greatest value, it is most dangerous to interfere with it.

Mrs. Lohmann: I want to ask you if it is a general experience that man feels a terrible anguish as long as he thinks he is the creator of something which has, in fact, come to him. It throws him down also with the responsibility, and it is the greatest relief when he can experience the fact that he is the instrument; it is not himself that is the creator, it is something else.

Prof. Jung: Yes, you experience that great relief when you realize that you are not identical with the creative power. For instance, if Nietzsche could have realized that he was not identical with Zarathustra, I don't know what it might not have done for his brain. To feel that you are the creator is a terrible burden, hellish anguish, provided of course that you are creator enough to feel it consciously. The creator is usually like a child that just plays with the gods and can produce the most awful monster without seeing it. Many artists can only produce because they don't know what they are producing; the moment they know, the creation is completely stopped. For then they begin to reflect; then they feel responsible and cannot play like the gods, unless they fulfil the psychological demand that they dissociate themselves from the creation, from the archetype, from the creative impulse itself. If they can do that, they can go on creating; then they can allow the god to play. It needs a certain faculty, the art to live amorally; if any kind of morality is caught up with the creative impulse, it simply cannot work and it will destroy you. On the other hand, if you destroy the creative impulse, you will destroy the intrinsic value of the individual at the same time. But you still can live on as a wall decoration.

Creating ones were first of all peoples, and only in late times individuals, verily, the individual himself is still the latest creation.

This is a very important statement. It is perfectly true that in the beginning the people were creators—well, the peoples that consisted of individuals who were unconscious of their existence. Can you tell me a very good example of that kind of psychology, where creation was everything and where only one individual existed?

Mrs. Fierz: Egypt.

Prof. Jung: Yes, that is most characteristic of the Egyptian civilization. The people, even the Pharaoh, lived in mud huts, and the gods had the most gorgeous stone buildings which would last through many thousands of years. The real beings lived in mud huts that completely disappeared, while the unreal beings, as we would say, lived in wonderful palaces built for eternity. Babylonia was along that line too, but the Greeks, not to speak of later civilizations, built their worldly houses much more solidly. The creative instinct in Egypt was a matter of the nation; we do not know the name of a single great Egyptian artist. There were great artists but their names are unknown. It is a Greek invention that we know the name of Homer, for instance. Mesopotamia is like Egypt in that respect, the names of their poets and artists are unknown; they had great poetry and great art, but there was no individual expression of it. We see something of that in Japan where they had certain great names but the disciples of those great fellows like Hiroshige or Hokusai renounced their own names and called themselves simply Hiroshige number two, three, four, etc. hiding themselves, becoming anonymous. They carried on the name of the master, while they themselves completely disappeared. That is still a remnant of the ancient consciousness of creative men; they felt so utterly identical with their people that they didn't even have a name; it created and man was merely an exponent of it. To create was a sort of craft; he created not even knowing that he was creating something beautiful. Many an old craftsman who produced a marvelous piece of art was utterly unconscious of the fact. I am rather convinced that the great composer Bach was such a fellow. He did not know what he was really producing. He composed nice chants for the church and other things, but I am very doubtful if he knew that he was the composer Bach. One would assume that he knew it, but it is just as difficult as to know in what time we are living. At this point I must always tell the story of that knight in the thirteenth century who was caught by his enemies and thrown into a dungeon for several years. Finally he got sick of that eternal prison and beating his fists down upon the table he said, "I wonder when these damned Middle Ages will come to an end!"

Mr. Baumann: Bach belonged to a huge family in which were seventy-two composers. Also some musicians were called Bach who did not belong to the family. A Bachian was a musician, a kind of clan.

Prof. Jung: Well, a guild rather. "Verily, the individual himself is still the latest creation." That is perfectly true. You see, the first individual—and he was only the symbol of an individual—was the Egyptian Pharaoh; in order to classify him as an individual he was supposed to be the incarnation of a god, twice-born, one who through divine birth was made god. He was the only outstanding individual whose name was known and he was worshipped as the individual, the personification of the whole people. The whole people was the Pharaoh. In other nations, the kings were the first individuals, and they were always characterized as sons of the gods, or of the sun or moon. They were made into individuals by the act of coronation. Coronation is the equipment of a human being with the sun or the cosmic quality. Therefore, the robe of the emperor was embroidered with stars and constellations, and the emperor still wears stars upon his body called "orders." The Babylonian kings were represented very early with stars upon their person. Their mantle was the celestial cosmic space, and the head was the sun. So the individual was the revelation and came down from heaven.

The Gnostic idea of Christ was that he was not born a Christ; he had to be twice-born, baptized in the Jordan, in order to be the real God Christ. According to this tradition, the Holy Ghost generated the body of the man Christ by the miraculous impregnation of the Virgin, but he was still only an ordinary man though his generation was a miracle. So the Holy Ghost has to descend a second time in order to make Christ into a God, and the God left him in the garden before his execution took place. Therefore Christ said on the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" It was only the man who found himself hanging on the cross, and he did not know how he came to be there; he had been led through the garden—that was life—and made to do certain things. He had been entirely instrumental, and the tragedy was that the God had gone out of the man before he was dead. That is the belief of the Doketic form of Christianity which was a very serious competitor of the Christianity that survived.

Now, Christ as a twice-born inherited all the religious tradition of old Egypt. He was the living Osiris, because the Pharaoh was the god only insofar as he was Ra in Osiris. At first he was the only one who had an Osiris and therefore he was an individual and distinct; later on, the nobles, his viziers and so on, had an Osiris too, and finally all the better class people had an Osiris. That was of course a preparation for the Christian idea that everybody has a soul and is therefore worth saving. And when that was generally known, the time had come for Christ who was again a god-man, the only one who contained a divine spirit in which God himself appeared—while other people had a partial soul, a partial Osiris. You see, the idea of Osiris was devalued on account of its general distribution; if everybody has a thing it no longer has any value. They were quite doubtful whether an Osiris that was in everybody would work, and on account of that devaluation there was great danger that the idea of Osiris would be lost altogether. So it was a great relief for the people when that man Christ came with the idea that he was the god-man, for only then had they an idea of the imperishableness of the individual. They needed a prophet who told them that God himself appears in man. God being necessarily imperishable, inasmuch as you believe in that savior, inasmuch as you eat of his body and drink of his blood, you participate in the imperishableness of the God, you are yourself deified. Therefore, the early Christian idea that when you receive baptism and communion, you cannot sin any longer, or if you should, you must be baptized a second time, and if that does not work, you are ready for hell.<sup>12</sup>

<sup>12</sup> It was Tertullian's belief that baptism made sin impossible. See above, 16 May 1934, n. 7.

LECTURE IV

6 November 1935

Prof. Jung:

Here is a question by Mrs. Baumann: "In connection with Nietzsche's and Wagner's ideas about adornment, I would like to ask why it has become an abnormality or perversion for a civilized man to adorn himself? Dressing in bright colors was not always considered effeminate or a mark of homosexuality, and it is not unmanly among the primitives. Primitive men decorate themselves just as much as, and usually more conspicuously than, primitive women. (For example American Indians.) Among animals all the bright colors are reserved for the males. (Lions, tigers, etc., as well as birds.) Bright colors and 'decorations' in the army seem to be the only acceptable form civilized man allows himself today."

Even in the army [dressing in bright colors] has become more or less obsolete since the last war because it was no longer practical, and it is for very much the same reason that those complicated and gorgeous colored clothes have been abolished generally. It is true that it is primitive and animal-like when the male adorns himself. It is too obvious, too naive, and inasmuch as man has lost his naivete, inasmuch as he has had to give up primitivity, he has had to give up that primitive style; he simply could not maintain it without giving himself away completely. That beautiful apparel which they wore in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries was just too conspicuous; we simply could not wear it any longer because it was not sufficiently concealing; men in particular have to be concealed in order to fit into collectivity. The more populous our towns and cities grow, the more we need inconspicuous clothing; our actual style is chiefly English and French; the great cities Paris and London have set the fashion. More recently New York has had a tremendous influence in deciding the style for the whole of America; for a while it was absolutely de rigueur in the United States to wear either a certain kind of straw hat or a certain kind of black hat. London has preserved the tradition of wearing a top hat; for a very long time that has been considered indispensable. So the cities are responsible for the inconspicuous and uniform dress for men.

You see, men live chiefly in collectivity, but hitherto that has not been true of women. Women have to adapt to their husbands and children and houses, and society and outside responsibilities are more or less play: the only thing that matters is the family, the house, and so on, and not the state or society in general. While that is the man's serious life, not his playground, and he would feel it in his pocketbook if he were not adapted in that field. Women can wear all sorts of individual clothes and colors in the social playground; it is even necessary. They must take over a part of the spontaneity and activity which the men have had to renounce. Inasmuch as men have had to repress their natural primitivity, since they can no longer afford it, women have to take up that side. We see in modern times how women have adopted the masculine style to an extraordinary extent, not only in clothes, but also in the very line of the body; they imitate the masculine fitness and strength, share their sports, and are even producing an entirely new type of woman, a sort of woman-friend for a man, something like a boy. And it is highly appreciated by men because they are then relieved from the odious task of playing the role of a sort of primitive, which they are not any longer; they cannot be naïve about it because they would injure themselves far too much in the actual social condition.

Of course women have become more or less falsified by having to ape masculine qualities which they only have in their minor characters—the animus helps them to play that masculine role. But it is not natural. So we have in our days an animus masculinity among women which was unheard of in former centuries, when it was not necessary for them. In primitive society women were inconspicuous and exceedingly uniform; if there was any kind of conspicuous costume, they all wore the same. Like the Red Indians for instance; the men are much adorned and wear gorgeous colors, and the women wear their black shawls and clumsy high boots, which are not particularly showy—really exceedingly unattractive I should say. But for primitive men, women do not need to make up particularly; it is quite enough that the woman is a female; the primitive man is active enough himself. The modern man is eaten up by social conditions where he has to adapt to an extent of which women usually have no idea—unless they are in the same game. I always say it is not a league for the protection of the jeune fille that is needed, but one for the protection of the jeune homme, and not only the jeune homme but also for the vieillard. No man in modern society is safe, none, for women have become terrible. Man has been deprived of his masculinity through the circumstances, through the social conditions. The big cities, the great accumulations emasculate him; men cannot afford to be men in large societies.

In an isolated small community, you can still find individual types among the men; one is the man with a beard, another is the man with the flowing locks, and another the man with a wonderful moustache, etc., and they wear funny things, appear in a funny way. They are originals. These are the sad remnants of the time when every man distinguished himself by a particular kind of feather or by a peculiar knot in his hair perhaps. You see that among the negroes, particularly the negroes of the Sudan, the Shilluks, where every man has his coiffure of individual design. One wears a boat, for example, made of clay and rancid fat and hair; he has only short kinky hair but he adds horse's hair or the hair of the giraffe and makes it into an extraordinary thing. Another has a sort of canoe on his head, and another one, something like a halo. Each is absolutely individual, having his particular art. They go about for years with those things carefully kept; they are always about the same. So each one is distinguished by a particular head-dress, and there is nothing uniform about it. While their women are just inconspicuous; they have no particular refinement because it is enough that they are women. They are supposed to be passive and not to adorn themselves, and go about naked except that they wear a lot of brass rings, but that belongs to their uniform. Those primitive men can afford to be individual because they are not in large masses; only here and there is an isolated group, so they have space enough to build up their own fantasy and imagination. But put a lot of them together in the cities of Southern Africa, and they would soon become uniform or there would be no end of teasing and trouble in rubbing up against their fellow men; they had better be inconspicuous or they would be liable to comments.

That is the reason why individuals in big cities are wiped out, becoming just particles of a herd; a man in a simple uniform dress denotes that he feels himself like any other man, one uniformed atom among millions. And woman can afford to take over that masculine role inasmuch as they are not so ground under. Of course we are speaking of the women who are not in business, the married women who have at least a world of their own. Naturally, if they live in a community where there are thousands of other women, they must be very careful to wear just the right thing in order not to be conspicuous in the wrong way, so even among women there is a limit to the individual variation. There are laws which become more severe, the larger the community in which they live. They can afford something out of the ordinary in the country, but in a big town they must not be out of tune. Moreover, they are not helped to be individual in that they wear, most probably, things which are handed out to the public in dozens or even in thousands; most women cannot afford to wear clothes made for themselves.

So looking back through the centuries, you find that as man ceased to be colorful, the women took it on themselves, and now it is due to them that we have individual distinction in dress at all. But the more women are in business, the more we shall see that even the small margin that is left of individual variation will decrease. Also our dashing type of life simply does not allow complicated clothes. English women have developed the tailormade costume as a sort of practical national uniform, only dressing up once a day for dinner. It is now restricted to that one hour—then they can look decent—and the rest of the day they look just like nothing, or like anybody. And even in the army the colors are now restricted to a little patch of red or yellow somewhere. Now, at the same time that the enormous increase in population in big towns has brought about this peculiar lack of individual distinction in our dress—having no longer a chance to do it outside, naively unconsciously, with gorgeous robes and so on—we developed the idea of individual distinction within, individuation. We haven't even gowns and hoods here as you have in your English and American universities, and as they have in Germany and Italy. But that will vanish also, because it belongs too much to the Middle Ages; they don't fit in with the modern type. It will all be introverted and disappear into the unconscious. And then it comes back in another way as the idea of inner distinction. All these things hang together.

Now, we will go on to a somewhat more difficult question by Miss Hannah: "In connection with the verse ending 'the individual is himself the latest creation' I should like to ask: (1) Do you think the creative force entirely decides on the form of creation, or has the artist a certain choice in whether that force shall be used subjectively or objectively? (2) Supposing he has that choice and decides to use it subjectively, do you think he would feel any more need to create outside himself?"

I must ask what would be the other choice. If the creator could not create outside of himself, what would he do?

Miss Hannah: I mean, could he use it in the process of individuation? Nietzsche says the last thing which is invented is the individual, and I want to know if the whole process can be turned inside voluntarily—or is that done by the creative force?

Prof. Jung: Well, the creative force entirely decides any form of creation, as long as there is no consciousness to make the choice. You see, consciousness has a certain amount of disposable libido, so we can put a certain value, arbitrarily, on a thing; we can value it as Nietzsche says. Inasmuch as we have free will, we can declare a thing to be valuable, or we can choose, decide between two possibilities. But inasmuch as we have little consciousness we have little free will. We don't know how much because we cannot measure, but can only say that we have more free will than the primitive inasmuch as we have more consciousness; we have developed the faculty of discrimination. Our consciousness is far more extended. We have wrenched from the unconscious a great amount of libido, so that we really have something like free will up to a certain point. Now, inasmuch as he has free will, the artist can choose a form; he can canalize the creative force to a certain extent, depending upon the degree of its power or intensity. The creative force could be compared to a river. If the river flows smoothly through a plain, with no great push, then naturally you can do something with it, turn it into different canals. But if the river is rushing through a gorge with tremendous power you can do little. In that case, the river will choose its own form quite irrespective of your free will. Of course, with our modern means we can build powerworks even in a very wild river; provided we spend the corresponding amount of time and energy on the work, we can tame that wild torrent, but it demands a corresponding amount of free will. Then there are surely conditions in which we cannot chain the creative impulse, where it is explosive and works like a volcanic eruption; and in that case it will always choose its own course. Only where the river flows gently, where we can easily build canals and dams without being afraid that it will destroy the whole thing, can we give it a form that we have chosen by free will. Inasmuch as we have that choice of the form we can use creative energy here or there; we can build a canal on the left of the river and water the desert there, or we may prefer to water the desert over to the right. So if you can give a form to the creative impulse at all, you can choose it, can decide whether it will be an inside or an outside form—always of course providing that the nature of that creative impulse does lend a hand in the operation. Now, supposing that the river of your creative forces is so gentle that it allows you to lead it, then you can even apply it to an inside form, which is rather an unusual application. But it might also be that the creative impulse chooses the inside form rather than the outside—that is also possible—and then it does not show on the surface at all.

Miss Hannah: That is more or less what Nietzsche says here, doesn't he? Isn't it a question of the Zeitgeist turning the libido inwards?

Prof. Jung: Well, that is questionable. When he says that in the beginning the peoples were the creators, he means in primitive times when there was little consciousness, little free will. And that is true, you can see that. They naively decorated their weapons and canoes, working almost unconsciously. For instance, you remember the famous story of a primitive who was carving his canoe very elaborately and when he arrived at the further end of his boat the beginning was already rotten—but he still went on through the years. That is the primitive creator, quite irrespective of very natural facts; when wood is left in the sun and the rain for years, naturally it will rot, but he did not think of that because to have a fit canoe was not his purpose. I am sure he always used a canoe but one that was very little decorated, and then he thought—if he had any idea—he would have a particularly marvelous one, and he began to make a particularly elaborate decoration for it; quietly, as the years passed, he went on and on while the other end was already rotting. That is the true primitive creator. So you can say the “creating ones were first of all peoples,” because the unconscious simply used them as tools. As the creator used his tools, so he was used by the unconscious as a supertool. Late on in their development, people became conscious of the fact of being an “I,” that there was something in them which was different from others; but before that time they were living in a sort of mist.

If you look back into your own childhood, perhaps you may remember the moment when you became “I,” when you knew who you were. I can remember that moment very well. In my eleventh year, I remember thinking, now I am. When I looked back there was mist and I knew I existed in that mist. I knew many things had happened and that I happened among other things, but it just was, and there was no I. Then one day it came to me, now I am, somebody is doing, somebody knows that that thing is done. I am I, the only I. I have heard often enough that people remember the moment in which they became conscious—sometimes later, sometimes earlier—and this is simply the repetition of what has happened in the history of mankind; in a certain age people became conscious of their existence.<sup>1</sup> It is a curious feeling to move among primitives who live as you lived when you were six years old; they are like children, with no continuity whatever. They love a thing very dearly one minute, and they kill it in the next; and then they repent, they are very sorry. There is no consistency, no continuity of the ego; they are always something else, never the same. When they are children, they are nothing but children; when they are adults they are nothing but adults, and when they are old they are nothing but old. Therefore, you see among primitives and barbarous people the most wonderful and impressive performance of manhood and youth and old age; it is marvelous to watch an old man or an old woman, and as the culmination of biological life, a man of thirty, or a woman of twenty or twenty-five is really a sight. They are it completely. You see, sometimes our children are already adults, and our adults are children and old people at the same time. We can even see in our faces signs of extreme youth, of manhood, and of extreme age; it is a collection of all periods of life because we have become almost incapable of believing that we are here and now and nothing else. It is quite rare to have such a mood.

If you are entirely here and now, you are complete. But it is exceedingly difficult to be complete, so we are always all over the place, here and there. We have hardly a moment in which we think one thing—we always think at least two things, ten things. Have you any moment in your life, in any kind of relation, in which you can say, “I am complete, I am one in myself?” But the primitive is nothing else; in his sorrow, in his joy, in his pain, he is complete. Have you any moment in your life when you can say that you are nothing but joy? Of course not. We look at it, judge it, have opinions about it; we know it has a beginning, an end, a cause and an effect—and what does Mr. So-and-So say about it? You find nothing of that with the primitive; the real primitive is the moment. He is the here and now, the complete performance. It is a marvelous sight. The sick man or the beggar is fabulously complete; you could paint every one of them. The gesture, the intonation, the whole horizon, the atmosphere, is complete; it is unmistakable what they are. With us it is most mistakable. When a primitive weeps it is perfectly clear, a marvelous demonstration, but if a woman in modern society weeps, how shall we know what it is?

Mr. Allemann: Don't you think with a good toothache you are complete?

Prof. Jung: Have you got one? Sure enough, if we are absolutely demoralized we show it, but it needs extraordinary conditions; it needs a complete realization. Well now, all this has to do with what Nietzsche was speaking of in the paragraph which I read last time, “Creating ones were first of all peoples, and only in late times individuals; verily the individual himself is still the latest creation." But the individual is a separateness, and the separateness is naturally due to the fact that something is put between oneself and the herd, and that is another point of view. That at once causes a dissociation of course: namely, as an atom of the continuum, as a member of the herd, you are and feel nothing but herd, but inasmuch as you are an "I," a separate unit, you feel different—or you couldn't be a separate unit. So through the very fact that you are conscious of existing, you are already split; there is already a dissociation. Therefore, the becoming of the individual has been understood as a sin: that is the original sin. Sure enough, it was something disagreeable, and the primitive man always understands the thing which is disagreeable as sin. When the missionary asked the negro chief about the difference between good and evil, he said, "It is bad when my enemy takes my women and it is good when I take his." That is the original conception of good and evil, and since man has always felt that separation from collectivity as a loss, he called it sin. But in about the time of Christ, people began to see that it could be valued in a very different way, and that accounts for the interesting split which occurred between theological or philosophical opinions as to the interpretation of the paradise legend: namely, the question whether the god who made man so unconscious was a good or a bad god.

The Gnostics held that this god was a vain, inferior demon, who in his vanity had created man imperfect and unconscious, and that therefore it was a mighty good thing when the foreign god of the spiritual worlds interfered with the doings of that creator, and sent his son into paradise in the form of the serpent to redeem man, to teach him consciousness. So the redemption was simply the continuation of the separation, the distinction; the separation was then understood as a good thing inasmuch as it was a separation from something that was evil; they understood it from the side of individuation. While the standpoint of the Old Testament, as well as the Christian point of view, is from the side of collectivity. The Christians were convinced that the creator was good and that Adam and Eve were simply naughty children who did not obey the law of the Father, but the Gnostics were really on the side of individuation. And Nietzsche, with his idea of the Superman, continued on that line which is always aside from the collective opinion. For collective opinion has always been and always will be in favor of the view that things are really good as they are and that one should stand by them and not make a difference; the aim is to have things uniform with no separation. The Black Shirts in Italy mean: No distinction; we are particles of the herd, with no existence of our own, because God is good and he knew very well why he said not to eat of the tree. Then all the people who don't belong to that creed are necessarily bad. You see, these political parties simply imitated what the church and other collective bodies of opinion have always done.

Miss Hannah: I still don't quite understand about turning the thing inward and using the whole creative force on the individuating process. If Nietzsche had done that, if he had understood it, would he have gone on writing? Would he have felt any need to preach it, to put it in any form?

Prof. Jung: Well, I say that is possible provided the creative impulse allows it. The question is there. With a certain amount of free will you can do more or less what you please; you can direct the creative impulse. But inasmuch as the amount of free will is quite indefinable—inasmuch as the sum total may be very small or very great—we don't know; we only know it is never sufficient. We know we cannot win out by free will. It reaches a certain point and then it depends upon the grace of heaven, depends upon whether the creative impulse fits in with it or not. If the creative impulse fits in with your purpose to use it inside, you can do it because the creative impulse is with you. In other words, if your unconscious wants you to apply the creative impulse to the inside exclusively, you can do it, but if your unconscious does not want it, nothing in the world will enable you to do so. Of course you can drive yourself crazy, split yourself, and become unreal, but you will pay for it, and you will not reach your goal. You simply cannot accomplish it without the help of the unconscious; if you go against it, you will fail. Now inasmuch as Thus Spake Zarathustra is really a creation, it does exist and it has its undeniable significance. This is the way in which it worked and Nietzsche simply had no choice. But also he did not want anything else. He wanted to produce a book, and he did not think of applying that creative impulse to himself. In the eighties nobody could possibly dream of such a thing, because there was nothing inside—intestines and entrails and that was all.

Miss Hannah: But still, as he went mad I think he might have been able to turn it a little more inside.

Prof. Jung: Might! What would have happened if the old Romans had possessed machine guns? What would have come out of the Germanic invasion of Italy if they had had poison gas and such things? Obviously we can look at it from a distance of time and say that we might have chosen differently. But don't forget, we are just standing on the shoulders of Nietzsche—standing on the shoulders of a whole generation of thought which has been enormously influenced by Nietzsche—and therefore we are able to think as we do. In a hundred years, when people have digested what we call modern psychology, they will think quite differently; they will have a different point of view.

Mrs. Baynes: I thought the question was turning round the point as to whether or not a book should be taken as a symptom of an incomplete inner experience.

Prof. Jung: I don't think Miss Hannah meant that. You can deal with Zarathustra as a symptom if you like, of course. It is a pretty bold point of view but possible; you can call any creation, even the most finished artistic product, a mere symptom of personal psychology, but the question is, do you arrive at a satisfactory result with such a hypothesis? You see, the more the creation is significant the less you are capable of reducing it to the personal psychology. Freud tried it, for instance—tried to reduce a very perfect work of art to the very imperfect personal psychology of the artist. But nothing comes out of the destruction of a work of art.<sup>2</sup>

Miss Hannah: But if you did not use it as a symptom which somebody has produced, but as a projection, could not concrete, objective art be the first fumbling of the individual towards individuation—with the hypothesis that if the individual was formed, the need for art would disappear?

Prof. Jung: Well, if you don't call it art, but call it the creative impulse. Naturally, the creative impulse has always been the maker of the individual. You see, creative impulse does not appear in everybody in the same strength: certain individuals are picked, they have a particular gift. They create something which is striking and they are then the innovators, and stick out like old man Prometheus, that great sinner against the gods. He was an individual and he was punished for it, but he was made to stand out through his creative impulse. Naturally, the creative impulse is forever the maker of personality and uses that individual form, that distinction. Therefore it is absolutely necessary that, in the process of individuation, everybody should become aware of his creative instinct, no matter how small it is.

Miss Wolff: I think Miss Hannah is speaking of a certain phase of the creative impulse, and it is quite possible that that at a certain time would turn naturally inside, but I don't think it would be so forever. For man never really lives inside for himself alone; he is a collective function. A creative man may need his creative impulse for a time to build up his personality, but after a time he will need it for other people. He will again write books or be an artist, because he would only be half a being if he were living just for himself.

* "An artist is once more in rudiments an introvert, not far removed from neurosis. . . . Consequently, like any other unsatisfied man, he turns away from reality and transfers all his interest, and his libido too, to the wishful constructions of his life of phantasy, whence the path might lead to neurosis." Introductory Lectures on Psycho-Analysis (1916-1917), tr. J. Strachey, std. edn., vol. XVI, p. 376.

Prof. Jung: Yes, we must not understand the individual as turned in only upon himself; otherwise individuation would lead to the complete disappearance of the sane individual. He must reappear again. In the case of the really creative artist, he goes on being the creative artist because that is the means by which he links himself up and communicates with the outside world. There is no point in turning in—disappearing—if you are not coming back with a message to the people outside.

Miss Hannah: The first thing that occurred to me was a sentence in one of the letters of van Gogh where he says Christ got beyond the period where he had to carve stone or paint, and worked on humanity direct.<sup>3</sup>

Prof. Jung: It is an interesting point, but that is the point of view of an artist with reference to Christ. Obviously Christ never thought of painting. I am sure that a man with any other craft might have the same idea; the doctor, for instance, could say that he gave up general practice and became a psychotherapist.

Mrs. Baynes: One could also say he did not descend to painting to express his creative power.

Prof. Jung: Perhaps he had no gift in that respect. For instance, Mani, who was the founder of a religion, was also a fine painter; he is said to have decorated two temples with frescoes. And in modern Persian tradition he is no longer known as the founder of a religion but only as a very great painter and artist. He was a man of considerable creative power which took many forms, and I assume that he could also give many forms to his artistic expression—while in the time of Christ there was a singularly restricted field in which to express creative power. But that is all fate; we cannot speculate upon such things. It is perfectly futile to say that Christ was beyond that stage; you could say just as well that Schopenhauer or Kant were beyond the stage when they could express themselves in stone or something like that.

Well, we are still sticking at this very important point that "the individual himself is still the latest creation." Now, Nietzsche's conception of the individual cannot be treated here in a modern way; we must go back to the eighties in order to understand what he means. You see, the individual only began to be talked about in the time when they were talking of species and families and collectivities as special concepts; such a term is a scientific invention meaning the individual unit over against the herd. They did not use such terms at all if they were not envisaging things in a scientific way. So when they were talking of species or classes, the smaller units in them were called individuals. It is that individual, seen as a separate unit, which is, he says, the latest creation. Before that invention the greater units—families, classes, tribes, species, clans—were the really existing things, while the individual was of no import whatever: the individual was the more or less transitory way in which peoples or classes or nations appeared. To a very large extent, that is still our point of view; we still think statistically. The scientific mind in particular thinks in great numbers; in dealing with any social problem, say the problem of public hygiene, they say so many per thousand lead a certain life, or three individuals out of a hundred are suffering from such-and-such a condition, or in the United Kingdom there are so many individuals run over by motor cars per month—and three or four thousand in the United States. It is that concept of the individual which Nietzsche means.

Our more modern idea of the individual is entirely different from that statistical way of envisaging problems. We look at the individual from the inside, and then the individual means the man, the subjective man, the single man being a sort of microcosm and not an atom in a continuum. So our psychological concept of the individual, in comparison with that of the eighties, seems like a most extraordinary exaggeration. When that era was in full bloom, the individual was of course nothing but a sort of contrivance of nature and the main goal of the whole life-process was the life of the species; the individual meant no more than a cell means in a body. Moreover, the individual contained nothing. There was nothing inside but his conscious psyche; everything else was just the body. So that time was utterly unable to see the individual as a microcosm, in contradistinction to a previous time, the early Middle Ages. Then the individual was seen as a microcosm, but then they saw the macrocosm—the sky with the stars and the planets and God as the ruling spirit of the universe—and every individual was the mirror reflex of that wholeness; it was as if the whole cosmos had descended into the individual entity man and made him a microcosm.

Now we have again a similar idea, yet it is very different: namely, we discover the microcosm in the individual as the origin of the macrocosm. Our idea is that as you find certain archetypal ideas in man, you also discover them in the universe, but man put them there: they were not there before. For instance, the eternal constellations in the heavens to the medieval man had had a meaningful existence for an eternity. God himself expressed his power and his might in those constellations, and he caused them to be in man too; he created man as the microcosm. We would turn the thing round and say the individual man was the origin of such a universe; we see the universe largely depending upon man. He fills this universe with meaning, but in itself it is without meaning; it is even quite futile to ask whether it is eternal. Moreover, we are convinced that it is not eternal in its present form. There are no eternal constellations, because they all change their position in the course of untold centuries. So what was an eternal and unshakeable truth to the primitive man—namely, the unchangeable nature of the zodiacal signs—is relative to us; we know that in the course of many thousands of years all those stars will change their positions and the universe will have an entirely different shape; and to call them “eternal” or to name them “The Fishes,” “Capricorn,” and so on, is merely a projection. You see, we also find the archetypal images in man, but instead of making them derive from the great cosmos, we make them derive from the constellations in man. Now, I don’t want to discuss the ulterior philosophical question, “Which is older, the ape or the hen?”—but I say that for our time we have a tendency to think in this way. Of course this may be a continuation of materialism, an enantiodromia, an overestimate of the individual over against the time when he was utterly depreciated. That is quite possible, but even if we know that, we cannot get away from such a point of view, because this is a necessary concept at present. We have to live it, have to accept it; for the time being, such a standpoint would be the natural thing.

Mr. Allemann: Is not this point of view like an inflation in an individual?

Prof. Jung: It would only be an inflation if we had it in a time when it was not suitable; in 1850 it would be an inflation.

Mr. Allemann: Yes, for the individual, but is it an inflation for the whole to have this opinion?

Prof. Jung: Well, a super-critique could call this a probable inflation of the individual. But we are hardly allowed to have such a critique, because we would thereby deprive ourselves of the specific life of our era; we have to think in a certain way in order to make good what the time before has made wrong. We cannot escape these laws; we would not share the life of the era if we thought differently. If the general intellectual atmosphere becomes entirely convinced and satisfied with the idea that man is the measurer of things, or that in man the universe begins, then you could allow yourself to take another road and ask if this was not inflation. But since only a few people in our day think so much of the individual, your inflation is damned at each step. Everywhere you run up against people who tell you what a damned fool you are to think so much of the human mind or of what is inside man, for what is man after all? Now this individual in Nietzsche's text is the bridge to the Superman; it is the individual which was valid in the time of materialism. And with the Superman, Nietzsche himself is going through that process of transformation of values; in this chapter he says man is the maker of values. Man has made the eternal signs and symbols, or a god-man has made them; they never came from the heavens. So in his own personal life he begins to introject the whole of metaphysics—God is dead. He fills the individual with things which used to be in the universe, and that is of course an inflation, inasmuch as Nietzsche is not sustained by his time. Everybody with a new idea is always threatened with an inflation. If he lifts himself up above his time, of course he really has an inflation, because he can only lift himself above the surface of the earth by means of an airplane or a balloon. He can only do it by a sort of inflation. Therefore, I say a super-critique is necessary. Our prejudice is our idea of the individual and this is an inflation; but mind you, it is only an inflation as long as you are in a balloon. When the earth has come up till it reaches you, when you stand again on the surface of the earth, it will no longer be an inflation. Then you can give it up because the world has come up: there has been an advance of consciousness.

Peoples once hung over them tables of the good. Love which would rule and love which would obey, created for themselves such tables.

This table of good is of course die Tafel des Wertes, which means a sort of code or a list of values, and he says that the desire to rule and the desire to obey are responsible for the creation of such moral values. So here is an important part of his moral philosophy—he makes morality or ethics derive from the instinctive will-to-power.

Mr. Allemann: I think it is badly translated. It is here Liebe.<sup>4</sup>

Prof. Jung: Yes, but you could say the libido that wants to rule and the libido that wants to obey, so it amounts to the same. It is the desire to rule; in calling it “love,” he is giving it a very good name. If you go on through the text or if you read his Genealogy of Morals, it is perfectly plain that he derives morality entirely from the instinct of power, no matter whether the instinct is love or not. In this poetic language he gives it a very nice name because he refers here to the love of life, to the positive attitude toward life; even to rule or to be forced to obey is positive, because the joy of life is love and love is joy, and he holds that joy is much deeper than suffering. That comes later on in the poems; in the next paragraph we have the joy:

Older is the pleasure in the herd than the pleasure in the ego;

So this love and joy are pretty much the same: it means the saying yes to life, the positive answer to the question of existence. Now, it is of course a very questionable point of view whether you can make morality derive from the will-to-power, or whether it has not another origin. It is a question also whether morality has an origin at all or whether it is not one of the entirely genuine, basic laws of existence. If you analyse the moral laws, of course you find any amount which clearly derive from the power instinct. For instance, you could interpret the worship of the parents, or obedience to the parents or the authorities, as a power question, but I should call such an interpretation very short-sighted, because it is so clear that it is suitable—that it is teleological—for the sake of continuity. One could not say that old people demand worship or authority for their own egotistical ends, because the other side is so obvious: it is useful that somebody should have authority.

You see that in the life of primitive tribes; the authority of the Elders is so important for the life of the tribe that the British really try their best, by hook or by crook, to enhance it. I followed up quite a number of legal cases when I was in Africa. I was interested in the British policy in that respect, and there were cases where young people had offended against certain tribal laws which were really nonsensical, or perhaps even immoral from a European standpoint; but when the Council of Elders complained to the D.C., he decided in their favor. In some cases the Council of Elders had administered punishments to members of the tribe which were hardly warrantable, where the right was not on their side, but the D.C. decided in their favor in order to protect their authority.<sup>5</sup> That is because the British discovered that the tribes where the authority of the Elders had been undermined soon became unruly; and an anarchistic element developed which affected the other tribes and undermined the general order of the colony. Therefore they tried to reestablish the Council of Elders throughout the country, in order to maintain as much as possible the primitive order of things. They found it impossible to rule those tribes in a European way; they have not the same idea of justice, and they have a very different morality in spite of the fact that they are influenced by the missions. Naturally it is the missions, chiefly, that undermine the authority of the Elders, because, with their tainted morality, they combat their decisions in a very shortsighted way—of course offering them an idealistic point of view which those people never apply because they don't understand it: they only make nonsense of it.

Now in such a case, where somebody has a ressentiment as to the authority of the Elders, he might be inclined to explain the law that one should worship and obey the parents as simply the egotistical instinct of the said parents; but otherwise he will understand that it is in the interest of the life of the tribe, and therefore in the interest of the individual, that the young people have respect for the older people. For that maintains the continuity of the cultural life of a tribe. So all those tribes that have lost their belief in the authority have descended to a very low level of anarchistic society, and it is merely the police and the machine gun that keeps them in order. This is actually the case in many parts of Africa, chiefly through the work of the missions, who therefore have now to deal with anarchists. It is the case of Uganda and that is the reason why England is particularly anxious when somebody kicks up too much dust in Africa; there is too much dust lying around loose in Africa anyway and something might catch fire. The Sudan is an Anglo-Egyptian condominium and Uganda is really a colony; and a very short time ago there was no real connection between the two. It would be quite possible to construct a good road there, but they left that country devastated; there is nothing but a terrible barren country inhabited by unruly tribes. They left it so on purpose in order to prevent infection coming down from Egypt by the Nile through the Sudan to Central Africa. They prefer to have the whole traffic go by Mombasa on the East coast where they can catch everything that comes in by keeping a very severe control of immigrants. The whole Buganda population in Africa is very dangerous.<sup>6</sup> They say they are only waiting for a sufficiently large number to first cut the throats of the Indians, and then the Europeans. They hate the Indians even more than the Europeans, and they don't even mind the guns. That tribe in particular has lost its proper organization completely; but they are very clever people, so clever that the Hindu merchants and usurers have little chance in the Buganda country. In the other parts all the more.

So morality is really rather more a form of instinct, or laws ruling the instincts, which are born with man. It is a sort of cunning device derived from the power instinct or any other instinct; morality is merely the expression or the codification of vital laws which rule the life of a community. For instance, if you are alone you need no morality—there are no situations in which you could possibly use it—but as soon as you live in a community the law begins to operate; and the more populous our cities become the more it will be differentiated, because the conditions where people can hurt each other will become more numerous. Therefore, we have a development of law and a refinement and differentiation of morality which we have never known before; such a refinement of consciousness is simply the consequence of the accumulation of population in the great centers. And, you know, we never have the proper amount: either we have too much or too little, because this is a point where man is not sure of himself. For never before has there been a time in his existence when he accumulated in such numbers, and when there were such facilities for meeting and rubbing up against one another. Formerly, it took two or three days travelling to reach the relative with whom you were quarreling, and by that time you had forgotten all about it and couldn't think why you had come unless it was for some joyful purpose. If every one of us who had quarrelled with another fellow had to walk a week in order to reach him again, it would be the end of the quarrel.

Dr. Bertine: Is there not a contradiction in Nietzsche's idea that valuing is creating, and that valuing is the expression of a will-to-power?

Prof. Jung: I would not say that. He could easily defend this apparent contradiction by saying he had simply created out of the power instinct. But probably, as has always been assumed, each instinct is in a way invented since we have no proper definition of creative power. That is utterly unknown; I would not be able to give you any suitable definition of "creative power." It is a peculiar quality which shows in the instincts, in this form or that, and it is a borderline concept, almost a metaphysical concept. We only know that it is, but how that is possible we don't know. Just as we cannot explain why it was just man who invented fire, and protection by means of weapons, and so on. Why have animals not invented fire? Or why is it that certain human beings, the central Australian natives, wear no clothes? The temperature does not explain it because the temperature goes as low as zero centigrade in the night, yet they have no clothes; they never invented them. They have every chance to cover themselves with the furs of animals but they don't; rather they lie around the fire like snakes stiff with frost, and just wait in a kind of numbed unconsciousness until the sun is high enough to warm them up and then they live again. They are too primitive to dream of inventing anything. While other tribes long ago, the Aurignaciens<sup>7</sup> for instance, in prehistoric days, who we assume were actually on the level of the Australian native, did have clothes. They lived in a climate very much colder than Australia, so they probably used fur or skins and lived in caves; they could never have gone entirely without clothes in our countries. You see, science is incapable of explaining this peculiar fact that man does invent. If we could not actually see that, we could say just as well that it was quite impossible that anything was invented; the only thing which proves it is the fact that it is.

and as long as the good conscience is for the herd, the bad conscience only saith: ego.

This is a very important statement, and it is surely true. Joy is in the herd, and that is older than joy in the "I," because joy in the case of the primitive is exclusively collective. This is true even with us. There are people who cannot enjoy themselves when they are alone—they are so hellishly miserable that they avoid it—and when they are together in a herd they are different beings, a fact which you can still observe. It is typically human. You see, when you are in the herd everybody has a good conscience, because whatever you do there you do with others; even if you do the most appalling things it is perfectly O.K., because everybody is doing it. For instance, if tomorrow it were the latest Paris fashion that women should go to a dinner entirely naked, they would do it; of course there would be a slight shock when they first saw it in the papers, but if Mrs. Jones is going quite naked, then I can too. Why not? If in the eighties they could have seen how undressed ladies now are in their bathing costumes, or the way they go to dinners with their backs naked to infinity—everything visible practically—they would have died of apoplexy. But it is quite possible; because if it is done in collectivity, you can do just what you please. Inasmuch as collectivity agrees with it, there is no bad conscience, none whatever; you are even unconscious in a great crowd. It is as if you did not exist, you don't mind. So the "I" really only exists when you have a bad conscience—when you have sinned against a good conscience. You share a conscience when you are with everybody; but if you do something by yourself you have a bad conscience because it is not shared with mankind. Even if you do something quite decent, you are ashamed, and you may expect to be ashamed because you are separated: you have committed the original sin. You see, if you can only make up your mind to share whatever you possess, every evil thing you feel, with others—I mean inasmuch as others also condescend to share their dirt with you—you are in an effortless state of justification because everybody is at this level; everybody is doing the same and you are rid of the "I." And inasmuch as you are no longer "I," it doesn't matter whether you are moral or immoral; you simply don't matter any longer and can do the most immoral or absurd things. Therefore, in the Catholic church where you can confess and have absolution, where you have no more qualms, you are no longer an "I."

Then of course the question comes: Which is better—what should be? Well, obviously there are two opinions. The God of the Old Testament says: "Don't be an 'I,' don't eat of that tree, or you will see how unconscious and pitiful you are, how pitiful is the thing I have made." And the other point of view is: "Be as conscious as you can, be responsible to yourself, for you will thereby spare much evil not only to yourself but also to your surroundings." Now, we don't know which is right. The decision is always the particular task of the time—whether we are forced this way or that, to be a collective people or a more individual people. I cannot decide it in many cases. I have said to quite a number of people that they had better go another way. If you are interested in Catholicism, or are a Catholic, remain in the fold of the church. Or join this or that other movement, where you are no longer "I." I am quite convinced that there are numbers of people who are not meant to be "I," who ought to live in the world of old Jehovah where everything is perfect. But there are numbers of people who are not meant to be perfect and who cannot live in the world of old Jehovah.

LECTURE V

13 November 1935

Prof. Jung:

Last time we got as far as the paragraph,

Verily, the crafty ego, the loveless one, that seeketh its advantage in the advantage of many—it is not the origin of the herd, but its ruin.

Here Nietzsche explains that the “I,”<sup>1</sup> as a conscious separate unit that seeks its own profit in the profit of the many, is not the origin of the herd but its destruction. This is perfectly plain: the herd exists only inasmuch as the conscious “I” does not exist. The herd consists of biological units because only the unit, the living being, carries life; life appears, not in a general or an absolute form, but in the form of living biological units. And they only form a herd inasmuch as they are unconscious of their separateness. When the living unit, the individual, becomes conscious of its separateness, the herd is destroyed, ceases to function. So inasmuch as individuals become more and more conscious, the herd recedes more and more, and is replaced by what we call “society”: namely, an organism based upon conventions between conscious individuals. You see, the self-consciousness of the individual does not destroy the connection among human beings, but only destroys the unconscious relationship between them. Society is not destroyed by the consciousness of individuals, or individuation, but is only destroyed by unconscious individuals. Yet the herd is destroyed by conscious individuals.

Now, as soon as there is a conscious individual, there is also a system of values, for values mean discrimination. If there is no conscious individual, there is no discrimination, but if there is a conscious individual, there is also a possibility that values and significances are discerned. To be conscious means that there is discrimination; consciousness cannot be without discrimination, for there must be a consciousness in order to discriminate itself from the other thing. You find in Plato's philosophy a very apt terminology to express two principles: namely, the Tauton, which means literally, "the same," that which is identical with itself; and the Thateron, which means "the other,"<sup>2</sup> the thing which is not "I," not my consciousness. My consciousness is the Tauton, the thing which is identical with myself, and the object of my consciousness is the other thing. As soon as there is consciousness, there is a Tauton and a Thateron; if there is no consciousness they don't exist. Now, since there is a sameness, the identity of myself with another thing, I have already created a discrimination: significance and values. The Tauton is a significance, because it means the sameness with myself; and Thateron is also a significance, that which is different, the other thing. At the same time, it is a feeling discrimination—that is, the thing which is the same is relative to me. It has then the feeling value of being identical with myself while the Thateron is the stranger or the strangeness—it is the other thing—and that is a feeling discrimination. So the origin of consciousness means the origin of values and significance, and you find these concepts so well coined in this early philosophy, because Plato was close to the origin of philosophical consciousness.

You see, he was pre-Christian, a man of the fourth century B.C., yet there were other philosophies before, and the pre-Socratic philosophers were less concerned with consciousness than with objects, particularly the nature philosophers like Empedocles; they had a marvelous naïveté in reference to nature or to natural objects, a lot to say about how things came into existence, etc., and it was all a projection of unconscious Socratic and Platonic philosophy. So, from the sixth to the fourth centuries B.C. the ideas of Plato already existed but in the unconscious of those philosophers; they projected them into nature. Then Plato became more psychological—well, it is difficult to make a difference between Socrates and Plato—it was perhaps Socrates who discovered the first psychological terms. And we find that Plato makes use of the old nature philosophy in the form of a myth. The idea of the Platonic primordial man, which is still going strong, is a symbol for the self, the all-round being. This is a part of the philosophy one hundred and fifty or two hundred years before Plato, when the Platonic ideas were still dormant in the unconscious, and Plato narrates the story of the all-round being as if it were a myth. This is a very clear example of how such ideas come into psychological existence. There is nothing, then, of that idea of the Tauton and the Thateron in the older philosophies—they were just not concerned with those ideas; yet they made the same differences among objects. But they did not include themselves. They could not think of the sameness of themselves and their consciousness, of being identical with themselves; they rather put it into the object as two opposing principles. It was seen outside and not inside of man's consciousness. One could almost say that the pre-Socratic philosophy was on the objective plane, and the Platonic philosophy already arrived at the subjective plane.

One sees the same thing in certain Christian symbols, or other symbols of the past, which are now applied in their psychological form, while formerly they were seen as qualities of the objects. The discrimination which Plato was trying to use in those two concepts was seen by earlier philosophers as the dry or cold or humid or warm quality of the object; they discriminated the elements, separated them into those that attracted each other and those that opposed each other. But Plato connected discrimination with consciousness where of course it really originated. When consciousness developed out of the general unconsciousness, a split went through the whole world, the whole world was divided. One could say that the primordial experience of the dawn of consciousness, that division of the world-soul, was still preserved in Plato's myth. You see, he says that in the beginning, when the Demiur-gos had made the world-soul, he separated it crosswise. Plato had the idea that there were three staffs, with the world-soul as a sort of axis. He cut the thing in the middle and bent two staffs back into the form of wheels, and then pushed them into each other obliquely, and when you look at those circles in the prolongation of their plane, you see it like this.

world.<sup>3</sup> This is the Platonic chi, the fourfold division of the light and You can see it in the sky in the division of the zodiacal logical the Milky Way. This peculiar symbolism is the myth-remnant of that primordial experience of becoming conscious; in the moment when consciousness appeared, there was division. Of course the creator is always creating a new understanding, a new level of consciousness; he expands or extends consciousness, conquers a new world perhaps or a new continent, adding it to the existing image of the world; and so he has created new significances and new values. Now, Nietzsche is not concerned here with significances; he is only concerned with the feeling values of good and evil. But in order to make it complete you should add to good and evil, new differences, new significances.

Loving ones, was it always, and creating ones, that created good and bad.

The creative is not necessarily loving; loving is simply the feeling form of creation. Loving brings two heterogeneous objects together that meet in creation. Creation is an outburst of energy and without opposites there is no creation. So one can say, loving is creativeness in feeling.

Fire of love gloweth in the names of all the virtues, and fire of wrath.

This is a poetic statement.

Many lands saw Zarathustra, and many peoples: no greater power did Zarathustra find on earth than the creations of the loving ones—"good" and "bad" are they called.

It is peculiar that he insists upon the feeling. But Zarathustra would. And what is the psychological reason for that? Why does he not insist upon the understanding?

Mrs. Crowley: Because feeling is Nietzsche's weak side.

Prof. Jung: Yes, he is chiefly intuitive and intellectual, and therefore feeling is contaminated with the inferior function. Probably, as he is more intuitive than intellectual, the real inferior function is sensation but coupled with feeling. Therefore, Zarathustra insists so exclusively upon the feeling and far less on the significance. The typical feeling values are of course "good" and "evil," not "significance."

Verily, a prodigy monster is this power of praising and blaming.

Now, if praise and blame are feeling values or feeling judgments, carried out through the values of good and evil, then in how far is the power of praise and blame a monster?

Dr. Bertine: If it is in the unconscious or in the hands of the anima, it can be quite animal-like, and that is somewhat the case with Nietzsche.

Prof. Jung: Yes, under the condition that the feeling function or the feeling judgment is inferior, it is in the unconscious or contaminated with the unconscious, and then it takes on the qualities of a monster.

So the term monster or monstrous is a more or less veiled allusion to a contamination of the collective unconscious. Now what is a monster?

Mrs. Adler: It is not one, but composed of several.

Prof. Jung: Yes. The typical monster is the chimaera which is in front a lion, behind a snake, and in the middle a goat; it is a monster because it is a mixture. In medicine, a monster means a child that is quite abnormal, or a calf with five legs and three heads, for instance. So the unconscious is monstrous because it contains paradoxes which are not yet paradoxes, but if consciousness should step out somewhere and look at the unconscious, it instantly would discover that the thing was a monster. As long as you are inside, you cannot see it.

Miss Wolff: I don't see why one should speak of the unconscious here. These concepts of "good" and "evil" are just collective factors and as Nietzsche is speaking of collectivity, I think he means that just this passing of laws of good and evil is like a monster; I think we don't have to go as far as the anima and the unconscious and all that.

Prof. Jung: We have to because that term monster refers to his conception of good and evil, and they are not necessarily monstrous, but in their mythological understanding they are monstrous. For instance, in the Book of Job God is accompanied by two monsters, the leviathan and the behemoth, and those are the pair of opposites. The behemoth is the warm-blooded, land animal, and the leviathan is the great sea monster that fills two thirds of the ocean. It would be the makara in the svadhisthana chakra,<sup>4</sup> and the same idea is in the Upanishads, where a Brahman is accompanied by two monsters. You see, that separation or discrimination which consciousness causes is on the one side a most insignificant fact, a tiny change of the world's surface; it does not matter whether somebody once said that one thing was good and another evil—that means nothing at all. But on the other side, the origin or the existence of consciousness has a tremendous metaphysical meaning; looked at from the standpoint of mythology or philosophy or religion, the creation of man—or the creation of consciousness—has meant a most revolutionary fact in the cosmos. It means the dawn of the world, because the world does not exist unless somebody knows that it exists. Of course one can say it makes no difference whatever to the universe that man knows that there is such a thing as a universe—it is exceedingly probable that nobody in the universe is very much bothered by that fact. But to us, to the world inside, it is all-important that we know that we are, that the world is. So we could say just as well that it doesn't matter what the world is in itself, but only matters what the world is which we perceive. Sure enough, we have no conception of any other world than the one in which we are living; we have no contact with any world which is not conscious to us, and cannot even be sure that there is a universe of which we know nothing. It is perfectly futile to talk of it. But we can safely say that this world is for us the world, and in our world it makes a lot of difference whether we know that we exist or whether we don't know. Our philosophy, our science, our religion, is concerned with the qualities of our world and our interaction with it; we never shall get away from that, and we cannot go beyond.

Therefore, this little invention of man, to call one thing good and another evil, is at the same time monstrous. It is an enormous thing, a split which goes right through the world, in that the whole world is separated into good and evil. The idea of this split between the heavenly forces and the dark forces of the underworld goes back into the womb of time. And it is really monstrous because they are powers of the collective unconscious which are always monstrous. Nietzsche rightly calls this power of praise and blame a monster, a prodigy; the praise and blame of man has divided the universe, and therefore it has a monstrous power. You read in the Upanishads that the world came into existence through prayer: somebody prayed and there was the world; you see, they knew that the world came into existence inasmuch as somebody was conscious of its existence. And good and evil appear as soon as somebody calls things "good" and "evil." Tremendous power has been called into existence by pronouncing those words—that is, by the separation of that pair of opposites which had always lived peacefully together in a primordial condition. The old Greek philosophers thought the original chaos was in a peaceful oscillating movement like the sea, a state of breathing gently and nothing happening, until somebody caused a crystallization or a division, and then the pairs of opposites were set against each other; the moment that split in the world was created, pairs of opposites began to fight.<sup>5</sup> And they are always represented in dreams as well as in mythology by enormous animals or monsters or devils—the devil is also a monster, having a human figure and hooves and horns and a tail.

<sup>5</sup> In a passage which Jung might have happily cited, Nietzsche wrote "That it is precisely through the principle of opposites and the feelings they occasion that the great man, the bow with great tension, develops" (WP, p. 967). They agreed, too, on the great Greek apostle of oppositeness: "I set apart with high reverence the name of Heraclitus" (Twilight, "Reason in Philosophy," no. 2).

Even our modern unconscious still represents the pairs of opposites by monsters. I remember a dream of a patient which was particularly impressive. She dreamt she was waking up from an unconscious condition; she could hardly open her eyes, her lids felt like lead. But slowly, with the greatest effort, she opened them a little and she saw that she was standing under something like two columns, with a sort of roof over her. Then as she became more conscious, she found to her terror that she was standing between the legs of an enormous elephant that towered above her, and opposite was another elephant equally big. They were going to fight and she was in between. Those are the two monsters of good and evil. And what has caused the conflict between those two animals? They have been there since eternity, but now man has come in between them—consciousness has come—and the moment my patient saw those two creatures, they had instantly to fight. She jumped from between the two legs and awakened terrified.

Mrs. Schevill: The Sphinx was a monster, with the body of a bull, the wings of an eagle, the claws of a lion, and the head of a man.

Prof. Jung: Yes, there were many such beasts, the Babylonian animals, for instance.

Mrs. Baynes: Do you mean that when you seem to see these pairs of opposites in the cosmos, it is a projection solely?

Prof. Jung: It is not a projection; they are, but they are not operative inasmuch as you don't know it. It is like the old Egyptian ideas about Ptah, the creative word; what he speaks, is. Of course our rational standpoint would say it always had been. Yes, but it did not exist for us because we did not exist.

Tell me, ye brethren, who will master it for me? Who will put a fetter upon the thousand necks of this animal?

Meaning, how can we get beyond this terrible split which goes through the whole world?

A thousand goals have there been hitherto, for a thousand peoples have there been. Only the fetter for the thousand necks is still lacking; there is lacking the one goal. As yet humanity hath not a goal.

This is important. You see, the feeling judgment causes values to be, and the ultimate values are good and evil, that pair of opposites which splits the world; so the feeling judgment also causes the existence of a conflict. Then the question is naturally, how can you get beyond that conflict? How can you unite the pairs of opposites? And the sous entendu here is that you can unite them through a goal. If you have an ultimate goal, then on the way to it, a third thing is created between the pairs of opposites which eventually will unite them. Now the goal here is understood to be not one goal but many, thousands of goals, referring to the different ideals of different peoples, chiefly religious or philosophical ideas. One would expect that that cosmic or metaphysical conflict between good and evil would be just one, and that there would be only one answer to it, or only one goal. We cannot imagine that there could be more than one answer to this one conflict; for if many answers are possible, then that conflict of good and evil is not one but many, having many aspects which can be answered by many aspects: so no goal, or no symbol, ever will settle it. It is like a disease with many qualities which are inaccessible to treatment, and then there are a thousand remedies; when you find in your textbook that there are a hundred remedies for a certain disease, you know it is practically incurable; if it is a simple thing, you have a simple answer.

So Nietzsche starts here with the notion that it is surely not a simple thing, it must have many aspects, and therefore a thousand answers have been given to it hitherto, all unsatisfactory. And realizing that the problem of good and evil is one problem, that it is the problem, there should be one answer, one goal, which would be the yoke upon the thousand necks. But this one goal is lacking, and inasmuch as this one goal, this one uniting or reconciling symbol is lacking, mankind has no goal. You see, he realizes clearly here that it is one question and there is one answer to it, but mankind has not found it.

But pray tell me, my brethren, if the goal of humanity be still lacking, is there not also still lacking—humanity itself?—

Thus spake Zarathustra.

Well, inasmuch as the goal is the answer to the one great conflict, and this answer is not given, or is not possible, mankind has failed to assert its own active existence in between the two elephants. Inasmuch as my dreamer cannot get out or assert her existence between those trampling feet, she surely will be completely squashed. She should assert her existence in between those two animals, and by that she would give the answer to the conflict, she would be the reconciling symbol. She might hold those two fighting elephants apart, or she might rise above that terrible conflict and assert her humanity above the animal fight. Inasmuch as she is able to give that answer, she does exist, but inasmuch as she is unable to give it, she does not exist. Therefore, Nietzsche questions if there is such a thing as humanity, because it hasn't found an answer to that great conflict.

Well now, we come to the next chapter, "Neighbour-Love," and we have again to try to establish the connection. The former chapter winds up with the question of the one goal. The one answer to the one problem is still lacking, and now he comes to the problem of love for one's neighbor. What is the connection?

Mrs. Whitney: For one thing, we have tried to dodge this problem of the pairs of opposites through the Christian formula.

Prof. Jung: Exactly. We tried to escape this terrible problem by the famous Christian attitude, "Love thy neighbor . . .," and we stop there because the next thing, "as thyself," does not exist. So Christian love has become a subterfuge and the easiest means of getting away from oneself. One sees this at work in our day; it is exceedingly popular, one doesn't need to mention names. The conflict between good and evil is naturally a conflict in yourself; it is as if the great monsters of the world were within you, or as if you yourself were the two-headed monster. What we are afraid of and don't want to see is that there is nothing good in us which is not checked by a corresponding evil, and that our whole life is checked by these two powers. There is no way of asserting that we are only good or that our purposes are nothing but good; we have to acknowledge that there is a shadow which is just as big as the other thing. Knowing that, one naturally cannot cherish illusions any longer as to one's wonderful character. One hears everywhere, "I always wanted to do my best," but it means, "I surely did not do my best." It is a declaration of defeat. When one talks to people about it, they simply turn their faces away and look for the neighbor. It is as if someone made a social gaffe, saying something he should not have said, and then somebody else says, "À propos, isn't it a fine day?" It is a sort of attempt at changing the subject. Or as in revival meetings, when somebody makes a true but awkward remark, then somebody else opens the windows to let out the evil spirit of truth.

This is really the problem of our actual Christianity, which has forgotten that man is a very rotten proposition. It is a fact today that we have settled down to the idea that man is a fairly decent proposition. But that is not true. The early Christians were in a much better position because they knew that they were rotten; they could see it every day, had cases right under their noses. You remember, for instance, that wonderful example in the Confessions of St. Augustine. His friend Alypius had become a good Christian, and when he went to the circus where the fights of the gladiators were going on, he shut his eyes so as not to be wounded by those infernal scenes. Yet when a man fell and there rose a mighty cry among the thousands of spectators, he could not help looking at it, and instantly he was in it again, shouting and behaving like a wild animal. He lost all his grace.<sup>6</sup> That was a daily spectacle, so surely the first Christians had no reason whatever to have illusions about themselves. But later on, the conditions became more settled and peaceful and then we could allow ourselves to raise a whole vegetable garden full of illusions about the goodness of man and eternal peace and such bunk. At the slightest provocation, there rose a new group of illusions. As soon as the war was over, everybody said, "Now we are going to have eternal peace, now people will become reasonable." And now look at the damned thing!

That is man, and that is our Christianity. We say we are going out to love our neighbors. But when somebody says to me, "I love you," I say, "Who loves me? Who is that somebody who is loving me?" For instance, when a brigand comes along, I know that he loves my pocketbook. It is exactly like the Shilluks when they have killed a hippopotamus. They cut out its intestines and a man creeps into its belly and prays to the spinal cord where its soul is supposed to be: "My dear hippopotamus, don't think we hate you because your flesh is good to us; don't tell the other hippopotami that we have killed you for hatred; we killed you for love because we love your meat. If you tell the others that we hate you, they will go away and we shall have no more meat."<sup>7</sup> You see, the good Christians entirely forget that the question is: Who is doing it, who is taking the responsibility, who is loving? For instance, if a man says to another man whose business doesn't thrive, "I will do it, I will take the responsibility for your business," the other one says, "You are wonderful, but by the way, who are you?" Then he is informed that this man who is so anxious to take that responsibility has been five years in prison for fraud and twice bankrupt. We hear all over the world: "We are taking the responsibility." That is the one shout in Germany. But who is taking the responsibility? That is what I want to know.

So the Christians say "We love" or "I love," but who is the one that loves? If it is a hen it is not particularly bad; she will only eat your salads in the garden and won't do great harm. But if it is a tiger, it is something else: then things are getting a bit stiff. You see, the mere fact that they are baptized and have confessed their sins means nothing, but simply: "I declare I am a tiger, but that does not mean that I am not going to eat meat any more. I have devoured your goat and I am exceedingly sorry for that, and next week I am going to take another." Because he is a tiger he is supposed to devour goats and sheep and so on. The mere confession does not mean that the thing is not going to happen again—it is even necessary; otherwise, how can you confess again? In the Catholic church they make a small affair of a sin; you confess your sin and it is understood that you repent, and then you do it again.

Mrs. Volkhardt: But in the Oxford Movement you must promise not to do it again.

Prof. Jung: Yes, but you know they will. That is an old story; that was already the story in the time of Tertullian who thought that when one was baptized, one would never commit the sin again. But then there were cases where one did. There is a very nice case of a man who was converted from alcoholism by the Oxford Movement, which was a great merit. Then he played an important role; he was one of the center-forwards of the team and he did his confessing in a marvelous way—really a model. So the Movement got interested in him and sent him to Germany to conquer Leipzig. But there he obviously got sick of confessing and turned back to drink, which was to be expected; after a while he would get thirsty. The whole chase was after him and tried to help him, but man is man and remains man. So promising helps very little.

Mrs. Lohmann: I have read that the tiger does not attack man. Naturally he must have his food, but he does not attack unless he is attacked or when the female tiger with her young are killed.

Prof. Jung: Yes, under natural conditions everybody is perfectly aware of the fact that everybody needs his food, and if the natural conditions are not disturbed, it is not so dangerous. But there are people who always want to improve natural conditions, and then they make them worse. Well, that is just so; man is a funny kind of animal. He always tries to have wings which he has not.

Ye crowd around your neighbour, and have fine words for it.

But I say unto you: your neighbour-love is your bad love of yourselves.

Nietzsche has here a very deep insight, he says what you really love in your neighbor is yourself; and he could add that you blame him for what you blame in yourself, but you don't know it.

Ye flee unto your neighbour from yourselves, and would fain make a virtue thereof: . . .

They do make a virtue thereof!

but I fathom your "unselfishness."

The Thou is older than the I; the Thou hath been consecrated, but not yet the I: so man presseth nigh unto his neighbour.

Here he brings in the thoughts which we discussed before: namely, that the projection of oneself is older than the self; before man became conscious of himself, he discovered the self outside of himself, and that is still true.

Do I advise you to neighbour-love? Rather do I advise you to neighbour-flight and to furthest love!

Higher than love to your neighbour is love to the furthest and future ones; higher still than love to men, is love to things and phantoms.

He discusses here the means to be applied against this sickly love for the neighbor; he is rather for fleeing from the neighbor and loving that which is furthest. Of course it is interesting to see what he means by that which is furthest. It is not human beings; it is the remote, the future, or "things and phantoms." To what does he refer? This time we must talk a bit above Nietzsche.

Mrs. Crowley: Could he, unconscious in psychological terms, be referring to the self?

Prof. Jung: Well, to the unconscious. To things not in human consciousness, and phantoms, specters, and remote things. Future things are potential only; those are not phantoms. They are more symbols or allusions to things.

The phantom that runneth on before thee, my brother, is fairer than thou; why dost thou not give unto it thy flesh and bones? But thou fearest, and runnest into thy neighbour.

You see, he clearly has a vision, not of a shadow, but rather, a light, a more beautiful man ahead of himself, a more ideal figure to whom one should give one's flesh and bones. That is, of course, the idea of the Superman, the man that is beyond man. Yet one could not call it a phantom. That is a curious expression.

Ye cannot endure it with yourselves, and do not love yourselves sufficiently: so ye seek to mislead your neighbour into love, and would fain gild yourselves with his error.

This is a paraphrase of the idea he has already expressed but a bit amplified: namely, you don't love yourselves because you cannot stand yourselves, you flee from yourselves. For to love yourself is difficult; it is in a way too natural. You know, in the Bible where it is said, "Love thy neighbor as thyself," it is quite self-evident that you love yourself, but it is not evident that you should love your neighbor, because to a more primitive man love of the neighbor is a perfectly unknown conception; such a sentimentality is unconscious to him. He is generous, he shares his goods with the poor, he is perhaps far more generous than we are, but he is not sentimental about it. He gives without meaning to give. He does not give out of sentiment, but gives because a man who is hungry comes to him and, naturally, that hungry man must eat. He is that other fellow too; he says, "I eat when I am hungry, here is food." He does not give hospitality out of sentimentality, and he does not expect gratitude as we do, and the man who receives the good never thinks of being grateful for it because he also is not sentimental, since being hungry is caused by nature. That is the primitive point of view. For instance, if your apple tree has given you a rich harvest of apples, you don't go to the apple tree and say thank you; you simply take it for granted that it has produced so much fruit. As an apple tree does not give from sentimentality, from its good heart or Christian love, you also are not grateful.

But on a higher level you begin to realize that these things are not self-evident, because through the advance of consciousness they have lost their self-evident nature. You know, the primitive simply cannot resist his generous impulse; he has to give and therefore he has no sentiment connected with it. On a higher level of collective consciousness, one thinks, "Why the devil should I give my food to that beggar?" Then perhaps one overcomes one's selfishness and gives it, and then one tells the beggar that he must be grateful that one has overcome one's selfishness and egotism and been so nice to him. And from that time on, the beggars must be grateful because they have received through kindness of heart and so on. But in the beginning of human consciousness, the love for oneself was perfectly evident because the primitive is naturally interested in himself. And as he gives he also takes, so why not steal something? Outside the tribe it is a virtue to steal. But if he cheats within the tribe he sins against the laws of the herd, and as he is the herd, nobody would be such a fool as to injure himself; therefore he will not lie or cheat or steal within his tribe, his clan. It is a virtue outside however; he is then clever. He asserts himself, he lives—and that is his duty. So to love oneself is a self-evident fact as long as one is not conscious.

Where one realizes that it makes little difference whether it is your tribe or the next, whether it is your family or another, your clan or the state or humanity, there the Christian point of view has widened out the river of consciousness considerably. It has lifted consciousness to a level where to cheat, to steal, and to lie are sins, even if you apply them to a stranger, because he is a man like yourself. So love of oneself is no longer self-evident; it became obsolete in a way because it was always connected with doing some injury to somebody else. When you love yourself, you have to steal, you have to take for yourself. As Professor Brunner said in his recent article in The Zürcher Zeitung, even the word private comes from the word privare, “to rob”; whatever you have in the way of private goods is all taken away from collectivity: you have really stolen.<sup>8</sup> So we should collapse from pricks of conscience because we have taken away from the community. But we have to take away from the community; otherwise we lose our individual existence. If there are no private goods we no longer exist. Of course, Professor Brunner means more the ideal goods, your secrets and so on—you should not keep your secrets to yourself, but let other people enjoy them too. So the original meaning of that self-evident fact that you love yourself has become obsolete, and it had to be overcompensated by the idea, “Love thy neighbor.” The fact that you love yourself should be hidden, not mentioned. It should look as if you did not love yourself; otherwise, the community feels threatened in its existence. All the more, when you do love yourself you have stolen, because you have allowed yourself to have something of your own, to have your own ideas about things instead of the ideas of everybody else; and that, from the standpoint of the herd, is exactly the thing which should not be. But in that way we created this fabulous unconsciousness about our shadow. The idea is that you should not know about your shadow because it is upsetting, and then how can you share the community life? You are at a frightful disadvantage naturally because you are practically the only one who is conscious of it. So you will find that you are not able to live like that; you are hesitant, not quite happy—only those people can be quite happy who forget who they are. And your blessing, your love to other people is a doubtful gift; you don’t know what you bring to them with your love, even with your best intentions. For where do you hear the most, “I always tried to do my best?” Exactly with those people who have created the greatest disturbances or catastrophes through their good intentions for others.

Would that ye could not endure it with any kind of near ones, or their neighbours; then would ye have to create your friend and his overflowing heart out of yourselves.

That is really a sentence upon which our modern religious people have not sufficiently meditated. Instead of those perfectly insipid discussions about natural theology and such things, Protestantism would do much better to discuss this chapter of Zarathustra. That would be mighty useful.

LECTURE VI

20 November 1935

Prof. Jung:

Here is a question by Mr. Allemann, "Last seminar you said that the outer world only exists owing to the fact of our being conscious of it." I must interrupt the question here because this is a statement which is often misunderstood. This is a subjective statement, a statement like, "It is light and therefore you see certain objects; then it becomes dark and you no longer see them." And then you say those objects don't exist any longer, or it is as if they did not exist. You assume that they still exist naturally, but it is just as if they did not, and if you had not seen them in the daylight you would assume that they were not there. Now in that sense, when your consciousness ceases to exist, your world comes to an end. Naturally we know by experience that the world does not come to an end when one individual comes to an end. But if consciousness comes to an end, then the world comes to an end—that is quite certain. For a world of whose conditions nothing is known is not in conscious existence; if nobody knows of it there is no world. Of course we always like to think of existence as going on even if nobody knows of it, but as a matter of fact it is a phenomenon of consciousness too.

Now Mr. Allemann goes on: "Could we not with the same right say that as our consciousness advances into the realm of collective unconsciousness, other worlds might become as real and as 'outside' as the outer world? I think of the different concepts or degrees of consciousness in Indian philosophy which Professor Hauer mentions in the Jubilee Book, 'Prana—Maya—Purusha' and so forth.<sup>1</sup> If we consider these states of consciousness as worlds different from ours, but as real and even more real to the persons who have access there, we may come to a better understanding of the German terms entrückt or even verrückt if the bridge between the consciousness of this outside world and the other breaks, while the consciousness of the person in question is in the other world.<sup>2</sup> Could not also Nietzsche's illness have been due to an adventure of this kind?"

Well, it is perfectly certain that if the ego consciousness should be capable of an advance into a sphere hitherto unconscious, it might discover a sort of reality system outside of this reality system. As a matter of fact, the reality of the unconscious, for instance, does not coincide with the reality of this world: it is a different kind of system. So we might assume that other systems could become conscious; this is an idea which has often been discussed. You find it in that book by J. W. Dunne, The Serial of the Universe, for instance.<sup>3</sup> And it is an old problem in the Buddhist cosmogony where it is assumed that there are millions of world systems; the one cosmos which we know is not supposed to be even the so-called Chiliokosmos (the Buddhist translation of the Greek concept of the thousand worlds); our cosmos is just one, and it takes a thousand others to make a Chiliokosmos, and then there are again hundreds of thousands of Chiliokosmoses. They supposed that the absolute world, the world of the infinite existence, consisted of an infinite number of possible world systems. This concept is quite universal, one could say; the philosophers of all great civilizations have realized this idea, and it is discussed again in our days from the standpoint of natural science. Even a literary man like H. G. Wells considers such possibilities in his fantastical stories. You may remember his story of a man who was driving his car and suddenly felt a jerk so he got out to see if there was something wrong with it, and then it turned out that nothing had happened to the car, but by a peculiar chance they had driven into another dimension; there was a split through the world in that place and they had gone into another world system where everything was quite different, far more advanced. Then Wells naturally makes use of that opportunity to develop one of his Utopian schemes.<sup>4</sup>

It is of course quite nice to speak of such possibilities, but the question is always: Is it of any empirical value? Can we establish the reality of different systems beyond those we know already? Even the primitive has a definite notion in that respect; his idea of the ghostland, or the islands of the blest, or of the dead, are concepts of a different kind of reality. And they naturally understand, when a man is entrückt, in a state of transport or trance, that he is then in a different system. Therefore one finds stories practically everywhere of the katabasis, the going down into the underworld, or the wandering through the heavens, through the land of the hereafter, and so on. Those are states of Entrückung; people are removed to another country, to another world—it may be under the sea, or in the air, or on the moon—anywhere but here. Now, it is well known that any such attempt to produce a condition in which one realizes a different reality than the ordinary one, is always beset with dangers. Therefore, the process of becoming a medicine man is a dangerous enterprise. He is supposed to experience a different world system than ours; he meets with ghosts, demons, and so on. In reality, those people are often driven more or less mad; a hole is cut in the threshold of consciousness through which the unconscious flows. They are always more exposed to other states of consciousness than ours, whatever they are. We would say the man was mad, that it was a case of schizophrenia, or autosuggestion; we have a hundred words by which to rationalize his condition, but the fact remains that the fellow, if he is a true medicine man, is exposed to experiences of an overwhelming nature which are just as real as any experience in the world system we know.

<sup>4</sup> H. G. Wells (1866-1946), in his well-known story "The Time Machine" (1929), tells of an inventor traveling forward to the year A.D. 802,701. In Men Like Gods (New York, 1923) a Mr. Barnstable inadvertently drives his car into another dimension, thus finding a time-warped Utopia.

So, since there are such dangers, it naturally often happens that people are injured when they are on the way to such an experience. They may become crazy or physically ill, or die by a so-called accident; all sorts of peculiar things may happen to them on the road to that adventure. That is what the Knights of the Round Table, and the old Germans in the middle-high German poems, called the aventure, a fabulous experience; they were going to fight dragons and liberate virgins guarded by dragons and sorcerers. But those are only projections of certain inner realities; it was really the mystical experience which found its expression in many different forms. The quest may be described by the novelist in a more or less fascinating yarn, or it may be expressed by a very serious poet. Rider Haggard's She is a very good example. You can say it is an excellent yarn, of an amazing or fascinating nature, but when you read his poem in the first edition of She, you realize that it was an exceedingly serious experience in his own life, by no means a matter he could trifle with. That explains why the enormous number of books which he wrote afterwards all deal with more or less the same problem; there is hardly one which does not contain an allusion to the great experience. He could never have developed such extraordinary energy in that respect—that motive could not have had such an exaggerated power—if it had not had a tremendous reality for him; if it had only been an ordinary motive or an ordinary fantasy, it would have worn out in no time, and would have made perhaps one book and not a particularly fascinating one. It was just as real as a steam-engine or a viaduct; they also were once fantasies in the head of an engineer and then the motive power was so strong that they became real. The motive power was so strong in Rider Haggard's psychology that he wrote about sixty volumes.

And this kind of experience, this adventure, can be described in terms of approaching or entering into another system. It is described like that in the religious mysteries; it is Hades, the underworld, for instance, or a ghostland, a marvelous city, a marvelous island or something of the sort. It is understood almost as if it were a geographically situated country. It is also understood to be a peculiar state of consciousness, which is of course the equivalent of a country, a country being merely projected consciousness; so one can say this country does not count, but the state of consciousness which perceives such things counts. At all events it is a sort of psychical reality, and the adventure is just as serious as the discovery of a new continent—it is also represented as that—or the discovery of a particular region, as in She. It is the mystery adventure and this is positively dangerous. You know, it has been said that Nietzsche's illness was not an ordinary illness; he was simply removed, and only the husk remained which seemed to be disintegrated or crazy. It was thought that he himself in his lifetime was removed to another system of existence, and the fact that his illness was not the ordinary general paralysis of the insane was used as a sort of evidence for this hypothesis. That is true, it was not an ordinary form, but there are cases where even this typical illness takes on particular and abnormal forms, where it is not typical, so that is of course no evidence at all.

Now, we learn from Zarathustra that Nietzsche's great preoccupation was that quest, and he found something, no doubt. It is also fair to date his fatal illness from about the time of Zarathustra, for we know by experience that the quest can injure the health of the brain as well as the body; because it is a supreme and decisive event in the course of a human life, it can, like any decisive moment, overthrow the system. So we can make the hypothesis that Nietzsche's illness, understood under that particular aspect, was an adventure which miscarried, an adventure in which he was injured. And we might assume that his soul was nevertheless able to cross the dark waters and to arrive in the other country, yet was no longer in a position to send back messages. I have told you about that single instance when something happened to come through. He once said suddenly to his sister, "Are we not perfectly happy now?" Then the next moment the clouds descended again. You see, this incident could be taken in that way. You could also make this hypothesis about insane people in general. Some of you heard the discussion about The Flying Draper by Ronald Fraser.<sup>5</sup> He was the man on the quest and he discovered another world system; in the end he was just the husk, yet it is perfectly clear in the book that he had reached another form of existence. You see, the disappearance of a man may mean his survival in a new condition, and what he leaves behind are just the remains of his former existence. There is the same idea in a new book by Talbot Mundy called There Was a Door. You remember his famous book Om was most remarkable, very interesting, and the new book expresses the idea or the impression one has when on the quest, that there is no door, no escape. Yet there was an escape. He found it and he disappeared; in that book the man on the quest simply dissolved.<sup>6</sup>

So we are philosophically quite free to assume that even the man Nietzsche reached another form of existence. Yet he disappeared, so there is nothing to be said about it. If you say he was just a poor lunatic, that his brain was rotting away and decayed, you are right, that is perfectly true. And the other thing might also be true, but we have no evidence for it. I am sure that among those sages who have spent their whole lifetime in Yoga practices, there were a number who to our idea would be crazy, yet other people assume with equal right that they are not crazy at all, that it is only an appearance and they are perfectly sane inside. One really has very peculiar experiences with lunatics in that respect. For instance, people who seem to be perfectly crazy become reasonable when they have a fever. Others, with apparently a complete dissociation, have among their voices the voice of the normal mind; that would show that the normal mind had simply disappeared. It was not really gone, but was somewhere among other realities which we cannot account for since we do not know what psychical existence is.

<sup>6</sup> Talbot Mundy wrote novels on Theosophical themes, e.g., There Was a Door (London, 1931) and Om: The Secret of Ahbor Valley (Indianapolis, 1924).

Then we must also take into account that the psychical existence or the psychical being is very peculiar; it is not a simple thing. You see, matter is also not simple; we assume that it is at least tangible and think it is simple because we can touch it. We cannot touch mind but we assume that it does exist, yet it has exceedingly strange non-spatial qualities: it sees round corners, it knows things ahead. How can you explain these things? We must assume that it is something at variance with our world system as well as with our notion of space and time, and therefore there is a possibility of other systems. Modern physicists are playing with this idea; it is not unheard of: namely, a relativity of space which can change under certain conditions. For instance, we assume that we are here together in the same space, but we may not be at all; under a certain aspect I am here, but under another aspect I am perhaps in the same space with somebody in India or China.

Mr. Allemann: It looks as if in India these things were much better known and consciously realized; as Professor Hauer says, there are five different kinds of worlds, five different kinds of Purushas.

Prof. Jung: In Buddhism one gets the vertigo!

Mrs. Fierz: There is a new novel by Mrs. David-Neal called Mipam which is written by her and Lama Yongden. The hero is a so-called tulku, an incarnation, though he does not know it, and he learns all his wisdom from a monk in a monastery whom all the other monks think completely mad. But when he talks to him, he always learns the essential thing. It is just as you say, he is just a husk.<sup>7</sup>

Prof. Jung: Such peculiar things do happen. Not long ago someone told me the most amazing story about a man, apparently a drunken lunatic, who talked to him from another dimension, and everything he described came off. So keep an open mind for these things. But as long as we have no actual experience of other systems and if one is not called to the quest, don't make futile experiments, it doesn't pay.

Mrs. Sigg: It is quite a nice example of Nietzsche that when he was supposed to be entirely mad, he wrote advising the rulers of Bavaria and Baden to retire into private life.

Prof. Jung: It is quite possible that he saw things ahead. In the beginning of the war I was always dreaming of having interviews with Kaiser <sup>7</sup> Alexandra David-Neal (1868-1969) a Frenchwoman who wrote extensively on Tibetan Buddhism. Mipam: The Lama of the Five Wisdoms, written in collaboration with Lama Yongden, her adopted son, was probably known to Jung in its German version (Leipzig, 1928), but was translated into English by Percy Lloyd and Bernard Miel (London, 1938). She traveled to Tibet disguised as a man after meeting the Dalai Lama.

Wilhelm, and I always tried to convince him that he should retire with all his royalties, but he never would listen. We knew each other quite well; when I appeared, he used to wave to me, and I said, "Yes, I am here again and I have to tell you that you should retire!"

Mrs. Whitney: Then it stopped after a while?

Prof. Jung: Oh yes, it was useless, you see. I did not succeed at all. It stopped in the end of 1916.

Mrs. Sigg: Goethe had a very strange experience; his only son, who died in Italy, was buried near the pyramid of Cestius where more than thirty years before, Goethe had written, "I made a design for my burial place near the pyramid of Cestius."

Prof. Jung: He might have given a hint that his son should be buried there.

Mrs. Sigg: But he was not yet married.

Prof. Jung: That does not matter; he had chosen it for his own burial place, not for his son's, but when his son died it was a nice opportunity—happily enough it is my son and not myself! Now we must continue. This chapter about love for one's neighbor is rather preparatory, but there are so many important hints in it that I don't want to go on without discussing them a little more.

Ye cannot endure it with yourselves, and do not love yourselves sufficiently: so ye seek to mislead your neighbour into love, and would fain gild yourselves with his error.

Here he tries to explain an important motive for the love of one's neighbor. Of course the love for one's neighbor is one of the greatest ideals of Christianity, but it became obvious to Nietzsche and to many other people in the later part of the nineteenth century and even before, that these virtues were by no means what they seemed to be. That famous love for the neighbor was very often an excuse for people who wanted to cover up their own tracks; they talked of the love for the neighbor because they wanted to escape themselves, to dodge their own problems. When their own garden was full of weeds so big that they were hanging over the fence into the neighbor's garden, they wanted to be helpful and tell him what to do about it in order to earn the merit of being exceedingly altruistic; they were lazy at home so they tried to improve other people's gardens, to be the schoolmasters of the world. He puts his criticism very drastically, "ye cannot endure . . . yourselves"—that those people cannot stand themselves is the real motive of their interest in their neighbors. As a man once told me, he would become quite melancholic if he were to be one hour a day by himself; he loved the world and his neighbor from seven in the morning to eleven at night, and he would not believe me when I said he ought to spend at least one hour a day alone. He was such a sad creature that he couldn't stand the sight or the smell of himself. You can imagine what such love of the neighbor is worth. It smells evil; such a man only loves the neighbor because he is utterly unable to love anyone in himself. As soon as somebody tells me that he loves me but hates himself, I know all about him; such a love is never convincing. It is all bunk. He only loves me in order to sit on my back and be carried away from himself, nothing but egotism. The interesting fact is that we preach it; we think the great and ideal thing is to love the neighbor and forget about oneself. But the question which Nietzsche raises is "Who is loving?" I want to know first if you can stand yourself. If you can stand yourself, then you might be capable of loving somebody else; otherwise, it is a mere excuse, just a lie. And that cannot be repeated often enough.

Would that ye could not endure it with any kind of near ones, or their neighbours; then would ye have to create your friend and his overflowing heart out of yourselves.

You see, this late Christian ideal of the love for the neighbor naturally leads into a sort of sentimentality: doing the right and good thing to other people, creating a sort of community where everybody takes care of everybody, and nobody takes care of himself. Nietzsche is against that and he proposes that it would be much better if you would create your friend out of yourself. This has of course a double meaning. He says later in this chapter that the friend must be chosen from far away, from those that are the most remote. Now of course, there is little chance of finding the nearest among the furthest, so, as I say, it is ambiguous; it might mean something like the self, or the self projected into a friend, but the friend must be as far away as one is from the self. So it doesn't matter whether it is a friend that is created out of the self, or whether it is the self. You will see in the next chapter that this friend is the self, and that he is man's friend inasmuch as this man is alone; inasmuch as this man projects the self into many friends, the self is never a friend, but is the archenemy. Therefore, those people who love the neighbor and hate themselves, hate themselves on account of the self, for the self then appears to them as the archenemy, a devil with horns and claws and a tail. The self is the very devil to such late Christians.

We can forgive the early Christian when he speaks of the love for the neighbor, because he was quite aware that he did not hate himself. He was taught that he loved himself and he knew it very well. He was aware of his primitive egotism and therefore he was aware of the fact that it was a merit to love the neighbor; he made a merit of it in order to compensate his absolutely naive selfishness, the naive love for himself. Then later on, it was discovered what a cunning loophole that love for the neighbor could be; when things are getting hot for yourself, disagreeable, then you simply love the neighbor and forget all about yourself. So when Nietzsche speaks here of the creation of a friend out of yourself, you can take it that he means creating the self, and for that it is necessary that you are able to endure yourself, that you return to yourself, that you dare to become melancholic in standing yourself, and that you don't use your neighbor for your lust. For it is just lust: you don't want to become melancholic and so you satisfy your lust on other people, doing marvelous things to satisfy yourself at the expense of others.

Ye call in a witness when ye want to speak well of yourselves; and when ye have misled him to think well of you, ye also think well of yourselves.

That means you cannot think well of yourself if you have not a witness, if you have no support, if nobody else tells you that you are right. Or you need a support in order to think somebody else is right or good—somebody must first tell you that that fellow is right. Now is that not miserable? You cannot even give recognition to a dog if you are not supported in your judgment. Well, that is herd psychology.

Not only doth he lie, who speaketh contrary to his knowledge, but more so, he who speaketh contrary to his ignorance. And thus speak ye of yourselves in your intercourse, and belie your neighbour with yourselves.

That is perfectly true. This kind of late Christian love deceives other people, and it deceives yourself; it is a pretext and a means of escape.

Thus saith the fool: "Association with men spoileth the character, especially when one hath none."

The one goeth to his neighbour because he seeketh himself, and the other because he would fain lose himself. Your bad love to yourselves maketh solitude a prison to you.

That is the melancholy condition into which you get when you are with yourself. But if you are so bad that it is a punishment to be with yourself, that would be an excellent reason to improve, to develop a better quality which you could enjoy. One should really be able to enjoy one's own company. But the prophet says one's own company is the worst, and that simply confirms the mob psychology of late Christianity: namely, that the individual is bad and that one should do everything in one's power to escape it in order to put all that evil onto other people—they have to carry it then.

The furthest ones are they who pay for your love to the near ones, and when there are but five of you together, a sixth must always die.

I love not your festivals either, too many actors found I there, and even the spectators often behaved like actors.

Perfectly true.

Not the neighbours do I teach you, but the friend. Let the friend be the festival of the earth to you, and a foretaste of the Superman.

The Superman is surely the self, so the friend appears and plays a certain role only inasmuch as he is the carrier of the symbol. Naturally, the friend, inasmuch as he is real, would be a pre-stage of the complete realization of the Self.

I teach you the friend and his overflowing heart.

That would be yourself and your own overflowing heart.

But you must know how to be a sponge, if one would be loved by overflowing hearts.

You see, you cannot be overflowing if you are empty and black inside; then the love you give to other people is mere desirousness. You are a beggar, yet you think you bring presents in bringing your love to other people. In such a condition you don't give from your abundance; you give from your need, and your need sucks them dry. I don't want five francs from a beggar when I am in need, but I can accept them from the rich man because it then comes from abundance. So the feeling one gets from an overflowing heart is a real treasure, but if it comes out of misery, out of penury, one gets nothing: one has to pay, one is simply vamped by Christian love.

I teach you the friend in whom the world standeth complete, a capsule of the good,—the creating friend, who hath always a complete world to bestow.

This friend is highly symbolical, it is obviously the self.

And as the world unrolled itself for him, so rolleth it together again for him in rings, as the growth of good through evil, as the growth of purpose out of chance.

This passage also shows very clearly that this is the self, the personal and the superpersonal Atman that contracts and unfolds.

Let the future and the furthest be the motive of thy today; in thy friend shalt thou love the Superman as thy motive.

My brethren, I advise you not to neighbour-love—I advise you to furthest love!—

Thus spake Zarathustra.

Obviously, he recommends love for the furthest in order to protect oneself against that easy dodging of oneself that one has offered to other people in the immediate vicinity. If those you love are far away, you have the greatest chance of being alone with yourself in the meantime; you have an incomparable opportunity to become acquainted with yourself and then you make discoveries. The quest is the quest of the self—that is the precious thing which is difficult to attain; that is the hero's fight and you are alone, and even have no weapons. Anybody who is with you at that moment would be in between; the final fight is with yourself, and everything else is—or may be—a hindrance. It may also be that "furthest" may be a stepping stone, a means that is to a certain extent indispensable—but the ultimate criterion is whether you can stand yourself all alone or not.

Mrs. Whitney: Could we assume that this man Nietzsche speaks of is the shadow, and that if the ego and the shadow would get together, the self would be born out of that relationship?

Prof. Jung: From a psychological point of view it would be the shadow, because that would be the precondition for the union with the self; without the realization of the shadow there is no such union. But on account of the identity of Nietzsche with the archetype Zarathustra, he is not aware of the shadow; that is, he is aware of it, yet not in a positive, conscious sense. In a later part of Zarathustra the shadow incarnates in the ugliest man and he rejects him because of his inflation. Anybody who is inflated by an archetype naturally cannot accept the shadow because it would deflate him; yet that deflation is absolutely necessary for individuation. In the chapter we have just dealt with, you see that he is inclined to identify that man with the Superman: he is the foretaste of the Superman. As the Superman is most definitely not a shadow, he is dreaming of a Superman who is a friend of the self, yet without a shadow. But if he should try to identify or unite with the self, he would come across the shadow and it would interfere. When the shadow does interfere later, he does not recognize it. There is the tragedy. For his shadow is the reality of his ordinary self, which would not allow such a union through identification. The archetypal union is of course a union through identification; he is simply identical with the archetype, and then the self is not exactly his own self, but is the archetype expressed through Zarathustra, an old teacher of wisdom who lived about two thousand seven hundred years ago.

Mrs. Sigg: Why does Nietzsche later say that des Übermenschen Schönheit came to him as shadow?

Prof. Jung: We cannot take that so literally; he might use that word without any such psychological connotation as we attribute to it. I cannot remember that particular passage, but it is perfectly certain that what we call "shadow," the inferior man, appears in the form of the ugliest man. We come now to the next chapter, "The Way of the Creating One." What is the logical connection with the chapter before?

Mrs. Crowley: The distant friend, the one we have been discussing as the self, would be the creator.

Prof. Jung: Yes, you see, those nice late Christians assumed that when you don't do it, you must love somebody else and then he will do it.

Mrs. Crowley: But from our point of view it is the self. That is why he is speaking of solitariness.

Prof. Jung: Exactly, and that is the reason he projects it into the friend, hoping that if he loves the friend, he will create for him. But in the subsequent chapter you will see that is another tune. On account of identification with the creative self, he feels himself a creator, and you will see how he experiences the fact of being a creator. You see, it is a great advantage to be able to identify with an archetype. Then you have wings, you are walking on clouds, it is marvelous; yet at times you pay very dearly for such stunts, you have to come down. If you are identical with the creator, if you find yourself to be the creator, you are confronted at times with a terrible fall, with an extraordinary darkness. Nobody is the creator except the self. If you assume the divine prerogative of creation, you will suffer the punishment which is meted out to the creative god: you will be dismembered. That idea was enacted in the mystery of Dionysos, and it has been taken over into Christianity as the creative principle, the seasonal cycle of life, creation in spring and decay in winter. Dionysos undergoes the fate of the creator. He is caught by the Titans, the chaotic powers of nature, and they dismember and devour him; so a part of Dionysos is everywhere in nature, and only his heart, in the nick of time, was rescued from the cooking pot of the Titans. That was swallowed by Zeus who thus gave rebirth to Dionysos. The fate of the creator is dismemberment in matter, and that is also represented in the Christian sacrifice. Christ's body and his blood are distributed to the whole of mankind. As his mantle was divided among the soldiers under the cross, so he is divided among mankind. That is again Dionysos, and the wine we drink as the blood of Christ is Dionysos.

There was such a very close connection with the mystery of Dionysos that the old father of the church, Justin Martyr,<sup>8</sup> said that about 900 B.C. the devil became aware that God was planning to do something for the world which was in a pretty bad condition, and, being very clever, he had a pretty shrewd idea of what it was going to be. So the devil went to humanity and told them the story of Dionysos in order that, when Christ should appear, people could say, "Oh, that is an old story, that is the story of Dionysos." And it is quite an interesting historical fact that when the Spanish Conquistadores came to Yucatan, they found among the remains of the Aztec civilization many crosses and signs of bloody sacrifices. They were amazed to find the Christian symbol all over the country yet nothing was known of Christ by the Aztecs. So they put the case to their bishops, who held a synod and came to the conclusion after long researches, that it was a very similar case to that mentioned by Justin: namely, that the devil had foreseen that the Spanish would discover America, so he went there several centuries before and told those people to make crosses all over the country, so that, when the Spanish came, they could say to them, "Oh we know all about your god; he is nothing new to us." That is the way people think when a thing is new.<sup>9</sup> First, they call it nonsense, and then when several hundred people believe it, they say it is true and they knew it long ago.

<sup>9</sup> One Grijalva, appointed by Velasquez as commander of an expedition to the Yucatan, "was astonished . . . at the sight of large stone crosses, evidently objects of worship." This led to the name "New Spain." William H. Prescott, History of the Conquest of Mexico, ed. John Foster Kirk (Philadelphia, 1873; orig. 1843), vol. I, p. 225.

That is always so. Those are the people who have no judgment, who must always have a support. Only when somebody else tells them a thing is true do they know it, not before. Now we will begin this chapter:

Wouldst thou go into isolation, my brother? Wouldst thou seek the way unto thyself? Tarry yet a little and hearken unto me.

In the last chapter it became more and more visible that the friend was simply the carrier of the symbol, and in this chapter it is quite obvious that the one who is on the quest is really confronted with the self and with the self alone—not with the friend. And if he is concerned with that question, he is solitary and he must be solitary. He will seek the way alone because he has to; nobody else is on the way to himself, only he alone. Now Zarathustra is going to give good advice.

“He who seeketh may easily get lost himself. All isolation is wrong”: so say the herd. And long didst thou belong to the herd.

He calls his attention to the fact that in seeking the self he will be doing that which everybody says is wrong; everybody will say he is an egotist. For they are reminded very disagreeably that if such a way should be recognized, if a dozen other people should consider him right to seek himself, it would be true, and then they must go and seek the self too. This would be very unpleasant and therefore it must be smashed or flattened out in the beginning, trampled into the ground, so that nobody will support him; their great fear is that somebody else will say the same thing. You can stamp out one little fire, but if there are several it is much more difficult. Moreover, not only “they” in reality but “they” in himself, his collective conscience, will say, “Are you not quite wrong? It is not altruistic, you don’t love your neighbor, you don’t forget yourself, you are all the time with your ego and nothing but your ego—and therefore you are wrong.” This is the standpoint of the collective conscience, the conscience of the herd.

The voice of the herd will still echo in thee. And when thou sayest, “I have no longer a conscience in common with you,” then it will be a plaint and a pain.

Lo, that pain itself did the same conscience produce; and the last gleam of that conscience still gloweth on thine affliction.

What is the affliction? How would you formulate that?

Mrs. Lohmann: To be alone.

Prof. Jung: Well, yes, and the disagreeable consequences thereof.

The pain that is caused through loneliness is the affliction, that you feel so miserable when you are all alone with yourself is the last flicker of the herd conscience.

But thou wouldst go the way of thine affliction, which is the way unto thyself? Then show me thine authority and thy strength to do so!

The term affliction means suffering of course, and you can amplify that conception; you can make any kind of affliction enter this frame—for instance, that there are people who are not at all with themselves on account of their herd conscience. They can do nothing for themselves because, with one leg at least, they believe in the late Christian ideal, and with that one leg they walk away into the neighbor's garden; then naturally they become split because the other leg stays at home—they become dissociated. So this affliction can be just as well a state of neurosis. And when the patient decides to take the way to himself, then the doctors and the friends and the newspapers will say he is all wrong—it is quite sickly, morbid. You hear that everywhere. For instance, when a young person comes to a consultation, perhaps the mother or father comes too, and then I regularly hear, "Don't you think that it is dangerous for people to be concerned with themselves?" They are naturally already concerned with themselves, but everybody thinks this is just the sickness, that it is merely egotism; that one can decently be concerned with oneself is absolutely out of the question. To occupy oneself with oneself means that one is wholly indecent and disreputable, quite morbid even. Nobody has any conception that one can do decent reasonable work on oneself; such an idea has become entirely obsolete with us.

For instance, if somebody should ask me what I had done in the last fortnight and I should say I had done work on myself, he would ask, "What do you do—gymnastics?" If I told him what I had done, he would call it plum crazy, absolute bunk—what is the good of it, one cannot sell it, it doesn't apply anywhere. For the thing to which such work applies does not exist; one is nothing. To say I have done work on Mrs. So-and-So is professional: that is all right. Mrs. So-and-So does exist—you can find her in the public telephone book and so you can do work on her—but if I say I am working on myself, I am anonymous, I don't exist. Anybody else can do work on me; for instance, Frau Stutz can, and everybody would believe that she was doing hard work, but if that same lady should say she had done work on herself, nobody would understand it. If not gymnastics, then what could it be? Yet in former times, people were so utterly convinced of the reality of such work on oneself, that whole cities of people withdrew into the wilderness in order to do just that; and there are great religions which make it quite a particular point, like the Buddhists, to work on oneself. But with us it has been stamped out on account of the cowardice of the so-called Christian love for the neighbor. That is an organized cowardice.

Mr. Baumann: But those people in the Middle Ages thought they dealt with God and not with themselves.

Prof. Jung: That was naturally the doctrine, but I couldn't even say that during the last fortnight I had done work with God, nor could Frau Stutz say that; nobody, not even a parson, would understand it. What is work with God or for God? They would assume that she had been in a charity association where she sold pocket-handkerchiefs for the negroes. Now on account of this collective attitude and the utter ignorance of what the self might be—the self meaning the reality of the psyche—people have a very strong collective conscience which makes them quite ill if they try to follow their own way, to be with themselves and to work on themselves. That may amount to a real affliction, an ailment, a neurosis. But if the case is already a neurosis, then any doctor who really understands about these matters would be forced to say, “If the patient wants to be cured he must follow the way of his neurosis”—just the thing everybody is speaking against. People say; “If you have a neurosis keep away from it, travel to India or anywhere else where there is no neurosis, leave your neurosis in Europe, bury it there.” But I should say, “Follow the way of your neurosis; it is the best thing you ever produced, your real value.”

And that is very much what Nietzsche means here. But he questions whether one has the right to choose that way or not, and that is of course one of the major problems. It is by no means sure that one has either the power or the right to go to one's self, because this is a very great and difficult enterprise. As, for instance, the Catholic church may be in doubt whether somebody has the power, the right, or the faculty to be a priest, to live like a priest or a nun. And the way to one's self, the way to one's own affliction, is the hardest, the most difficult way. We really can question, “Has one really the power, the energy, the patience to do it? And also, has one the right to do it?” For you might do it from a wrong motive; you might be really selfish—for example, if you are going to yourself in order to indulge in yourself and not to work. You see, most people don't understand it as indulgence but they make an indulgence of it; they indulge themselves, and then they do not work. You can see that in every detail. It is part of the daily work of the analyst to show people in how far they indulge in their fantasy and in how far they work. Inasmuch as they indulge in their fantasy it leads nowhere. It does not develop. They jump away from it again and again in order to find some new aspect in which they can indulge, and there is no synthesis because there is no work done. It makes a great difference whether you read a book in order to work on it or whether you indulge yourself in it; and there is the same difference with fantasies.

Art thou a new strength and a new authority? A first motion? A self-rolling wheel? Canst thou also compel stars to revolve around thee?

This is a pretty big problem. You see, he expects that the one who is able to go to himself will feel himself a new power and a new right, a thing that never has been before, a primal motion. That would be a thing without history; beginning today, it starts out of nothing. It is a wheel rolling all by itself like the sun. And moreover, he asks whether such a one possesses that power which compels even the stars to circle round him—as if he were a sun. The rolling wheel is very clearly the symbol of the self and the stars rolling about the self would be the Milky Way, the center of the heavens. So Nietzsche would ask here, “Art thou the self? If you are, then you can risk it.” He assumes that one can only risk that way if one is the wheel—only one who is the self could risk that way of being alone. What do you think about this? Is this right?

Mrs. Baumann: No, it shows identification.

Prof. Jung: Nobody in his sound senses could say he had that power, that he was a self-rolling wheel, as nobody could say he possessed the power to make the stars circle round himself. That is impossible, superhuman, divine. So when he asks that question he can only be speaking in terms of an identification with the archetype, which is decidedly dangerous. If he identifies with the God he will be dismembered; when the sun begins to circle he will explode into a million parts and fly off the wheel.

Alas! there is so much lusting for loftiness! There are so many convulsions of the ambitions! Show me that thou art not a lusting and an ambitious one!

Alas! there are so many great thoughts that do nothing more than the bellows: they inflate, and make emptier than ever.

He only needs to apply that thought to his identification, and then things would be right. He has absolutely the right intuition.

Free, dost thou call thyself? Thy ruling thought would I hear of, and not that thou hast escaped from a yoke.

Here he makes a difference between indulgence and accomplishment or work. He doesn't want to hear of freeing oneself. It might be a slave that escaped his chains, or an ox that has forsaken his cart. He has liberated himself, and for what? For nothing, for an indulgence.

Art thou one entitled to escape from a yoke? Many a one hath cast away his final worth when he hath cast away his servitude.

This is a very important statement. You see, people think that they can go to the self in order to escape the yoke, and the late Christian love is quite right when it applies to such people. They are merely egotists who go to themselves in order to dodge something, in order to cheat the world or themselves. In seeking themselves as an indulgence, they have liberated themselves from a servitude which was their destiny. So in whatever situation you find yourself, you have to accept it as a symptom of yourself; your situation is yourself, and if you don't take up your situation as the expression of yourself, then you simply leave it for an indulgence, and then naturally you have lost the values you possessed: namely, your servitude, your connection with humanity, your use for mankind, and also your use for yourself. You know, the difficult entanglement in which everybody lives constitutes the roots of their existence. It is the canal with which they fertilize the soil. If you withdraw from that, if you make for indulgence, you make for a perfectly artificial world in a sort of glass house; you don't touch the soil and there is no fertilization, but merely a sort of code for existence—and you are no longer real. If the self has no real feet in this world, it might just as well be a ghost—it has never been born—and in that case the connection with the self would be absolutely futile indulgence.

Free from what? What doth that matter to Zarathustra? Clearly, however, shall thine eye show unto me: free for what?

Canst thou give unto thyself thy bad and thy good, and set up thy will as a law over thee? Canst thou be judge for thyself, and avenger of thy law?

Terrible is aloneness with the judge and avenger of one's own law. Thus is a star projected into desert space, and into the icy breath of aloneness.

So those people who think that they can escape the servitude to which they are called through fate and through life by indulging in their own ego, are of course wholly mistaken, and they will soon see that they become so unreal that they cannot influence the world. The world doesn't reach them and they are useless—are simply cast out, thrown out on the shores of life. But if you accept your servitude, if you are really entangled in life, then you can produce something, and then you also have the right to your own way. That way can only be trodden if one is willing to accept the fact that you are your own law. Then collective conscience goes by the board, and all those collective ideas. And then the question is, can you stand it? Can you stand that offence against your collective conscience? If you cannot, you had better stay at home. But if you find you can, then you can go further. You might fall into the illusion that you would then have no judge over yourself, no law over yourself, but you will discover that there is no judge in the world and no law book in the world as severe as the one that is set for yourself: you yourself are the law which is severer than any which man has ever invented. But of course one cannot experience that when one doesn't continue on the path, and it is much better not to continue on that path if one cannot stand all the evil consequences that the offence against the collective conscience brings with it.

To-day sufferest thou still from the multitude, thou individual; to-day hast thou still thy courage unabated, and thy hopes.

But one day will the solitude weary thee; one day will thy pride yield, and thy courage quail. Thou wilt one day cry: "I am alone!"

One day wilt thou see no longer thy loftiness, and see too closely thy lowliness; thy sublimity itself will frighten thee as a phantom.
Thou wilt one day cry: "All is false!"

There are feelings which seek to slay the lonesome one; if they do not succeed, then must they themselves die! But art thou capable of it—to be a murderer?

That is the conflict with the collective conscience. If you are able to murder those most understandable, collective feelings, if you can stand the sight of yourself as a murderer and an offender, then you might be strong enough to continue on that path, for then you can stand even a severer law than the one you have destroyed. And it is a matter of that: the law you are going to encounter is worse than any other law. Those who escape into the collective law are much better off—that is much easier, much simpler. As in the world of thought, to think the ordinary thing, the common thing, is quite easy—you have it in the textbooks—but to think the rare thing is exceedingly difficult. It is the same in life, in the type of living, in ethics: it is everywhere the same. A Frenchman once said that those inventors were the most miserable who had invented the new morality. They were all immoral, c’était toujours des immoralistes.<sup>10</sup>

<sup>10</sup> Doubtless Jung was referring to André Gide’s The Immoralist (orig. Paris, 1921). Gide in turn would have known Nietzsche’s claim, “I am the first immoralist” (Ecce Homo, ch. 3, “The Untimely Essays”).

LECTURE VII

27 November 1935

Prof. Jung:

Mrs. Sigg asks about the paragraph, "Canst thou give unto thyself thy bad and thy good and set up thy will as a law over thee? Canst thou be judge for thyself, and avenger of thy law?"

Mrs. Sigg: The judge is clear but not the avenger.

Prof. Jung: The judge and the avenger are very much the same, because the judge is there to avenge the wrong; the law is always an avenger.

Mrs. Sigg: Yes, but Nietzsche has these figures in several different places. In "The Pale Criminal" there is the judge and the criminal, and he sometimes even speaks of Zarathustra as the hangman.

Prof. Jung: Well, if there is a judge there is also an avenger—the judge himself is the avenger. Of course if nothing else happened when the judge passed his judgment, you would not call him an avenger; he would simply have spoken a very inefficient word. To say a man is guilty would mean nothing if there were no avenging power connected with the judge; it is an act of the law and there must be the police and the prison and capital punishment. So the terms are almost synonymous; a judge without efficiency can never carry his sentence into effect. No head will be cut off by a mere sentence, it needs the sword or the guillotine, and that is the avenging act.

Mrs. Sigg: I thought there was a slight difference, as they were two inward figures.

Prof. Jung: Naturally there is a difference; there is the law and there is the carrying out of the sentence. The law in itself is nothing but a breath of air; only when it takes form by execution does it become a fact. The idea of what one is going to do and the doing it are two decidedly different things.

Mrs. Sigg: I know what the judge is.

Prof. Jung: Then you know what the avenger is. You see, if somebody knows he has done wrong, he does not remain with that inner judgment. It will be carried into effect; something is going to happen to him. Only very naive and deeply unconscious people don't know it because they cannot connect facts. For example, you know that you have done something wrong, but you let it pass and think nothing has come of it, and then you think it is funny that you fall downstairs and sprain your ankle, because you don't connect it with the judgment—that you have been sentenced to that punishment. It is just as if the criminal about to be hung were to say, "How funny! What are they doing to me?"—seeing no connection between the murder and the trial and the fact that he is being hung. People have a moment in which they see they have done something wrong but they repress it and forget about it. Then something happens and they cannot make the connection because they have forgotten the first part of the sentence; when the last part comes they are astonished. I have often been asked, when people have had an accident of some kind, how it could have happened out of a blue sky, and then one has all the trouble in the world to find out what happened before in order to explain what has happened afterwards; these accidents don't come out of nothingness. It is causality.

Mrs. Sigg: It is self-punishment.

Prof. Jung: You couldn't even call it self-punishment because you have not inflicted that punishment on yourself; you were merely instrumental. That is just the trouble. In Zarathustra Nietzsche identifies with the judge; he thinks he is his own judge, thereby unfortunately working in favor of the point of view that anybody who speaks of himself is necessarily an individualist. You see, Nietzsche is supposed to be the arch-individualist and the forefather of all individualists; he is ranked with Marx and such people, which is a tremendous mistake. He is not at all an individualist in that sense, because his conception of the self is a perfectly decent idea which really links him up with the whole of mankind. Therefore, he can be appreciated by practically all peoples. But you still hear wherever you go that he preaches individualism, because people cannot make a difference between the self and the ordinary ego; when you speak of the self, they think that you mean the ego. One should be careful not to identify with the judge; one should not speak of self-punishment because one has not chosen the punishment. When you analyse such a case carefully, say an accident, then you see that many circumstances and even many people have collaborated in order to carry out a sentence which you yourself have not passed; you only had a slight feeling of misgiving that something was not quite as it should be. Then on top of that you forget it. It is disagreeable and you put it aside, and then the whole apparatus of the law is in action. Just as the criminal who has stolen something, or committed a fraud or a murder, would like to forget it; he covers up his tracks and disappears and lives in the meantime as if nothing had happened. He returns to settled conditions, to good conduct and even to self-respect; in the meantime the police work more or less feverishly to find out who the criminal is, and finally they get on his track and catch him, and you cannot say that that is self-punishment; surely not: it happens to him. Accidents happen in exactly the same way, and it is really marvelous to see how circumstances and people come from a long distance and meet at just that place in order to carry out the sentence. And you can hardly say that you have arranged it.

Now, the judge and the avenger have usually been projected into God, but to Nietzsche God is dead; there is no such being to function for him. Therefore, he assumes that this judge is himself. He knows that there is a self, but on account of his idea of the Superman and his lack of an idea of a being outside of himself, he is forced to assume that is identical with himself. If he could only be clear about his own conception! For you can be your self—I mean the self of yourself—just as you can be a part of your country, your nation. A German cannot say that he is the whole German nation, that the whole German nation is nothing but himself, as a Swiss cannot say that he is Mother Helvetia or his own canton, but he is most certainly a part of it. So the self is in exactly the same relation to us as the state or the nation is to the individual; it is simply a greater psychological system to which we belong as a part of the whole. And the whole is the judge and the avenger, not the part; the part is the thing that is judged, and the part is the thing that is instrumental in inflicting punishment. Through us a punishment is inflicted.

For instance, it can happen that you are used to punishing somebody else, and it is a great mistake to think that you have inflicted that punishment. Woe unto you if you think that, that comes back on you, because you have carried out your merely instrumental role with a ressentiment<sup>1</sup> and with the assumption that you have the dignity of the judge. You see, it is a pretext and an impertinence for parsons to think they can tell other people where they are wrong and teach them about their sins. That comes back to them with a vengeance, for we are in no way able to judge about the guilt of other people; we are not the avengers, the law of righteousness, because we are always in the wrong too, and if fate, or the judge, uses us for inflicting pain on other people as a punishment, then we ought to excuse ourselves, should ask pardon and leave. We should always be conscious of the fact that we are merely instrumental. I don't know why Nietzsche was not able to realize this quite simple thought of the self's being the total and himself only a part, an atom in the molecule. This is not my original idea of course. I got that formula from the East. Nietzsche unfortunately had not studied Eastern philosophy; that would have been a tremendous help to him there, one can reasonably say. The East is of invaluable importance. During thousands of years master minds have worked out those ideas and we would be foolish not to adopt them inasmuch as we can thereby clarify our own; they must not be taken instead of our own ideas but in order to clarify them. If we lose ourselves in the Eastern ideas, of course we become quite vaporous. Now we will continue:

Hast thou ever known, my brother, the word "disdain" [contempt]? And the anguish of thy justice in being just to those that disdain thee?

Thou forcest many to think differently about thee; that, charge they heavily to thine account. Thou camest nigh unto them, and yet wentest past: for that they never forgive thee.

In these and subsequent paragraphs Nietzsche confesses very important experiences in his own life. He is of course the creative man who had to follow a lonely path, and whoever has to choose such a way will have peculiar experiences which those on the highway with thousands of companions will never have. So when he speaks of contempt or disdain, or of condemning somebody—"the anguish of thy justice"—he is speaking of a specific experience; he says "contempt" in quotation marks, meaning a particular kind of contempt—that contempt which is necessary to distinguish himself from his companions. For if he does not distinguish himself from his companions, how can he choose his own path? He will remain with them; he will be on the same highway. And if he really wants to climb higher he will be several yards above them and must look down upon them. This looking down is what they call "contempt," and to him also it looks like that inasmuch as he is a collective man. You see, the collective man naturally cannot refrain from feeling it as contempt when he looks down upon other people. But that is the thing one must be able to stand inasmuch as one wants to choose one's own way, and inasmuch as one's path leads one higher than the highway. Such a thing is possible when one is creative, and it is a real anguish to one's justice to find oneself with just that problem of looking down; instead of "contempt" you had better call it "looking down." But then looking down is not contempt, although the collective man in you, as the collective man on the highway, will naturally call it "contempt."

You see, people who are a bit more intelligent than the majority always suffer from that prejudice that they are disdainful or looking down upon other people, because the ordinary person naturally feels disregarded if something is said which goes a little beyond his horizon. If they were looking down, it would be in order to give themselves a particular flair: it would really be contempt. They can only understand it as the pride or ambition or fastidiousness of those who say or do something which is out of the ordinary; not understanding it, they can couch it in no other terms. So ambitious people who seek power and prestige cannot understand that a person can do something decent without having that ambition, and they will try to catch him by offering the same sort of thing. For instance, a fellow comes to me and offers me so much money, because he assumes that this is what I am really after. Then if he finds he cannot buy me with money, he thinks he can influence me with honors—that prestige is my ambition—and he puts something under my nose that would attract through the evil instinct of power. He can only explain my difficulty by his miserable idea of power, because the idea that a person would do something for its own sake is not within his scope. He cannot assume, for instance, that I might investigate something, or build up something, just because it is beautiful in itself, he thinks I only do it to impress and blindfold other people, in order to put them in my pocket.

You cannot help feeling contempt for such a psychology—it is contemptible, damn it, and it is very difficult to do justice to those who apply it. "Thou forcest many to think differently about thee." You cannot imagine a worse plight than having to teach people that one has no such motives; they would rather die than believe that one had a decent motive, or such a quixotic motive as to do something for its own sake. They cannot think in terms of processes which are beautiful in themselves, but are always out for something—as if a flower were only beautiful for the insects; it is a perfectly satisfactory explanation to them that its beauty is only to attract insects to fertilize it. They even think that this is a high virtue of the flower. But the real psychology of the flower, I bet you anything, is to be just itself; the sun shines upon the plant and it beautifully unfolds in the air without thinking of getting fertilized. It doesn't think of bees nor yet of scientists!

Yes, it is really a difficult and dangerous task to teach people something new, not only because they charge it heavily against one, but they assume that anything new must necessarily be bad. They say, "We have such good and beautiful things, why anything new? We have the truth and you are a heretic." For the new truth puts out the old truth. If one produces something new in the field of religion, naturally one is in for trouble because religion has always possessed the whole truth and the eternal truth. Unfortunately, there were quite a number who possessed the eternal truth: there must be many eternal truths. For who is the Christian God for instance?<sup>2</sup>—Is it the God of the New Testament, the God of love, or is it the God of the Old Testament who insinuated or suggested such horrible things to those old primitive tribes?

Thou goest beyond them: but the higher thou risest, the smaller doth the eye of envy see thee. Most of all, however, is the flying one hated.

That is perfectly true. One can also put it that the sheep that walks just ahead of the herd is the leader, but if that sheep should perchance have wings, or was able to go a bit faster—if it should walk two hundred yards in front of the herd—then it would be a wolf. So don't follow it. It is too far away. That is dangerous.

"How could ye be just unto me!"—must thou say—"I choose your injustice as my allotted portion."

This is inevitable. If you do or say anything new, you will hurt somebody or something. The old truth which is still there will be restricted or upset, and then you are an evil doer, a criminal.

Injustice and filth cast they at the lonesome one: but, my brother, if thou wouldst be a star, thou must shine for them none the less on that account.

Well, usually the filth cannot be cast high enough to reach the stars.

And be thou on thy guard against the good and just! They would fain crucify those who devise their own virtue—they hate the lonesome ones.

They do, that is perfectly true, because he has forever been a nuisance. You see, when conditions become settled and peaceful, then such a fellow comes along with a new idea and upsets the whole thing. For instance, merchants or craftsmen in the old guilds had a sort of monopoly; nobody disturbed them. Then the new principle of free competition was invented, and they were forced to invent something new or be left behind, so naturally they hated the principle of free competition. But this is and forever has been the principle of the world. Heraclitus said that war was the father of all things, for nothing moves, nothing develops without a struggle; and when a world is full of fighting, it cannot be ruled by love. It is impossible to avoid competition, impossible to have eternal peace, because things then simply come to a standstill, and out of sheer degeneration people will begin a war. So we had better keep on progressing, and then wars will be worth something, while if they come from our degeneration, they mean nothing.

The world cannot be ruled by love: it is an incommensurable principle. If that were possible, it would have been ruled by love long before Christ. For instance, if the teaching of old Pythagoras could have been applied, the world would have been in a marvelously peaceful, wise, and perfect state; we would all be wearing white linen clothes, and we wouldn't eat or drink too much, would be mild in every respect.<sup>2</sup> But the world would have remained where it was six hundred years B.C. That teaching cannot be applied and never was applied. Even when God's son came to earth, they crucified him. And what has Christianity produced? Constant fighting! It started with bloody fighting at the very beginning. A long string of wars and revolutions—that is the history of Christianity. It is full of devils.

"How could ye be just unto me!"—must thou say—"I choose your injustice as my allotted portion." Here Nietzsche accepts the necessary evil of injustice as his portion, his fate—also the filth that is cast at the solitary one. For it is unavoidable that a man with a new idea should not be at one with the world of the good and the righteous. You see, the good and righteous are the people who possess and take care of the established goods; they maintain the order or the good condition of the established truth which has been built up in the past. And these people are exceedingly useful. If they did not exist, nothing good that came into the world would stay for one second, but would instantly vanish again; it is those people who cling to it and take care of it, who maintain the existence of a good for a time, until somebody comes with a better idea. Then they will be against him because he upsets their truth and value. Naturally, they think his idea is immoral and of no value and they will then, as a last resort, cast all the filth they have gathered up in their own unconscious at the one who has the new idea. The good and the righteous are then the worst; when a new idea comes which invalidates or undermines their old idea, they fall into the wrong which they have accumulated through the centuries. Take the good Christian, who is really a very good and nice man within his settled sphere, and tickle him with a new idea: then see what comes out! Like those good shepherds of herds, the benevolent, fat priests of the Middle Ages for instance, with their wine and fish and meat and their rich fields. It was good to dwell with them then because they were peaceful, but they became terrible when their own order was upset. They burned and tortured people in order to defend their own existence. People get bad when their whole existence is threatened.

Of course the mistake is in the good and righteous. Anybody who is good and righteous should say to himself, "I should be very thankful that for so many centuries God has permitted me to belong to the good and righteous people." This is an enormous advantage over those whom he destined to be bad, or to play the role of creators, which is still worse in a way because they are not really bad, but are merely creative. When people who are really bad are punished, they know for what they are punished, and moreover they know that they are really wrong in comparison with the good people, because they hold to the opposite side and don't represent the value. But the man who is creative represents the greatest value that is known in the world, so he is the better man; therefore, to the good and the righteous he is naturally the worst, much worse than the criminal. That is expressed in the Christian mystery where Christ is chosen instead of the criminal Barabbas. (That name also means "the son of the father.") The criminal was allowed to go free and Christ was chosen for the ordeal because he was the better man. You see, the church is exceedingly lenient with the man who is really bad, but not with the better man. To the church, the better man is the worse.

Be on thy guard, also, against holy simplicity! All is unholy to it that is not simple; fain, likewise, would it play with the fire—of the fagot and stake.

To what does he refer here?

Mrs. Jung: Johann Hus.

Prof. Jung: Yes. In about 1400 the Bohemian Protestant reformer Johann Jakob Hus was burned to death in Constance, the nearest German town, at the instigation of the church. And when he was at the stake, he saw that a little old woman was also bringing some wood for the fire and he said, "Oh holy simplicity!"—because she thought she was doing a good work. You see, these holy simpletons are the great power behind the good and the righteous, who are really comparatively few; it is a virtue, an accomplishment, but they only become efficient and dangerous when millions of simpletons are marching behind them. But it is very right that these simpletons should believe in people who are good and righteous, for they might otherwise follow criminals as they did in other times. They marched with the same childlike belief behind devils who led them into hell; then when they had been roasted in hell for a time they thought the good was better, so they changed over. The masses are formidable, exceedingly dangerous, because they really bring the fuel for the stake—it doesn't need to be a real stake of course: there are moral stakes too. Now the worst of all:

And be on thy guard, also, against the assaults of thy love! Too readily doth the recluse reach his hand to any one who meeteth him.

The solitary one is naturally always exposed to illusions because to those people living in deserts for whom there are no human beings, all sorts of specters and phantoms come. And many have the illusion that they are quite ordinary people. You see, a man like Nietzsche naturally assumes that he is an ordinary human being and could live the ordinary life; he assumes that he could be a good friend, for instance, forgetting entirely that his creative demon has stolen away his human life, all his human values, and that he offers nothing to the human being. He needs must be alone. All too easily he forgets this truth and imagines that he really could mean something to those who approach him. But as a matter of fact, he is a disappointment; creative people are usually a disappointment on the human side because the god has taken too much from them. They are victims.

To many a one mayest thou not give thy hand, but only thy paw, and I wish thy paw also to have claws.

Just on account of the fact that so many have paws, you see.

But the worst enemy thou canst meet, wilt thou thyself always be, thou waylayest thyself in caverns and forests.

That solitary man who meets his own illusions, specters and phantoms, in the desert, is naturally waylaying himself. From such a statement one might almost assume that Nietzsche could and should deduce that he himself, the ego, and that fellow who appears to him, are really enemies; they are opposites, yet they are one and the same. Now who is that oneness, the being that is both? You see, that man who is solitary, the ego, is the right hand, and there is also the left hand which is the mirror reflex of the right hand, and the two are fighting. Then where is the whole man, the primordial man? Well, that is really the self, and that is what Nietzsche understands by the Superman.

Thou lonesome one, thou goest the way to thyself! And past thyself and thy seven devils leadeth thy way!

In this sentence he approaches the truth quite closely. He is on the way to the self, not to thyself or to himself, and his way goes past himself and his seven devils. So the lonesome one is also the seven devils—that is his left hand. He is not on the path of the right hand because he is the right hand, and on the way to the self he naturally meets the left hand, which means his own opposition. We call that “the shadow,” and of course it would be a powerful shadow since it is expressed by seven devils; we may conclude that the conscious ego is much too overwrought or inflated when it needs such a contrast in compensation. One finds the same psychology with Luther. When he was planning his reformation, the devil appeared to him, and he threw the inkstand at him; that was his devil. And the same psychological critique could be applied to Christ; when the devil tempted him it was his devil, the power devil. I cannot see why people should be shocked by such a statement. I hope that Christ was a human being, otherwise he is of no use to us. We expect God to do better than we can; to be a model, it must be a man that does better, and he is only man when he meets his own devil. Then he is human. If he were the omnipotent God himself, what would be the merit? Then it would be pretty poor, I must say. But if he was a human being who failed, it is quite understandable because human beings make mistakes; he did what he understood as his best, and he really did something, he even fought his own devils. For a god, it would be nothing. But he was always checked by himself, by his own devil.

A heretic wilt thou be to thyself, and a wizard and a sooth-sayer, and a fool, and a doubter, and a reprobate, and a villain.

Ready must thou be to burn thyself in thine own flame; how couldst thou become new if thou have not first become ashes!

Here he describes what naturally will happen when you really meet your own devil, your own opposite; it will be a fight to death, a conflagration in which nothing remains but a heap of ashes. Of course this statement is a bit too strong, too mythological. It is like the Phoenix that burns itself, together with its nest, the soul and the body, and arises from the ashes anew. Such a total transformation is hardly possible. That is not the myth of the ordinary man, but of the god in man, the primordial man, who was called the anthropos in Neoplatonist philosophy and in those syncretistic religions at the time of Christ.<sup>3</sup> It was on account of that idea of the anthropos that Christ called himself the monogenes, meaning the son of man—that primordial man, not of God. (The monogenes means “the only begotten,” and the autogenes means “the self-begotten.”) This is the anthropos in man, or you can call it the self, and the story of the self is like the Phoenix myth and like this passage here. When man is on the way to himself, he will see his other side, and there will be a tremendous conflict; it will be a conflagration, a flame in which he is burned up.

Nietzsche always foresaw something of that; even in one of his first works the Unzeitgemässe Betrachtungen, there is a peculiar passage: “A spark from the fire of justice fallen into the soul of a seeker will be sufficient to devour his whole life.”<sup>4</sup> That is like the Gnostic myth of the soul, the soul being the spinther (the Greek word for spark) which falls from the pleroma or the empyrean into matter; that spark is the soul of man and if it is touched, there will be a fire. This idea was in the grain of man, and in the philosophy of the time of Christ. There is an apocryphal word of Christ, a logion, which says. “Whoever is near to me is near to the fire and whoever is far away from me is far from the kingdom.” So the kingdom is the kingdom of fire. Christ himself is the flame. That is also expressed in the Pentecostal miracle where the Holy Ghost descends in tongues of fire.<sup>5</sup> And there is an authentic logion of Heraclitus which says: A dry glowing best and wisest soul.<sup>6</sup> You see, it is inevitable that anybody who seeks the self is forced into that fight with the shadow, with the other side of himself, his own negation; and that will be a catastrophe in which the ordinary man is as if destroyed: he becomes ashes. There is again the connection with alchemy here, of course. This conflagration is necessary; otherwise the self as the living unit cannot appear, otherwise it would be obliterated by the continuous fight of the Yea and the Nay. They must exhaust each other in order that we may be still enough to hear the voice of the self and follow the intimation. This is the ordinary way of the religious experience. First it is a Yea and then it is a violent Nay, and then there is a catastrophe and man ceases to exist; then he becomes willing and submits to God. Then it is the will of God that will decide for him. Without that terrible conflict, there is no reality in such an existence. To go into a revival meeting and get caught is no merit.

<sup>3</sup> In early Christian Neoplatonic thought and syncretistic religions, anthropos signified primordial man, Adam. In alchemical writings, the anthropos was represented as whole, completed, and therefore symbolic of the self. See CW 14, pars. 484-97.

<sup>5</sup> “And when the day of Pentecost had come, they were all together in one place. . . . And there appeared to them tongues as of fire distributing themselves” (Acts 2:1-2).

Thou lonesome one, thou goest the way of the creating one: a God wilt thou create for thyself out of thy seven devils.

Here Nietzsche is going to create a god out of his conflict, out of his seven devils. He cannot help seeing what he is doing but he cannot draw the necessary conclusion. It is not he who is creating a god, not the man Nietzsche who declared that God was dead, but the god is creating himself. Like the old Egyptian texts, he is the builder of his own nest, the maker of his own egg;<sup>7</sup> he forms himself upon his own potter's mold. It is the Phoenix myth, and that is what happens in religious experiences, as Master Eckhart has shown very clearly. The godhead in itself is not blissful, but must be born in the soul of man again and again: only then does it become God. Otherwise, man would be of no importance whatever; he would be the most foolish and imperfect invention God ever made. But just because man is man, a restricted something living in three dimensions, in a very small space in the here and now, God is forced to go through that narrow doorway, the gate of man, in order to become God. That is the teaching of Master Eckhart, and that is also the meaning of the Christian mystery, that God first became man and underwent the most miserable fate in order to become God.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>8</sup> "From the very bottom of my heart I say, Man, how can aught afflict thee or be hard to bear when thou considerest that he who yonder subsisted in the form of God and in the day of his eternity and in the glory of the saints, and who before was born in the splendour and substance of God, did enter the prison, the trap of thy sense-nature which is so unclean that aught, however pure, is besmirched and befouled by coming near it, yet notwithstanding this he abode there for thy sake?" (Frans Pfeiffer, Meister Eckhart, tr. C. de B. Evans [London, 1956], p. 145). This symbolized for Jung the act of an individuated person voluntarily sacrificing the larger personality for some aspect thereof. Jung's testimonies to Meister Eckhart are numerous. In one place he credits him with being, in Europe, the first one for whom "the self begins to play a noticeable

And when you look at the God of the Old Testament, you understand that he needed the mystery in order to become human; the terrible demiurgos of the Old Testament became in the New Testament a loving father. Look at what Jahveh did to old man Job, for instance, a perfectly respectable man who worshipped him. Jahveh was betting with the devil as to whether they could blast him or not; God bet that they could not and the devil that they could. And there was no judge above Jahveh, he was a lawless individual—it was not even fair play. That poor little human, Job, was happy with his women and his children, his slaves and his cattle, and then the omnipotent God of the universe first came down and ruined him and then boasted: Look at my power—here is my Behemoth, here is my Leviathan, my two monsters are my lap-dogs, such a fellow am I! I can ruin you completely!—and now worship me again. We have finished our joke, and I will give you back all the cattle and the women.<sup>9</sup> That is the Jahveh of the Old Testament and there are far worse stories. Now, such a God needs rebuilding, and that is the reason he was crucified: it was well deserved after all he had done in the Old Testament. So a punishment was inflicted upon him and he was reformed. Well, that is the world drama: the world is God's own drama.

Thou lonesome one, thou goest the way of the loving one; thou lovest thyself, and on that account despisest thou thyself, as only the loving ones despise.

That he speaks of despising in connection with love would mean, "You are not good enough to me, you could do better."

To create, desireth the loving one, because he despiseth! What knoweth he of love who hath not been obliged to despise just what he loved!

With thy love, go into thine isolation, my brother, and with thy creating; and late only will justice limp after thee.

With my tears, go into thine isolation, my brother. I love him who seeketh to create beyond himself, and thus succumbeth.—

Thus spake Zarathustra.

This succumbing is again a fore-feeling. Nietzsche had this intuition of his end. He felt obviously while writing Zarathustra that it was going to role" (Letters, vol. II, p. 453). Or again: "The act of letting things happen, action through non-action, letting go of oneself, as taught by Meister Eckhart, became for me the key opening the door to the way" (Richard Wilhelm, Secret of the Golden Flower, Jung's Psychological Commentary, CW 11).

finish him, and in fact his disease began soon afterwards. Of course, all sorts of beautiful explanations have been given for that disease as I said last week—that it was not a mental disease, that he was simply removed into a higher state. That may be, we don't know—we cannot see behind the veil of insanity—but to us he perished, and he felt it as a destruction. Whenever you meet such passages in Zarathustra you see that he felt it as a sort of catastrophe. Now why is it just Zarathustra that brings this intuition particularly near to him—such a work more than any other?

Mr. Allemann: Because it was not done by himself but really by his self, by something above him that he identified with.

Prof. Jung: Yes, Zarathustra is really what the self has worked in him, that is true, but why should that be so particularly destructive?

Mr. Allemann: Because he could not understand it. He identified with his work and with the Superman, and he was too small for it. He could not stand it.

Prof. Jung: You would explain it as too great an intensity?

Mr. Allemann: Yes, he got burned.

Prof. Jung: Yes, the book Zarathustra is that conflagration. It is there that the opposites come together, there that the conflict really takes place, and out of that huge conflagration comes the intuition of the Superman. The Superman is the flame, and it naturally eats him up: he himself will be the ashes. Out of himself and his shadow the Superman will be formed, but of course not in the way he expected; the Superman is really the super man, beyond and above man, and that is the self. Man is something that is to be overcome but when he is really overcome, there is no more man. He is in a way the playground of the gods, the place or the form in which the divine drama, the transformation of the god, is enacted. I have often regretted that Nietzsche was so identified with this process, because he would otherwise have been able to give us a very wonderful picture of that great mystery, the transformation of the god. He would probably have produced something which would have enlightened us about the secret aspirations of the old alchemists in the Middle Ages. Their aspiration also was the transformation of the god brought about through man, man being the retort in which the god is transformed, where he descends into uttermost matter and where the spirit develops out of matter again, carrying with itself all the degrees of existence. First it is nothing but a spirit and afterwards it is spirit, body, and soul—spiritus, corpus, et anima. Now we will begin the next chapter on women, old and young. Everybody smiles! How do women come in here? This is a very interesting and intriguing question. Perhaps you know the solution.

Dr. Whitney: I wondered whether this was a woman at all or just his experience of the anima. I think he is really not talking about women in this chapter.

Prof. Jung: Let us hope!

Mrs. Sigg: When St. Anthony went into the desert he had visions of women who tempted him.

Prof. Jung: St. Anthony had quite a time with those phantom women in the desert.

Mrs. Fierz: The end of this last chapter is emotional: "With my tears, go into thine isolation," for instance. An emotional power is now called up, a sort of feeling side, which for him must have a female aspect, as he is just the vehicle.

Prof. Jung: Well, this chapter is rather intuitive. He is describing the way of the one who is creating beyond himself, creating the self or being in the creative process; and he feels that such a thing cannot be without the conflagration of the opposites. Now, the opposite would be here chiefly the side of the human being which is left in the dark whatever that may be—in this case seven devils. But that dark side is usually projected into other people, particularly if it consists of seven devils. If a man, it would be projected into seven women, and if a woman, into seven men. That is at least the naive condition. You see, you cannot really get into a serious conflict with yourself when you are in the Engadine with nothing around but an elderly landlady. Only when the contrast becomes personified do things get hot; a real fire can never burst forth without a personified opposite. The other side must also have body, and because it cannot have your own, it will take somebody else's. If your opposite appears simply as your inner enemy, it is entirely abstract because it has no body: you have your body. And then you may think it is merely your imagination; or you may admit that you have very bad qualities, and confess all your sins with much sentiment before God. But if anybody else should tell you that you had such sins you would swear hell and the devil against it—you would not accept it, particularly not if that person had a hand in your system. So a conflict only becomes real when the other side is projected into somebody. Then it fills a body; then your own opposite is projected into a person who is perhaps forced to play a role in opposition to you.

Usually when a man has an anima transference to a woman, the woman has to more or less play the anima role; or when a woman projects the animus onto a man he is forced to play that role whether he wants to or not, and the less he knows the more he will play the fool. You remember the classical example, The Evil Vineyard by Marie Hay, where the heroine marries the wise old man in her husband, and they are both tremendously disappointed in each other. He does not produce the right kind of wise stuff, so she is frigid; and he is always trying to find out what the devil she can be after until he finds the right answer. Then he shuts her up in the Casa di Ferro near Locarno, a good place to have such a girl, and he eventually tries to murder her.<sup>10</sup> She simply pushed her own opposite, the evil male in herself, into her husband, and he, becoming more and more unconscious, was trying to live what she insinuated into him. Very interesting things often happen in marriages in that way.

I remember an interesting case: A very nice, quite respectable, youngish woman came to consult me, not on account of her own condition but on account of the condition of her husband. She told me he was formerly a nice man, but that now he was always running after the servants. He admitted that it was so, didn't know why he did it, and said he would never dream of doing it again—but again he was after them. I asked whether they had children, and she told me they had one little girl two or three years old, and that this disturbance of her husband first began several months after the birth of the child. They had been married already six or seven years and both of them had always wished for a child, and didn't know why they never had one, so he was overjoyed when a nice little girl was born, and she thought it was very curious that just when they were so happy, he should begin to be so peculiar. I said, "But how did it happen that you suddenly had a child?" And then I saw that somebody was walking over the stage behind her closed lids, so I said, "Now come, how was it?" Whereupon the following story came out: Several doctors had told her there was no reason why she should not have a child, and she became quite depressed about it. So she asked a cousin who was studying medicine if he didn't know a means, and he said, "Well, it is probably your husband, but if you want me to make you a child I can do it." So he made her a child, and her husband was very happy and she too. But then the trouble with her husband began. I said, "Did you never think that what your husband has done was perhaps a consequence of what you have done?" You see, he was naturally trying to find out how that child was made and whether he was really the one at fault, so he had to try, to experiment with the nearest women, though they didn't interest him at all. That is the way she brought about his peculiar behavior, but of course she was not conscious of it. I don't know how this story continued, but it was perfectly obvious. In this way, such things come to pass. Perfectly harmless, nice people become fiends when they receive such a projection from the unconscious of the partner.

Men sometimes have an absolutely fiendish anima that they cannot help projecting, so it concretizes in the wife or another woman; then the woman, inasmuch as she is unconscious, is forced to play that role of devilish impulse, and it leads into all sorts of tragic difficulties. And vice versa. Now, that is the real conflagration—when the opposite appears in another human being. Otherwise, it is merely academical; we can label it and shelve it and the case is finished. But the case only begins when the story becomes somehow real; then there is a real fire, emotional fire, passion, conflict, despair, everything under the sun: it is the flame of life. Only the flame of life burns, not an academical recognition. So when Nietzsche begins to speak in high tones of the divine thing that is to be created, he forgets entirely that when God is going to renew himself, he needs more than one man; and he will usually carry along a great piece of our earth in that conflagration. Therefore, no sooner do you begin to seek your self than you see your own enemy; you draw the enemy near to you. Naturally, to any solitary anchorite, women specters appear: women come up. Now, inasmuch as a woman is quite capable of receiving and performing the anima projection, she is also like the anima; that cannot be denied. There are plenty of women who therefore quite coincide or harmonize with the description man gives of his anima. He never would have such a picture of the woman if no such experiences were to be had. And a woman never would have such an animus if there were no men with whom it was possible to have such an experience. For instance, to give the women an anticipatory consolation before we venture into this chapter, I know an author who discovered his wife reading the book of another man, and he slapped her in the face!

LECTURE VIII

4 December 1935

Prof. Jung:

We had gotten as far as the chapter called “Old and Young Women,” and we decided that it had more to do with the anima; for when the creator is alone, the first thing he meets is of course his unconscious, that is the companion of every solitude. In a man’s case, the unconscious has a feminine quality, personified in the form of what we call the “anima,” and in a woman’s case it takes the masculine form, the “animus.” That is the reason why people don’t like being alone with themselves, it is disagreeable; it is a very clever saying that one’s own society is the worst, for the companion one finds there is naturally all the things one likes to disregard or to keep in the dark. When a man is alone with himself he will be assailed with all sorts of queer feelings and ideas which his anima produces, and the animus does the same thing to a woman. And one is singularly defenceless against such attacks. Now we will see what Zarathustra is confronted with:

“Why stealest thou along so furtively in the twilight, Zarathustra? And what hidest thou so carefully under thy mantle?

Is it a treasure that hath been given thee? Or a child that hath been born thee? Or goest thou thyself on a thief’s errand, thou friend of the evil?”—

Verily, my brother, said Zarathustra, it is a treasure that hath been given me: it is a little truth which I carry.

But it is naughty, like a young child; and if I hold not its mouth, it screameth too loudly.

As I went on my way alone to-day, at the hour when the sun declineth, there met me an old woman, and she spake thus unto my soul:

He is rather precieux about the thing he is concerned with here, which is apparently the outcome of a little rencontre with an old woman. I personally wish it had been a young one—that would have been much better. What does it mean that he meets the old woman when he is alone? What conclusion do you draw?

Mrs. Fierz: That he is too young.

Prof. Jung: Exactly. The rule is that a man dreams of an old anima when he is too young in his own consciousness. That may be for the time being or it may be generally so; certain men are too young for their age by lack of experience, or they are just childish, and then the anima is apt to be very old in order to compensate for the conscious individual. As a woman's animus may be just a very childish boy, full of naughty ideas, because the conscious is too old and wise. Of course that is not always true—there are certain exceptions, the obvious one being the figure of the Puer Aeternus. Now, this rencontre contains a secret. That the meeting with that old woman meant to him something like a little child is a speech metaphor naturally, but it contains more than a mere metaphor; it points to a secret connected with his meeting the anima. What could that child be? It is as if he were a mother himself carrying a child. This is very interesting.

Mrs. Sigg: As Nietzsche himself is nearly always pregnant with thoughts, his anima is with child.

Prof. Jung: Exactly. But why does Zarathustra behave as if he had a child under his mantle? He is not a woman.

Dr. Whitney: He is identical there with the anima.

Prof. Jung: Yes, that is the point. Nietzsche is identified with Zarathustra and naturally also with his anima, because he can only reach Zarathustra through the medium of his anima, that being by definition of the function which connects the conscious with the unconscious. So he is identical with his anima and with the old man and with every other archetype in sight. And since Zarathustra is hiding that child he carries, what kind of child would it be?

Mrs. Fierz: It would be illegitimate.

Prof. Jung: Yes, and where has she gotten that child? Who is the father of the child of the anima?

Prof. Fierz: I should say his unconscious animus.

Prof. Jung: You could say that, but the unconscious animus in a man is a very particular case, a substitute for something else. What is the animus of the anima? This is a problem the Gnostics deal with; here you find the motive of the unknown father.

Mrs. Baynes: Would it not be the wise old man in this case?

Prof. Jung: Yes, if a man realizes the animus of his anima, then the animus is a substitute for the old wise man. You see, his ego is in relation to the unconscious, and the unconscious is personified by a female figure, the anima. But in the unconscious is also a masculine figure, the wise old man. And that figure is in connection with the anima as her animus, because she is a woman. So, one could say the wise old man was in exactly the same position as the animus to a woman.

Now, it may be that the conscious man and the anima are identical; if a man is anima possessed, for instance, he is instantly transformed into a woman. And so inasmuch as the woman is possessed by the animus she becomes naturally a male, but when a man is possessed by his anima, that masculine figure which belongs to the anima is transformed into an animus. A man possessed by his emotions is possessed by his anima, and when he thinks through his emotions it is just as if he were a woman; he talks exactly like a woman and will produce the same animus stuff. A woman, however, produces the animus stuff quite directly, so one can say only men have moods. When a woman has a mood it is because she first has an animus idea or an opinion which naturally suggests a certain emotion, while with a man it works in just the reverse way: first he has a mood and then he has an opinion. One can see it in this: If you tell a man he is in a bad mood he says, "No I am not, decidedly not." And when you say to a woman, But you have an opinion, a prejudice, she replies, "No, I have not"—she has no opinions, none whatever. But if you say she is in a mood, she will admit it. As when one says to a man who is talking out of his emotions that he is uttering such and such an opinion, he cannot help seeing it. A woman cannot help seeing an emotion or a mood, because it is quite obvious to her that she has a certain emotion; while to a man it is not obvious because he hates to admit that emotion. This is of course a bit complicated but if you have a clear idea of the relation of the ego to the animus or the anima, you can easily draw the conclusion as to the nature of the masculine or feminine figure in a man or woman. You see here, Zarathustra proves very clearly his identity with the anima—both Zarathustra and Nietzsche are identical with the anima of course—so naturally Zarathustra at times behaves as if he were a woman. You remember not very long ago we had a passage where Zarathustra spoke of decorating or painting oneself for one's friend, as if he were a woman. Now here he obviously hides an illegitimate pregnancy, his anima is pregnant with certain contents and the father is unknown. And the father must be the old man, who is here the animus. What legend does this suggest?

Mrs. Sigg: Mary.

Prof. Jung: Yes, the myth of Mary, the illegitimate mother made pregnant by the animus. And animus is spirit, the Holy Ghost; therefore his authority is so overwhelming. Then how, according to the old tradition, did that act take place? How was she impregnated?

Prof. Fierz: The angel came to her.

Prof. Jung: But by what way instead of the via naturalis?

Miss Wolff: By the ear.

Prof. Jung: Yes, according to that famous hymn: Quae per aurem concepisti, which means, "Thou that hast conceived by the ear." Buddha was also not conceived in the regular way.<sup>1</sup> So Mary conceived through the ear, she heard the Word, the Word came to her. Now, here the anima has heard something. That is the way an animus opinion comes into existence in a woman: father always used to say, or the uncles said, or the parson or the doctor said, and therefore it is the eternal truth. And in a man's case, it is exactly the same: his anima has heard something, she had an audition, she conceived the Word. So, expressed in Christian symbolism, that passage would be the conceptio immaculata through the Word, and she is pregnant with a savior. Of course we don't know whether this child is really a savior—it might be something else because the case is not clearly Christian. We are quite in doubt what the father means in this case, and also what the child means.

Mrs. Jung: Zarathustra says here that the old woman spoke to his "Seele." Is Seele to be understood as the anima?

Prof. Jung: Well, the word soul would have the traditional meaning to Nietzsche, and the idea of the Christian soul has nothing to do with the anima concept. The Christian soul is understood to be the innermost thing, and it is said to be immortal, the part of one that survives, and so on. The soul can be anything which is covered by the unconscious. While the anima is a specific, empirical concept, it is more like the primitive idea of a soul. The primitives believe that there are several souls, sometimes as many as six. That simply means that it is a psychical complex which is detachable or relatively autonomous—an archetypal constituent—and it is more personal than the Christian idea of the soul, which means completeness, totality, the essence of man. But that is not empirical, but metaphysical and dogmatic; while in the anima concept we have very definite empirical qualities which we can substantiate by evidence. For instance, the anima is an ambiguous kind of person, female, with a sort of immortality; she lives much longer than man, or she has a peculiar adventurous fate, not only here on earth but in the land of the hereafter, as one can read in Rider Haggard and such stories.

The interesting thing here is that this anima has heard the Word, has obviously been impregnated, and we don't know what that child may be, but apparently it is a lively child and it wants to make itself heard. And a child that has been conceived by the Word will be a logos, a word of authority. so Zarathustra, without knowing it, is threatened here with the birth of a child that might cry aloud, and it might say something in a voice which is not his own. You see, that is what Zarathustra risks when he is in solitude without a friend: he will hear voices; while if a friend were there, he would naturally think it was the friend's voice. In this case, he really spoke of being alone, so we must assume that Zarathustra attempted to be alone with himself. Then as he could not put down any voices he might hear to another human being, he would be forced to admit that there was another reality than himself, some other thought than his own. That would of course prove fatal, because it would bring the identity of Nietzsche and Zarathustra to an end; for whether it happened to Nietzsche or to Zarathustra, there would be something outside. Either of them would have to admit that somebody other than himself had spoken. From this we may draw the conclusion that sooner or later something will come out which will cast a very peculiar light upon this identity of Nietzsche and Zarathustra. Now we will see what the old woman has to say:

"Much hath Zarathustra spoken also to us women, but never spake he unto us concerning women."

And I answered her: "Concerning women, one should only talk unto men."

That is, of course, very careful and wise in a way, for when a man speaks of woman to women he usually says something very stupid.

"Talk also unto me of woman," said she; "I am old enough to forget it presently."

Perfectly true. For a man to speak to an older woman is of course much easier, since he can assume that he is meeting a certain amount of experience, and that what he says will not have such consequences as it might with a young woman. So he feels much safer.

And I obliged the old woman and spake thus unto her:

Everything in woman is a riddle, and everything in woman hath one solution—it is called pregnancy.

This is rather a contradiction. If everything in woman is a riddle then surely he cannot say there is only one answer. That exactly characterizes a man's attitude to woman however—of course, inasmuch as he projects his anima: one must add that. But he cannot help it. He always projects his anima when talking to a woman because that is the only way he can reach her; he cannot touch a woman without the anima in between because that is the very system by which he must contact woman. If there is no anima, there is absolutely no contact, no bridge, and inasmuch as his anima is Maya, illusion, the relation between the sexes is illusion. And a woman simply cannot understand a man without the help of the animus, because the man in her enables her to understand the man outside; the less that system plays a role, the less she meets the real man. This only proves how difficult it is to establish a real relation between the sexes. The more you know about it, the more you know it is impossible, or if you have understood it, you are probably at the journey's end. When you have understood that it is all nonsense anyhow, then you have integrated the man and the woman in yourself, and then of course something else begins. So in his very first statement Nietzsche utters the most shocking paradox. It is perfectly true that a man understands nothing of a woman; that every woman is a riddle is the best notion he can start with. But that there is only one answer to what a woman may be means that it is perfectly clear what she is, and this is his other standpoint. That is the way in which he handles the case: it is a man's prejudice, his paradoxical attitude. He understands nothing of woman and so it is perfectly clear what she wants and what she is and what she is for—of course, for child-bearing.

Man is for woman, a means: the purpose is always the child. But what is woman for man?

Two different things wanteth the true man: danger and diversion. Therefore wanteth he woman, as the most dangerous plaything.

This is very clearly the standpoint of a man who is enveloped in his anima; he talks from her point of view only. When he contacts the real woman, immediately his anima is in between; he is behind her smoke screen and sees nothing of the real woman. He hears a voice on the other side of that cloud, but he doesn't understand it—it is all a riddle. Yet it is perfectly plain to him that, whatever it says, it must be just that answer which he has already prepared: "Oh, she just wants a child, that is all." Now, the unfortunate thing is that there are plenty of women who are absolutely true to that role; their very first idea is to have the child of that man, or nothing at all. So, inasmuch as there are such women, and since the anima is the deposit of the age-old experience of man with woman, one can say there is truth in this statement—one can say that obviously the majority of women have told men they wanted to have a child; therefore, he has naturally come to the idea that he is merely a means to the end, and everything else is non-existent.

Miss Wolff: If you don't take the child literally, is there not more truth in it—if you say that the relation of the woman to the man is far more purposeful than the relation of the man to the woman, and he is in that respect a means to an end to her?

Prof. Jung: Well, naturally I remain within Nietzsche's style here when I speak of a child; it is not necessarily a child, but is the purposiveness of a woman's Eros. And that is what a man does not understand at all. Of course, in speaking of a child, Nietzsche is using a drastic kind of language; if he were speaking more psychologically he would say a woman's Eros is purposeful while a man's Eros is playful. The Eros or the function of relatedness in a man's case is not his serious side. His serious side is the mind—he means business with his mind; and there a woman is playful: she talks in order to have talked. When a man talks, he means business; it is always for some definite purpose. He is laying down the law, or making a contract or a statement, or giving an opinion; only an idle man who is possessed by the anima will talk for the sake of talking. But for the woman that is perfectly legitimate, because it is the additional charm in any kind of relationship that she can say what she has to say; if a man does not give that chance to a woman, naturally she feels curtailed, maimed, and the relationship suffers. While to a man the relationship suffers when he has to do just that kind of talking—usually men dislike that form of playfulness; to talk for the sake of talking is like a misuse of something which ought to be businesslike and rational.

Now, when it comes to the Eros it is just the reverse. There a man wants to play and doesn't want to be responsible. He wants Eros for its own sake, and the purpose of Eros is fulfilled in itself. As women like talking around, as their aim is thus fulfilled, so a man's Eros fulfils itself within its own sphere, and then—well, it is just fulfilled and he can go. When wooing and lovemaking have led up to the culmination, a man walks away because his circle is thus completed: he has had what he wanted. But for a woman it is the beginning, not the end, and that is what a man does not understand. Well, one has to learn that as a woman talks in order to have talked, so a man loves because he wants to love; for him it is finished when for a woman it has just begun. Of course that is a source of endless misunderstanding. You see, to a woman relatedness and Eros, which are identical, have purpose—she means business. It is not empty talk about love: On ne badine pas avec l'amour<sup>2</sup> but she really wants to bring about something. Just as a man's mind is not there for what he calls empty talk—just as he means that something should be produced—so a woman means that something should be produced out of relatedness. It is not done in order to have done with it, but in order to bring something about—it may be to breed a child or anything else, but something must come of it.

Of course, the more purposive a woman's Eros is and the more a man sees it, the more he withdraws, because that is not what he means by Eros, not in the least. He doesn't want to spoil his pleasure. As when a woman understands that what she says has consequences, she withdraws, she grows cold; the more serious things become, the more she is afraid of talking: she has seen that people draw conclusions. Perhaps a man says, "You gave me information and I have done such and such a thing, and it is damned nonsense"—and then there is a catastrophe; from that time on she will hold her tongue. So when a man sees the true Eros of a woman, he says, "No, nothing of that kind!" And then women are astonished because they find him completely locked away. He simply gets frightened because she draws conclusions from what was merely a playful merry-go-round. That is a man's love—his idea of it—to begin with at least. It is very awkward indeed, but it is obviously so. I am not its creator, I never would have invented it, so I assume the creator was probably a woman too. A man alone never would invent such a scheme—that is absolutely out of the question you see—to make something serious which is obviously a play.

Man shall be trained for war, and woman for the recreation of the warrior: all else is folly.

Yes! This is true anima stuff.

Too sweet fruits—these the warrior liketh not. Therefore liketh he woman;—bitter is even the sweetest woman.

Better than man doth woman understand children, but man is more childish than woman.

So one could conclude that women should understand a man because, as Nietzsche continues,

In the true man there is a child hidden; it wanteth to play.

But apparently he assumes that this does not appeal very much to a woman; therefore he says:

Up then, ye women, and discover the child in man!

She discovered it long ago unfortunately, as a man discovered long ago what the talk of a woman means; she of course uses all sorts of thoughts but he has to correct even the commas in her letters, or the autograph; he sees only too well where the child lies hidden in a woman—in her mind. And the woman of course sees only too clearly where a man is a boy, sometimes rather inconsiderately; even women of a minor quality can see the boy in a man they admire. When a man believes that he is wholly masculine, a sort of sublime rooster, she can see how ridiculous he is in a way. Zarathustra is quite wrong to admonish women to get up and discover the child in man—she sees it only too well; he rather should admonish them to be a bit more tolerant and more understanding with that child.

A plaything let woman be, pure and fine like the precious stone, illumined with the virtues of a world not yet come.

It would of course be very wonderful if women could transform themselves into that marvelous jewel with which man could play. But that is not so in reality. Nothing comes of it when a woman pulls the wool over a man's eyes and makes him believe that she is a delicate jewel illumined with the virtues of a world that is yet to come; it would take a long time and it is not true. And what would a man do with a woman of a world that is yet to come, a heroine on credit?

Let the beam of a star shine in your love! Let your hope say:
"May I bear the Superman!"

You see, this is all the sentimentality of a man who never has really learned anything about women—that is perfectly obvious. But in that anima stuff there is pregnancy nevertheless, and you can see it here; it is highly sentimental and unbecoming, but if you are not shocked by the sentiment, if you overlook it and go for the ideas or the metaphors in what Nietzsche says here, you will discover the child with which the anima is pregnant.

Mrs. Adler: The jewel is the symbol of the self, and the self was identified with Zarathustra before, but now it seems that the self is identified with the anima in Zarathustra.

Prof. Jung: Zarathustra is identical with the anima, so you can say that Zarathustra under the aspect of the anima is pregnant. But it is the anima that is pregnant, pregnant with the jewel. The jewel being a symbol of the self, the anima is really pregnant with the self, but it is expressed in a rather shocking, sentimental way. Now, the father of that child is the old wise man, and the old wise man is forever the Holy Ghost, as he is forever the initiator, the psychopompos, the great teacher; he is the archetype of all that, so he is the personification of what one would call inspiration. He is the inspiring archetype that holds the secret of the self. In the Christian myth, for instance, it is the Holy Ghost that causes Mary to be pregnant with the Word, the incarnated Logos: Christ who is an anticipation of the self. In the case of Simon Magus and Helena, it takes another form; one might say it was the illegitimate or the immoral form, for Helena has no child. But this is simply the anticipation of the idea that the child is not a real child, but an invisible birth. It is exactly the same, whether it is Simon Magus, or Zarathustra, or any other old wise man that is given rebirth through Helena; she is the mother of the father, as the old man is the father of his mother. Therefore, in Gnosticism the creator was called the father-mother; this is the hermaphroditic creator, the father-mother of the beginning.<sup>3</sup> So it is quite interesting to discover how in the worst kind of sentimentality the symbol lies buried.

You see, sentimentality gets on one's nerves and rightly so; one should be shocked by sentimentality because it is so wrong. It is quite correct when women are shocked by the anima sentimentality of men, for it is just the wrong expression. But that is simply unfortunate; it comes from the fact that there are unconscious mental contents for which there are no conscious forms. They can be couched in no other terms than sentiment. A man is possessed by the anima on account of the fact that his mind does not offer an opportunity to his unconscious. He has no vessel, no form, into which to receive its contents. The anima is pregnant and he is merely sentimental about it. He is like old Joseph, who is a somewhat regrettable figure; he looks at Mary and says, "Oh yes, it is very wonderful that you are pregnant by the Holy Ghost; yes, I will be a patron saint to you. I will help you. I will go with you to Egypt.” But it is a regrettable situation, very awkward; he gets awfully sentimental about it. And that is exactly a man’s situation whose mind does not provide that form, that hermetic vase, in which to receive the contents of his unconscious. In that way, by understanding it, you might become perhaps quite tolerant and lenient with a man’s sentimentality. But he really deserves a spanking nevertheless, and women with instinct will never hesitate to provide it; they cannot help punishing a man for this kind of unreal sentimentality. One cannot take it literally and it should not be taken literally. For a man ought to take his mind seriously and to provide the necessary vase in which to receive those contents of his unconscious.

It is the same with women; it is of course not expressed there in terms of pregnancy, but in masculine terms. It is the logos spermaticos that plays the same role in a woman, the seed word. Her playful mind is not sentimental—well, you know what an animus is, I don’t need to repeat it. It is irritating to a man and he is rightly irritated and is quite right in beating back. Many women need a hiding for their animus. A man’s brutality is always roused by the animus of a woman, but she needs and wants it; her unconscious cannot come to itself if she is not manhandled in a way; that is the reason why the animus drives a man quite mad. But in that wrong form of the animus there is a kernel of truth; there is something for which a woman should find the right form. There is a form, but it is only in her Eros and not in her mind; she cannot make it through her mind, only through her feeling. You see, a woman’s Eros is inspiring to a man provided that it is not animus; if it is animus he beats it back and he is quite right to do so. As a woman is quite right in refusing that slimy, sticky sentimentality a man produces. But that wrongness is pregnant, as the animus is full of seed. Well, Zarathustra continues:

In your love let there be valour! With your love shall ye assail him who inspireth you with fear!

In your love be your honour! Little doth woman understand otherwise about honour. But let this be your honour: always to love more than ye are loved, and never be the second.

You see, he teaches here a sort of Superwoman.

Let man fear woman when she loveth: then maketh she every sacrifice, and everything else she regardeth as worthless.

This doesn’t need any particular comment. There is enough in human experience to substantiate what he says here.

Let man fear woman when she hateth: for man in his innermost soul is merely evil; woman, however, is mean.

Mean is not exactly the right word for schlecht—base would render it better.

Prof. Fierz: Doesn't he mean böse, like a tiger?

Prof. Jung: Schlecht has also the connotation of corrupt, not only evil but on top of that, corrupt.<sup>4</sup>

Miss Taylor: Vile?

Prof. Jung: Yes, that would about cover it.

Whom hateth woman most?—Thus spake the iron to the loadstone: "I hate thee most, because thou attractest, but art too weak to draw unto thee."

The happiness of man is, "I will." The happiness of woman is, "He will."

That is of course the way the anima sees it, the anima being that cloud which veils a man's eyes; he only sees woman inasmuch as he is affected by her. He does not see into her. You see, he says here that woman's happiness is "He will"; but a woman's happiness is also "I will"—only she does not say so. It is the way of the purposeful Eros to say "He will" instead of "I will," but that is a suggestion: "Don't you want . . . ?" The purposefulness of a woman's Eros suggests it in such a way that the man is caught by the illusion that he really wants the thing; he doesn't want it probably, but she suggests it exactly like a clever saleswoman who can envelop her client to such an extent that he believes he wants it and buys it. That is what a man doesn't see. He really believes that the woman is happy that he wants it; in his selfishness and blind egotism he is only happy when he can fulfil his own will, and he does not see that she is fulfilling her own will too. If he meets the same woman at another moment, or perhaps another woman in the same circumstances, and her purpose doesn't coincide with his, then he will learn a lesson and he will be deeply disappointed. And again he will say, "Oh, you never can understand women!"

"Lo! now hath the world become perfect!"—Thus thinketh every woman when she obeyeth with all her love.

Obey, must the woman, and find a depth for her surface. Surface, is woman's soul, a mobile, stormy film on shallow water.

Yes, that is the unfortunate misunderstanding between men and women; a man doesn't understand that a woman's business is love, as his mind is a man's business. And a woman makes the same mistake in thinking that a man's mind is for itself, but to a man his mind is no end in itself: he uses it for certain purposes. So love, as a man understands it, is a sort of carousal in heaven, but that is not so with a woman and she would be a damned fool if she assumed that this was or should be her love. Her love is just as purposive as a man's mind; she is reasonable, she wants to do business with her Eros, and a man naturally hates to see that. Of course, women would be stupid if they let it be visible to a man. If you want to do real business you must not let it be seen or people will become mistrustful; a clever salesman does not show his hand.

Man's soul, however, is deep, its current gusheth in subterranean caverns: . . .

Yes, that is the mistake a man always makes; he sees a woman as his anima, the foam tossed to and fro on shallow water; but he feels no certainty because there is something behind his anima that has depths. When he projects his anima, he naturally only touches an illusory surface of the woman and does not see that a woman's purpose is at least as deep as his own. This form of the anima is again a metaphor which seems to have its history; you know, Venus or Aphrodite is the aphro-geneia, the one that is born out of the foam. Well, if he had had one serious love affair he would have discovered something about women, about the subterranean caverns, and he would have marvelled.

woman surmiseth its force, but comprehendeth it not.—

This is just anima talk. The anima always tries to convince a man of his extraordinary depths and what a hell of a fellow he is, in order to envelop or entangle him in as many foolish love affairs as she possibly can—the more the better. You see, since he is such a man of power and God knows what, he naturally assumes that he is a sort of savior to all sorts of women, and the more he gets entangled, the more the anima has free play. So he can never establish a real relation to a woman; he never can make roots in the world. He is simply a fool caught in his own cage and driven around by his anima that has become like those women in circuses who go around with a whip; she keeps him going but in a state of complete unreality. And when the anima has that quality, she forms such a thick cloud round a man's consciousness that he cannot individuate. He is entangled in his own superstitious ideas about himself and cannot pierce the cloud of illusion, so he doesn't touch reality at all. He remains unborn—doesn't come out into the world, really, to see the light of day. He is always chasing butterflies and doesn't see that he is chasing round in his own cage. It is better that a man doesn't think that a woman has divined his power, because there is nothing to be divined; he is an ordinary human being and it is much better that he considers his power very limited. Surely, women don't understand men in certain respects—as men don't understand women—because they don't take the necessary trouble to do so, and that is of course tragic.

But the difficulty of understanding does not lie where people who have no experience assume. It is rather the difficulty of understanding oneself. If a man could only understand the difference between himself and his anima, he would understand himself; then he would know what a man is and then he would know by instinct what a woman is. If he thinks via the anima about himself he never will discover himself, but stay caught in illusions. And inasmuch as a woman does not know herself—and if she thinks through her animus she certainly does not know herself—she will never know a man, will be forever bewildered. Naturally she will project her opinion upon a man: he ought to be this and that. So the real difficulty is not in the object, where such blindfolded people always suppose the darkness to be. A man thinks the difficulty is that he doesn't understand the woman; no, he doesn't understand himself. Whenever one has to treat such a condition, the whole course of the analysis, as dictated by dreams, always leads the patient to himself; and if they can once understand something of themselves, they will understand other people. One cannot learn it through the object because one invariably sees only one's own face in the object; one stares into the cloud and it becomes a mirror reflex. It is finally one's own face. It is a general truth that one can only understand anything inasmuch as one understands oneself.

Then answered the old woman: "Many fine things hath Zarathustra said, . . ."

She is still a clever old thing, not unlearned; she is playing the game because naturally she is his anima devil.

"especially for those who are young enough for them."

She is playing up: Of course I know I am quite old but older women understand men so much better, they have experience, naturally the poor man is not understood by such young geese, but older women have a heart for men and understand their needs. She is playing up to him as if she were young. And he licks it up!

“Strange! Zarathustra knoweth little about women, and yet he is right about them.”

Just because he knows so little of them!

“Doth this happen, because with women nothing is impossible?”

“And now accept a little truth by way of thanks! I am old enough for it!

“Swaddle it up and hold its mouth: . . .”

Don’t be indiscreet and tell it to everybody.

“otherwise it will scream too loudly, the little truth.”

“Give me, woman, thy little truth!” said I. And thus spake the old woman:

“Thou goest to women? Do not forget thy whip!”—

Thus spake Zarathustra.

You see, if Zarathustra were really wise he would say, “Isn’t she a clever old thing to play up to me like a true woman? And doesn’t she lie like anything, giving me good advice and making believe that she understands me much better than I do myself? Remember thy whip when you go to such women, or, when you go to your anima remember your whip.” That is what a man never knows and it is the first thing he has to learn in analysis: Remember thy whip. But the whip is for his anima and not for women, not even if they deserve it—though if he knows how to use it, it might be very good for a woman, as it is good for a man to be kicked sometimes. He first must learn to whip his anima, however. Of course this is a much quoted passage; men like it. They lick it up like anything. But they make the mistake of trying to escape their anima. As women try to escape the animus by locking it in a certain man and making him the bête noire, instead of putting up with their own animus and saying, “Oh, here is the hellish beast, not over there.” And naturally a man, being human, tries to find that woman whom he can accuse of spoiling nature and being the cause of all evil, for then he knows where the devil is. That woman is the devil incarnate has been an organized truth for two thousand years; man invented the wonderful story that the serpent in Paradise was the woman and that she was influenced by the devil, the two being pretty much the same. This idea was valid throughout the whole Middle Ages and we are still under its spell; a woman represents something so utterly different from man that naturally all her moral principles—everything except coarse facts—are absolutely different. So a man's world instantly becomes relative when he admits that a woman's standpoint is valid too, and he gets into the most frightful turmoil and confusion. The whole evil of the world has been called the work of the woman, meaning the work of the devil. They are equal.

Now since there is such a historical prejudice, one has to protest against this passage in Nietzsche; it is apparently again applied here to women, and it seems as if it had been suggested by that old woman—who is of course also Nietzsche. That is not preposterous, I know women who play the game to such an extent that they would even tell a man that certain women deserved the whip. You see, that whole passage is couched in such terms that one cannot help thinking that this is really what is meant, that Zarathustra or Nietzsche is of the conviction that you can only deal with women when you don't forget your whip. But the truth is that the whole thing is symbolic, which of course Nietzsche himself has not seen. That oldish woman is his anima who is just playing the game like any old woman—old Eve. The eternal Eve is playing her role in himself, and when it comes to her, he should remember the whip; he should discriminate between his ideas and the ideas of that woman demon he harbors.

Miss Wolff: This chapter opens in an unusual way with a question put to Zarathustra, and I think no other chapter does. And afterwards Zarathustra seems to be putting a question, but that cannot be because he is quite alone where he is hiding this secret thing under his coat. So perhaps we have to find out who is really addressing him.

Prof. Jung: Whom do you suppose? Who is the nearest?

Miss Wolff: He says "my brother."

Prof. Jung: Yes, but the supposition from the former chapter is that he is in solitude, that nobody else is there. Yet apparently he is two again.

Miss Wolff: It would be Nietzsche's own voice then.

Prof. Jung: Yes, he is asking himself. That is according to the rule. He says: Da wurde eins zu zwei, und Zarathustra ging an mir vorbei.<sup>5</sup> When he is alone Zarathustra appears as his second person. So one notices that, with that Zarathustra element in him, Nietzsche is very secretive. He walks about in a funny way and seems to be concealing something. It is just as though he were asking himself why he was stealing along so furtively. But unfortunately he never takes it seriously enough; he forgets all his science and his criticism when it comes to his own psychology. It is a funny thing that people who have a most psychological and discriminating attitude in dealing with the psychology of primitives, say, or perhaps the psychology of other people, forget everything when it comes to themselves. They forget every virtue and become as vicious as other people. For instance, those people who have that Christian interest in their neighbor indulge in no end of kindness, in spite of being told that the fellow they are taking care of is perhaps just a cheat, not worth all their consideration; yet when they should apply that kindness to themselves, they have no mercy. Then they are just as hard as steel, cruel—and think that is a virtue. But it is no virtue. It is a vice. They create a desert in themselves. And so Nietzsche, being exceedingly psychological and discriminating in his other writings, when it comes to himself is not critical. He forgets all about it. He should say, “Now who is there alone? Am I alone? Is Zarathustra alone?” Then he would instantly see that he is not alone: there is always that second one, that friend, with him. The creative man wants to be alone, ought to be alone, and when he discovers that he is two he should be serious about it and say, “Now, old man, what are you doing? You are hiding something.” Then he would have objectivity. If once only he could have a decent discussion with Zarathustra and ask him about his secret psychology, he would discover that Zarathustra also is two, that he consists of a man and a woman. And then he would have the whole game, the whole drama. Of course we cannot expect that of a man who lived in a time when such things were out of the question. I only mention it in order to bring the thing up to date.

Miss Wolff: Since Nietzsche could not do that, might not this be like the voice of the dreamer you told us about in Ascona, who had such an objective voice in his dreams?<sup>6</sup> He might have a sort of innermost psychological consciousness that calls his attention to the fact that he is the friend of the evil doers. That is quite logical because formerly he said he was going to meet his seven devils. Now he is with seven devils and the first appearance of the evil doers is this child he hides, and then the old woman.

Prof. Jung: I quite agree. You know, Nietzsche at his mental best was really a discriminating psychologist and when he is truly at his best he represents himself, his own self; in that which he does out of his most individual substance, the self appears. So we could say just as well that this is the impersonal voice of the self, that his intellectual or philosophic or psychological consciousness begins to manifest here. We shall have many situations where it comes in, so that one really marvels that he never could grasp it; for instance, in this jewel, and the star, and later on in the chapter about the adder, it comes so close that one would almost expect him to be able to realize it. Yet he does not; it was not of his time. Of course we fall down somewhere else; we make this discrimination now but we omit something else. And we never shall become perfect—happily not!

Mrs. Baynes: He tells this chapter in the past tense, so I thought that the child he carried in his arms was the truth the old woman gave him.

Prof. Jung: Well, it would be hardly worthwhile for Zarathustra to make such a fuss about that, like an old spinster, perfectly ridiculous. One sees that the woman is cheating, and what Zarathustra says here is not particularly wise; moreover it has often been said before; one can read very similar things in Schopenhauer.

Mrs. Baynes: Yes; but inasmuch as he knew so little of woman he probably thought it was the last word of wisdom, so it would be legitimate to take it that he thought it was a great truth.

Prof. Jung: You are quite right; on the surface that is so. But you see, though this whole chapter really contains some very profound things, they are under the disguise of wrong ideas and sentiments. So I would say, yes, in a way what the old woman whispered to him would be the child he is hiding, but there is more in that child. For instance, if he had realized that this woman who speaks to him is really another voice, that she is not only his invention, he would have been able to lay his hand on the treasure hidden behind that phantasmagoria.

Mrs. Jung: You said that the anima was pregnant with the Superman and that the father was the Holy Ghost. I should like to know what is the role of the individual? It seems to me that nothing is born if it is left to archetypes only.

Prof. Jung: Well, the individual of course has the heaviest burden in this case because he is the living carrier of all those figures. You see, the living individual has to carry the anima that is pregnant. He is really the Joseph in the whole show, the means by which the thing becomes real. The individual is the human being in space and time, in the here and now, who has to make that inner drama real. And that is the great trouble. For instance, the man Jesus suffered miserably for the divine drama that was enacted in him. That is the role of the individual—bad enough!

Prof. Fierz: I should like to point out that the foregoing chapter deals with the brother, and in the preceding one he is speaking to his brethren; he seems to have concentrated more and more on one person, and in the chapter we are discussing, even he disappears and the anima appears. It is as if she were emanating through these chapters; it goes more and more away from collectivity and then she appears.

Prof. Jung: That is necessary; otherwise she could not appear.

Prof. Fierz: It is quite logical.

Prof. Jung: Oh yes, it is concentrating upon himself. It should come to that head, otherwise nothing would be realized.

Mrs. Crowley: I think in this chapter the secret was the wisdom of the serpent, or the serpent attitude of understanding, and in the next chapter the serpent appears.

Prof. Jung: Yes, that was already in the air.

LECTURE IX

11 December 1935

Prof. Jung:

Mrs. Baumann has brought us a picture of St. John, which is quite remarkable because he is represented with a little angel girl behind his back, who is probably whispering into his ear that famous secret. We come now to the chapter called "The Bite of the Adder." What is the connection—always keeping in mind that we have here a logical series of images?

Mrs. Crowley: It is via the anima problem.

Mrs. Fierz: Eve being connected with the snake.

Prof. Jung: Yes, the anima is represented as woman above and serpent below, as the serpent in Paradise is often represented with a woman's head; the snake element is always connected with the anima problem. And why is that?

Mrs. Crowley: There is the chthonic quality, the association with the earth, and the snake also has the prophetic and divine quality.

Mrs. Fierz: It is the symbol for the emotional system, the lower nervous system.

Prof. Jung: For the lower nervous system, and of course that may become visible through emotion but it is not necessarily emotional. So one could say the snake was chosen for its external appearance and for its characteristic qualities in general. It is a coldblooded animal with a non-human psychology; one can establish a sort of rappport with almost any warmblooded animal but with snakes there is no parallel feeling. It is peculiarly strange to human psychology. Its brain is very little developed, chiefly consisting of sense organs and their nervous appendages; the main body of its nervous system is the cerebrospinal prolongation, the lower central motor centers, and then the whole spinal cord. The case is still worse with the saurians, those so-called dragons which can be referred back to the dinosaurs; man was not a witness of the earliest saurians, but he was very probably a contemporary of the dinosaurs, and so had the engrammata, the racial memories of dinosaur or dragons. And they were characterized by an almost non-existent brain since the accumulation of nervous matter in the spinal cord was much greater than the brain; in the lumbar region there was an intumescence, an accumulation of nervous matter, which surpassed the brain considerably in size. That shows very clearly for what the dragon or snake stands.

The word dragon comes from the Latin drako and the Greek drakon, meaning snake; it is the same word. (In German, Wurm and snake are the same; and the dragon is the Lindwurm, lind being originally a Celtic word which meant "soft, flowing like water." The name of our river Limmat comes from lind, and the upper part of the river is called the Linth. And there is a Roman inscription found near the lake of Thun in Switzerland which says the inhabitants of the regio Lindensis, meaning the Lind region, devote this altar to the gods; the Lind being the water region, they were inhabitants of the lake. The German town Lindau on Lake Constance comes from that same root, lind.) The dragon is a water worm, and dragons are always supposed to live near the water or in the rivers, brooks, and so on. Another connection is the fact that a river meanders exactly as a snake moves. Also the Chinese Tao is of the nature of water—it moves like a snake—and the original idea of the Tao was a feminine goddess that was a serpent. So the serpent and the river are essentially the same because they are analogous; for to the primitive mind things that are analogous, or of analogous use to man, are supposed to be substantially the same.

Whenever the snake symbolism appears in dreams, then, it is always representative of the lower motor centers of the brain and of the spinal cord, and our fear of snakes denotes that we are not fully in tune with our instinctive lower centers; they still contain a threat to us. This comes from the fact that our consciousness, having a certain amount of real freedom of will, can deviate from the inexorable laws of nature which govern man, from our own laws which are organically formed in the structure of the lower brain surface. Inasmuch as we have ethical freedom we can deviate but we do it with fear; we have a certain idea that something untoward will happen to us because we are instinctively aware of the power of those lower centers. Since they are connected with the sympathetic nervous system which rules all the important centers of our bodies—digestion, inner secretions, the functioning of the liver and kidneys and so on—a serious deviation means upsetting the functioning of those nervous systems and we eventually risk a grave disturbance in our glandular organs or in our blood circulation. A certain thought can arouse your heart so that it beats faster; it can produce such an acceleration that there may even be a sort of hypertrophy of the heart. These disturbances can go as far as to cause diabetes, or skin diseases; or it can cause such a lowering of self defence through the blood that one becomes open to all kinds of infection. One of the most psychogenic diseases is angina, a disease of the heart. Of course you can say I am a psychotherapist and therefore think that everything is psychical, but you also hear these facts from specialists on internal diseases; many people have the idea that those diseases are of psychical origin. So this lower nervous system is a constant threat, a sword of Damocles, and we are—and we ought to be—instinctively careful, always a bit afraid lest we might deviate too far.

Those people who are completely identical with consciousness are often so unaware of the body that the head walks away with them, so they lose control of the body and anything can happen to it: the whole system becomes upset. The brain should be in harmony with the lower nervous system; our consciousness should be in practically the same tune or rhythm. Otherwise, I am quite convinced that under particularly unfavorable conditions one can be killed. Whenever you have an argument with yourself, whenever you are making a decision, in order to be far-reaching enough you should consider the reaction of the serpent, of the lower brain centers; nothing can be decided definitely, nothing can be definitely argued if that answer is overlooked. One should always wait for the answer. Those people are wise who say: "It seems to me one could decide in such and such a way, but I want to sleep on it." For in sleep, consciousness is extinct and there you have a chance to become acquainted with the reaction of the serpent. Certain negroes, for instance, would say they must discuss a matter first with their serpent; they try to find out whether what they are going to do is really built upon the pattern, the fantasies, of the laws of nature. So it is very characteristic that after the chapter where the anima has a lot to say, we should have a chapter where the snake turns up. And that is why the anima is represented as a woman above and snake below; there is a Latin verse about it, not exactly a snake in this case but another coldblooded animal, a fish: Desinit in piscem mulier formosa superne, which means that the woman who is beautiful above ends with a fish's tail. You see, that symbolism comes from the fact that the anima is a semihuman function on one side; through her head she denotes that she has connection with human consciousness, but below she extends into the spinal cord and into the body.

Our unconscious is surely located in the body, and you mustn't think this a contradiction to the statement I usually make, that the collective unconscious is everywhere; for if you could put yourself into your sympathetic system, you would know what sympathy is—you would understand why the nervous system is called sympathetic. You would then feel that you were in everything; you would not feel yourself as an isolated being, would not experience the world and life as your own private experience—as we most certainly do inasmuch as we are conscious persons. In the sympathetic nervous system you would experience not as a person but as mankind, or even as belonging to the animal kingdom; you would experience nothing in particular, but the whole phenomena of life as if it were one. Of course you can only get hints of such an experience, as, for example, you experience the mood of a crowd or of a place as if you were in everything that constitutes the situation; you feel the mood of everybody and swing into it together with the crowd. That would illustrate it to a small degree. Also on account of the possibility of such extension you must necessarily assume that such awareness would be without time. You would need time in order to transfer your head consciousness to a distance and into everybody, while the kind of perception in the sympathetic system needs no time; it is at the same time everywhere. But you see, this collective unconscious, in spite of its being everywhere, or in spite of its universal awareness, is located in the body; the sympathetic nervous system of the body is the organ by which you have the possibility of such awareness; therefore you can say the collective unconscious is in the lower centers of the brain and the spinal cord and the sympathetic system. Speaking accurately, this is the organ by which you experience the collective unconscious, which means as if there were nothing but you and the world—whether you are the world, or extend over the whole world, or the whole world is in you, is all the same.

And that is the secret of the anima, human on the one side and that most paradoxical and incomprehensible thing on the other. On the one side she is an inferior woman with all the bad qualities of a merely biological woman, an intriguing and plotting devil who always tries to entangle a man and make a perfect fool of him; yet she winds up with that snake's tail, with that peculiar insight and awareness. She is a psychopompos, and leads you into the understanding of the collective unconscious just by the way of the fool. So wherever you touch upon that anima business you will have a paradoxical picture and Nietzsche was careful enough to divide these two aspects into two chapters instead of being suspicious already in the first chapter as to whether this was not one of the famous tricks played by the anima on man. But apparently the idea did not come to him that this was a trick of the little old woman; he may get it in this chapter however, for here the snake bites. Here we shall have the reaction to the unconscious, to what Zarathustra said in the chapter before.

One day had Zarathustra fallen asleep under a fig-tree, owing to the heat, with his arms over his face.

Why just the fig tree?

Prof. Reichstein: It is a mother symbol, or at least a very old female symbol.

Prof. Jung: Yes, it is a nourishing tree like an apple tree, which is often considered to be of a feminine nature; the fig is nourishing food. But that is not the thing which sticks out in the history of the fig tree.

Mrs. Baumann: Christ spoke of the tree which did not bear any figs; the fig tree was made to have figs and it had none.

Prof. Jung: Yes, he was particularly angry with that tree; it got under his skin somewhere and he cursed it in an absolutely un-Christlike fashion.

Mr. Allemann: There is the connection with the serpent in Paradise and the tree of life. And Adam and Eve wore fig leaves.

Prof. Jung: The fig tree and the fig leaf have played their peculiar role since very remote times.

Princess von Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen: I have heard that in Arabia the fig meant the womb.

Prof. Jung: Yes, it has an erotic significance. Have you any evidence for that?

Mrs. Crowley: Well, sometimes the Greek statues used fig leaves as sort of garments.

Prof. Jung: The fact that they chose fig leaves to cover certain parts was by no means out of the way; to any somewhat obscene fantasy the fig leaf is quite obviously representative of the male organ. Moreover, fig wood has always been used for the images of Priapus which the peasants put up in the fields for scarecrows, but it was also to fertilize the fields. I don't know whether that was true in Egypt where they still have those Priapi. I saw one near Luxor and you surely have seen them too. They are phallic figures which are supposed to fertilize the fields. And the Romans, instead of putting up stones to mark the boundary lines of fields or estates, put up figures of Priapus which served several purposes at the same time. They marked the boundary lines, served as scarecrows, and as fertilizers of the fields. They were always represented with huge phalli. The fig tree was supposed to be of a phallic nature on account of its leaves, and figs have a certain resemblance to a womb; also they contain the seed inside, supposed to be the eggs. The pomegranate was also a symbol of the fertile womb.

Now, when the fig tree turns up here and Zarathustra goes to sleep under it, it means that an archetype is mobilized within him which affects him like a narcotic. That is typical; when you get into a situation where an archetype becomes constellated, you will undergo this peculiar hypnotic effect: you fall asleep rather suddenly. It has a peculiar fascination which makes you unconscious. And people who constellate an archetype have such a hypnotic effect. Of course there are people who just bore you, and one couldn't say a particular archetype of boredom was constellated—I don't mean those very normal effects which naturally begin to work after a certain time. If you are at a particularly boring lecture, for instance, after a while you will fall asleep. I mean those rather sudden losses of libido which you definitely feel; the primitive would say you had lost a soul and have therefore gone underground. Now this archetype of the fig tree has been brought out by the talk Zarathustra had before. How can you explain the fact that this particular archetype became thereby constellated?

Mrs. Fierz: He said many things about women but he never touched upon the real magic charm that they have on a man in an erotic way; and the anima also has an erotic quality which was not spoken of.

Prof. Jung: Yes, and he omitted entirely to mention the fact that he himself was under the spell. One is always under the spell of the anima and of the woman, but one dislikes to admit it because one wants to keep up the illusion of freedom and independence. So one pushes the fact of woman as far away as possible. You see, he spoke in a very lofty way in the chapter before—when you go to women don't forget the whip and so on—without paying attention to the possibility that the woman may also not have forgotten the whip. That would be a pretty awkward situation. He behaves as if he were entirely beyond the problem and talks about it from a height of twelve thousand feet, quite disregarding the real facts, and therefore he constellates the archetype. For when one is so high, naturally something will come from below to tell him that there are other facts which should be taken into consideration. So he falls asleep; he is pulled down into the unconscious to the other fact, which is a woman. And it was hot. Now where does the heat come from?

Mrs. Schevill: From his own libido.

Prof. Jung: Yes, naturally; he sinks down into the hot world. And where does that begin?

Mrs. Baumann: In the sympathetic region.

Prof. Jung: Yes, or it would be the manipura center; that is the fiery region where things become hot. It means the hot blood, it is the so-called alchemical oven in the abdomen, the kitchen, the laboratory where things are transformed, the stomach. He sinks down into his own underworld and is fascinated by the archetype of sexuality. And he covered his face with his arms. What does that gesture denote?

Dr. Whitney: He is trying to protect his consciousness, is he not?

Prof. Jung: It might be a gesture of protection, or what would it more probably be?

Mr. Allemann: Introversion. He shuts out the outside world.

Prof. Jung: Yes, he sinks down into himself and covers his face in order not to see. In order to sleep you seek naturally a dark place or cover your eyes in order not to be made conscious by the light.

And there came an adder and bit him in the neck, so that Zarathustra screamed with pain.

In his unconscious the serpent comes up and bites him. What does a snake bite mean?

Mrs. Schevill: In America it generally means that the snake is protecting itself; the rattlesnake, for instance, bites to protect itself.

Prof. Jung: Oh yes, looked at from the point of view of the animal it is what one calls the Angstbeissen;<sup>1</sup> most snakes only bite from fear and for self-protection. The African mamba, the cobra in India, and in the West Indies the fer-de-lance are exceptions: those three snakes attack on sight. They even seek their victim. But the snake bite is a well-known symbol. Do you know a parallel?

Miss Wolff: The Egyptian myth of Ra.

Prof. Jung: Yes, when Ra, the sun god, the king of the two Egypts, was making his way over the heavens, Mother Isis had prepared a worm for him, a sand viper which lives buried in the sand, a particularly ugly beast; only its nose sticks out and it bites whoever walks over it. So the sun god was bitten, and then all the gods came together and begged Mother Isis to remove the poison from his system, which she did, but Ra was definitely weakened. Now this is very much like that very ancient Egyptian myth which has been believed through so many thousands of years because it is a very great truth, one of the great psychological truths expressed in mythology. You see, the sun god is a hero man, the typical man with high ambitious plans, but he is at variance with his anima; she doesn't want such aloofness, but wants to have him close to the earth, she doesn't like his distance from the lower centers. So she prepares a trap into which he invariably falls, thus losing all his divinity, which is of course a rather painful loss to a man; it sometimes means losing all his best qualities. It is a dangerous catastrophe when a man falls into a trap laid by the anima. To be caught by the heel is the usual fate of a man. Crush the head of the serpent and it will bite you in the heel. This is a regular occurrence and it can finish a man's career, his hopes, or even his life. Or it may also be the way to wisdom, if he is intelligent enough to make the right use of it. Well, whether one avoids the trap very sagely or whether one falls into it is pretty much the same thing; in either case he is poisoned, that is the awful thing, and therefore it is expressed in a myth. Now Nietzsche or Zarathustra would be very much in that predicament; he talked in a very high style, walked over the heavens, and then down he comes with a crash.

When he had taken his arm from his face he looked at the serpent; and then did it recognize the eyes of Zarathustra, wriggled awkwardly, and tried to get away. "Not at all," said Zarathustra, "as yet hast thou not received my thanks! Thou has awakened me in time; my journey is yet long." "Thy journey is short," said the adder, sadly; "my poison is fatal." Zarathustra smiled. "When did ever a dragon die of a serpent's poison?"—said he. "But take thy poison back! Thou art not rich enough to present it to me." Then fell the adder again on his neck, and licked his wound.

Isn't that a wonderful miracle!

Mrs. Fierz: But is it not queer that it is the neck that is bitten? It should be the foot.

Prof. Jung: Yes, and why is it the throat?

Mrs. Fierz: The throat is the center of speech.

Mrs. Crowley: The logos.

Prof. Jung: Well, he was sky-walking in his speech, so it has to do with words; his feet were not on the ground. The same motif comes again later where the serpent tries to crawl into the shepherd's throat, and he is advised to bite off its head. So we must assume that the throat region is the active organ. In how far is that true?

Mrs. Sigg: When Nietzsche wrote this part of Zarathustra he had just had five months of daily discussions with Lou Salomé.

Prof. Jung: Ah, there he met the serpent, that is quite certain. But it happens here to Zarathustra, and why was he bitten just in the throat?

Miss Welsh: Because he was always preaching.

Prof. Jung: Yes, Thus Spake Zarathustra; you see, he did not act, he spoke. Zarathustra is very obviously the logos, and you cannot reach the logos with the feet because it has none; you can only reach it by the throat where the word comes from. Expressed in the Tantric system it would be in the visuddha center that he was bitten, not in muladhara, because he is located on a much higher plane. So it might lame his speech, as, if bitten in the feet, his legs would be first paralysed. Obviously the purpose of the serpent in the case of Zarathustra himself and of the shepherd, is to get at the speech center, to lame his talk. It is through his talk that he has attracted the serpent, for it is through his talk that he walks over the heavens like a sun god. Now Zarathustra looks at the serpent and the serpent obviously becomes quite uncomfortable. Can you explain this peculiar phenomenon?

Miss Wolff: It almost looks as if the snake, if it had known that it was Zarathustra, would not have bitten him.

Prof. Jung: Probably, if the snake had been informed beforehand. But why should the snake not bite Zarathustra? There is a particular justification for this passage.

Miss Wolff: It may be Zarathustra's own snake; he has a snake and an eagle, so if it had recognized him it would not have done it.

Prof. Jung: Yes, but he says, "When did ever a dragon die of a serpent's poison?" He identifies with the serpent—he himself is the serpent—and he assumes that when one serpent bites another it would not be poisonous. As a matter of fact that is not quite true; serpents do die from the poison of their own species even, but that doesn't matter. Because Zarathustra is of the same nature as the snake, its poison here doesn't injure him. And in how far is Zarathustra of the same nature?

Mrs. Crowley: He is the hero, and the hero is supposed to be a snake.

Prof. Jung: Yes, he is supposed to have a serpent's soul. The justification for this idea is found chiefly in Greek mythology. Those two old heroes Cecrops and Erechtheus were supposed to be half human and half serpent; they were legendary kings of Athens, and Cecrops was the founder of the Acropolis. Also it was thought in ancient Greece that the souls of heroes actually took the form of serpents that lived in the grave, so they used to sacrifice to the soul-serpent through an opening on top of the tomb. And one finds very often the belief with primitives that the first animal seen near the grave of the diseased contains the soul of the dead man—the first snake or toad or beetle or whatever it is that appears is supposed to be the carrier of his soul. In East Africa they generally assume that souls appear in the form of serpents, and whenever a serpent enters a hut the people clear out, not from fear, for they could kill it, but out of sheer politeness; they say an ancestral spirit has honored their hut with his visit and so they leave the hut for its use. They even leave food for it, and then when it has gone, they use the hut again for ordinary purposes. So souls are very often identified with snakes.

Now, we have seen that the anima is a serpent and here we see that Zarathustra holds that he is a dragon and therefore invulnerable to the bite of the snake. And the snake itself seems to be quite uncomfortable; it is wriggling under the eye of Zarathustra who, being a hero, has snake's eyes. According to the Northern myth, the hero has the magic eye of the extraordinary individual whose soul is a serpent;<sup>2</sup> a hero soul does not yield to the ordinary difficulties of the human being. If a fellow is a hero he has a different kind of soul, is impenetrable, inaccessible to human considerations; the ordinary human being is afraid. He doesn't dare to go there, but the hero says, "I am not afraid, I go there," so his soul is cold like the soul of a serpent. He is not human inside but a divine animal. And so Zarathustra explains here that he is not in the least impressed by that snakebite because he belongs to the same species. Now, in how far does he belong to the same species?

Dr. Whitney: Insofar as he is an archetype.

Prof. Jung: Yes, he is of the same kind as the anima. The old wise man represents the wisdom of the serpent, as the anima represents its movement and cunning; there is really very little difference between the old wise man and the anima and therefore the two are so often together, as in the myth of Simon Magus and Helena, and in the idea of the Sibylla or the Somnambule and the wise man. They are near relatives. Therefore, Zarathustra is not injured. It would be a different thing if Nietzsche himself had been bitten, but he is so thoroughly transformed into Zarathustra that he thinks he is Zarathustra and that therefore the snake cannot reach him. You see, that is the illusory protection which identification with an archetype gives you; you assume that nothing can reach you because you are of the same nature, but in reality you are poisoned and you cannot explain the evil effect. You notice that you suffer from an apparently inexplicable ailment, but you don't trace it back to the snakebite because you are convinced that it hasn't hurt you in the least; another archetype cannot hurt you—it is just a sham fight. But unfortunately, terrible destruction takes place in the body and one cannot establish a causality. So whenever a man is identical with an archetypal figure, he naturally thinks that certain things won't bite him; or if they should he assumes it to be the bite of a gnat, not even a decent mosquito. He thinks he is not injured and if things become queer or entirely wrong afterwards, it is for every reason under the sun but it has no connection with anything that happened before. Of course I quite realize that the idea of being identical with an archetype is a somewhat unpopular statement; we usually cannot see when we are in that condition. It is one of the most invisible experiences we can have, and in analysis it often takes a very long time until one can make people see in how far they are living archetypes. That comes from the fact that it is still a sort of ideal to be identical with archetypes: we are taught to be so.

For instance, the whole teaching of the Catholic church, the imitatio Christi, which is also valid for many Protestants, is the instruction on how to be identical with the archetype. The Oxford Movement is a training to that end: put all your sins and responsibility on Christ, give your life to him. A man who is supposed to be one of the leaders told me that they confess and throw all their burdens upon Christ and he takes care of them; they haven't to decide, but are quite identical with Christ. "You say you are identical with Christ?" I said. "Yes, or you can say with God, or with the Group." "Oh, the Group is God and you are the Group—you are God? Well, I have treated such people." But he did not grasp it. The only difference between that man and one who says "I am Jesus Christ since a fortnight ago" is that one is collectively acknowledged and the other is not. If a man says he is Jesus Christ you tell him he is a fool and belongs in a clinic. But if a man says he throws his whole load on Christ to take care of, it is considered marvelous; he preaches it and confesses it and nobody has any doubts about its being right. But nothing could be more wrong, for by making himself identical with an archetype he has a hell of an inflation, though he calls it modesty or humility. With all their humbleness, those people are impertinent and inflated. It is exceedingly useful to have such a big bird with whom to identify; he can carry you over a long stretch, over many abysses, but it has to be paid for. To identify with a suffering God is no small business. Something is going to happen to you. You cannot have all the advantages of an inflation and no disadvantages. That the god has all the human disadvantages, and you all the advantages of a god, is not possible, and it will cost very dearly in the end. We can see that, but we are not accustomed to put the evil of the world down to the account of our ideal. For the time, this identification with archetypes is still an ideal; we are educated to it, are praised for it, so why develop a critique about it? Therefore, it is one of the most difficult things to make people see, even people who know about them; it is so difficult that it can happen to oneself. One has to hold on to oneself every day in order not to be carried away by an archetype because human life is built on that system. Archetypes are full of energy. They are human forms of life, have a tremendous attraction, and they grip one again and again if one doesn't look out. So when one speaks of such an identification, as a matter of fact one usually doesn't know exactly of what one is speaking. Of course it sounds as if one understood, but in reality it is exceedingly difficult to see where one is identical, and even in the safest case one should always be suspicious and careful.

Now, in Nietzsche's case he is not only carelessly identical, but is enthusiastically identical with the archetype of the Logos: he lives his words. Therefore, his words are tremendously exuberant; his blood is in it, all his sexuality is in it, and that is of course a marvelous feeling. Then you are redeemed, apparently; you are flying away with your head and your head is travelling through the universe, but the body is left behind and suffers the torture of the god, because somebody has to pay for such a tremendous advantage. You see, Nietzsche does not realize here that something is happening to him; he only sees that nothing is happening to Zarathustra—naturally the archetype would be perfectly safe. People who are identical with an archetype can apparently stand any amount: they seem invulnerable, beyond human reach. They can do the most extraordinary things. And they don't see that somebody is going to pay for it. It is impossible to get away from the laws under which we are born; somebody has to pay, either the man himself or his surroundings. His life will be curtailed somewhere.

Dr. Escher: There is a book by Gerhard Hauptmann, The Fool in Christ, which contains a description of such an identification with an archetype. It also shows how that man behaved in his surroundings and what his effect upon his surroundings was.<sup>3</sup>

Dr. Adler: When Christ was tempted by the devil to cast himself down from the pinnacle of the temple, would it have meant an identification with the archetype if he had done so?

Prof. Jung: Well, not necessarily. That would be the demand of the depths to come down, which of course would mean disidentification from the archetype. You see, "I and the Father are one"<sup>4</sup> is the identification with the Father, and if he casts himself down—a thing which we are taught to understand as the greatest evil because it is a temptation of the devil—that could also be understood as casting himself out of the archetype. To us the temptation is diabolical because it contains the great truth. We are taught that Satan tempted the Lord to cast himself down from the pinnacle of the temple, but one could say just as well that the serpent or the devil was that darkness behind man which invites him to jump down from superhuman heights, to come down to the level of the ordinary being living in the here and now, disidentified from eternal images. You see, about 90 percent of all the idealistic people in the world believe that to be identified with the archetype is right; you find yourself in opposition to a whole world when you assert the opposite. Now are there any questions concerning this snakebite?

<sup>3</sup> In The Fool in Christ (1910) Gerhard Hauptmann described the attempt of a man to maintain a mystical attitude in a materialistic world.

Mrs. Baumann: I thought the fact that the snake was healing the wound, taking the poison away, made another parallel with Isis.

Prof. Jung: Quite so.

Mrs. Crowley: And I thought it had something to do with the prophetic and oracular powers, because snakes are always supposed to be oracular. Also it might have to do with Nietzsche's sickness.

Prof. Jung: You are quite right. All these peculiar events which we are encountering have something to do with his impending fate: the rope-dancer, for instance, and throwing the stone that fell back upon him, and the shepherd and the serpent—symbolizing the initiation that went wrong—and then here the bite of the adder which failed to poison him. But then of course, the effect will be elsewhere and he disconnects his physiological or pathological condition from his mental problem. It is as if the book Zarathustra were a world in itself, and the physical reality of Nietzsche were in quite another world; the two worlds don't touch each other, and each has its causality in itself. In such a case of course, people produce theories that they have eaten something wrong, or taken the wrong sleeping draught, or the climate is wrong, instead of making the connection between the mental and the physiological conditions. Nietzsche always treats his neurosis as if his mind had nothing whatever to do with his body.

Prof. Fierz: He says at the end of this passage, "Then fell the adder again on his neck, and licked his wound." I cannot imagine a snake doing that; that is a female, a human being.

Prof. Jung: She must have arms to do it! It probably has to do with the very feminine nature of the serpent, because it is always through a woman that the serpent reaches a man, as it was in Paradise.

When Zarathustra once told this to his disciples they asked him: "And what, O Zarathustra, is the moral of thy story?" And Zarathustra answered them thus:

The destroyer of morality, the good and just call me: my story is immoral.

What about this most astounding statement? How on earth does he land in the problem of morality? Of course, he asks what is the moral of the story, but that can hardly be made responsible for the "morality" that comes afterwards; it would be a mere sound association. In the latter part of Zarathustra, when he is tired, he begins to produce sound association, but here I would not assume it. What is the connection here?

Mrs. Crowley: With the serpent.

Prof. Jung: Yes, but do you see any other connection? Nietzsche is apparently not aware here of the serpent in Paradise that tempted man to understand more about good and evil. The serpent seems to play an entirely different role; there must be a different connection. I want to find out what is in the mind of Nietzsche himself.

Mrs. Jung: I think Zarathustra is not aware of the moral of the incident with the snake.

Prof. Jung: That is perfectly true; he is surely not aware what the story really means.

Mrs. Fierz: But it is immoral from his human point of view if he identifies with Zarathustra and cannot face his own reality. So when he says his story is immoral he is simply telling his own truth.

Prof. Jung: Yes, that is the way we see it, but I want to reconstruct the way in which he sees that. You see, they ask him what is the meaning of this story and he tells them, "The destroyer of morality, the good and the just call me . . ." Now in how far can he see himself as the destroyer of morality in this connection?

Mrs. Fierz: In so far as he is a dragon.

Prof. Jung: Exactly. You see, the dragon is of the serpent nature, and the serpent in Paradise persuaded the first parents to disobey, to do the evil thing. And he, being of the same nature as the serpent, is also such a fellow; he persuades people to do the wrong thing. We shall presently see that. He says:

When, however, ye have an enemy, then return him not good for evil: for that would abash him. But prove that he hath done something good to you.

And rather be angry than abash any one! And when ye are cursed, it pleaseth me not that ye should then desire to bless. Rather curse a little also!

If wrong has been done you, you should answer by wrong.

And should a great injustice befall you, then do quickly five small ones besides. Hideous to behold is he on whom injustice presseth alone.

Out of sheer regard to your fellow being, you should not be marvelously forgiving about it when you have been offended, you should pay with five little wrongs. To pay with a big wrong would put you into the most disadvantageous situation vis à vis your enemy, so five little ones would be sufficient. You see, that is what everybody does: one retaliates in kind but not in the same kind. This is the immoral advice, for we are taught that we must return good for evil. But he says nothing of the sort; he says to retaliate in the same kind, but in a mitigated way in order to spare your enemy.

Mrs. Jung: It seems to me that he preaches exactly the contrary to what he has been doing to the snake; he has been very superior to the snake. He did not retaliate with five little wrongs.

Prof. Jung: Well, one could explain that by the fact that he was not particularly injured and so was able to show himself in a very superior position. It is the point of the story that Zarathustra, though wounded—he “screamed with pain”—was not really injured because he also was a serpent; he would not be a semidivine being if he were hurt by that snake.

Mrs. Sigg: It is the reverse of Christ's Sermon on the Mount. In every word, he says the contrary to what Christ said, and in many other places also.

Prof. Jung: There is surely something of the Sermon on the Mount in it; it is unavoidable, for that is the Christian teaching: any one who invents a new kind of morality must discuss the situation with the Sermon on the Mount. So he naturally gets into that somewhat biblical style.

Did ye ever know this? Shared injustice is half justice. And he who can bear it, shall take the injustice upon himself!

A small revenge is humaner than no revenge at all. And if the punishment be not also a right and an honour to the transgressor,

I do not like your punishing.

You see, there is great truth in what he says. It is always much more human to be offended when one is cursed; otherwise, where has the anger gone? Where is it harbored? And if the offence has been repeated several times, the angry reaction must be stored somewhere if it is not let out openly, and then there is a festering wound; even if the conscious is most Christian and behaves perfectly, that anger is stored somewhere. Anything that has happened does exist; it is a fact. It may seem as if one could stand any amount of offence with nothing remaining, but you see, such a person is no longer a human being—he just disappears. As long as a man is really in life, an offence counts; it rankles and it is stored somewhere. I have seen people who have received real ill treatment and they are not improved in their character; usually they are bad. Children who have received bad treatment only get out of it by repeating it. Whatever the father or the mother have done to you will be lived out with the people you live with; if you marry, you will live out that wrong received. And you see practically the same thing in analysis. I usually get it then: a woman who has had a bad father or mother will put it upon my head; even against her will, even if she wants to be good, it does not help at all, because then it is indirect and it comes from all sides. I prefer a frontal attack. I can deal more easily with it. You see, that wrong is in their system and they will get it out. People even seek victims upon whom they can revenge their wrong; perhaps they do not even know of it, but the more they are unconscious of it, the more it is effective. For instance, children who have been left or betrayed by the mother will take their revenge most certainly.

I know a case of a child, the son in a family of religious fanatics who believed that if you didn't eat you would become a spirit. So they starved their two little children. The little girl died and the parents were accused of murder; the son, who was two years old, was saved in the nick of time. Later on, I knew that man and I knew his story, and he was the most terrible rascal. He was chased by a continuous hunger which of course did not show in eating but in aesthetic aspirations. He did the most extraordinary things, was utterly unreliable. Once he should have gone to an important meeting—it was his responsibility to be there—but it was a beautiful day, the train was passing a wood with bright red and yellow autumn coloring, and he thought, "How beautiful!" and at the next station left the train and did not go to the meeting. His whole life was like that. The fellow wrote a book, a guide to perfect pleasure in life or something of the sort. That man was chased by an eternal hunger, and the wrong that had been done to him was revenged upon the people who came into contact with him, and spoiled his whole life. It is really a fact that any wrong one has received cannot be gotten out of the system unless it is paid by wrong.

This passage is also very important as applied to the theory of punishment by law. An offender has a right to be punished, and if we are too human or reasonable about it, we deprive him of the punishment he naturally expects. When I was a boy I always preferred the teachers who got angry and gave me a good hiding rather than those who forgave me. We have the theory that punishment ought to be administered for the moral improvement of the culprit, or that it should be a mere measure of prevention. But such theories are quite inhuman; it is only human when you punish the criminal for the fact that he has given offence. That you are angry with that fellow and beat him up is what human nature understands; that is the real basis for any code of laws. These humanitarian theories are all bunk: punishment is only straight and real when it comes from the feeling of man. It is entirely a feeling retaliation, and that of course is a very dark underground current. When a man does something wrong, you are usually envious because you also want to do something wrong. You are not human if you don't. It would be a pleasure. Here is a hell of a fellow who has killed somebody, and you get him in the neck—he must be killed too—and so you share his crime and are even with him. And you both walk away, one to eternity, and the other to his office—and either way it is the same.

LECTURE I

22 January 1936

Prof. Jung:

We have a question by Mr. Allemann: "In the last seminar you said that according to Analytical Psychology, Jesus was wrong when the tempter put him on the top of the temple not to jump down and so come into contact with the earth. Does this opinion take into account the fact that Jesus quite deliberately and consciously had rejected 'this world' and that he said that 'his kingdom was not of this world'? Would he not have left his own way if he had accepted the suggestion of the tempter? And would this not have been wrong also from the point of view of Analytical Psychology?"

Well, it all depends upon what aspect of Jesus we were speaking of. That is the trouble. You see, Jesus is such a symbolical figure that one cannot help mixing it up with one's own psychology. If we take him as a historical figure, sure enough he could not have acted differently; he had to be himself and naturally he rejected the world and the flesh. It would have been utterly wrong to cast himself down from the top of the temple; and it would have been a terrible nonsense because it is quite certain that anybody tempted by the devil to do such a thing would be smashed up: the devil makes promises only in order to destroy one. But if we speak of Jesus as a symbolical figure, a god or a symbol that has actual importance, then of course the situation is quite different, because then the devil belongs to the game and the world cannot be excluded. We have learned that it does not do to exclude the world, and moreover it is impossible; even those people who preach the exclusion of the world, the suppression of the flesh and so on, are unable to do it. It is a lie, an illusion. That kind of solution doesn't work; we no longer believe in it. So the idea or the figure of a savior must now be something or somebody who is acquainted with the life of the earth, and accepts the life of the earth. A young man who hasn't yet lived and experienced the world, who hasn't even married or had a profession, cannot possibly be a model of how to live. If all men should imitate Christ, walking about and talking wisely and doing nothing at all, sometimes getting an ass somewhere in order to have a ride, it just wouldn't do; such people would nowadays land in the lunatic asylum. It is impossible for such a figure now to be a model or a solution or an answer. We shall soon come to a passage where Nietzsche says that Jesus died too early, when he was still a young man not having had experience of life. So to us he is a symbol. And inasmuch as Jesus is supposed to be the key, the real clavis hermetica, by which the gates of the great problems and secrets are unlocked, then the world and the devil cannot be excluded—nothing can be excluded. Then we must ask the symbol Jesus: "Now, would it not be better if you cast yourself down, if you would once try the earth and find out what the devil means by playing such a funny role? Is there not something quite reasonable in what he proposes? Should you not be closer to the earth perhaps and less in the air?" Of course, that is no longer the historical Jesus; to talk to Jesus like that means that you are surely no longer a Christian, but a philosopher arguing with Christ; as soon as Christ becomes a real symbol you are a philosopher, for Christianity has then come to an end. In Christianity, Christ is an entity, with substance; he is a historical figure first of all, and then he is a dogmatic figure. He is one third of God and nothing can be said about him.

Mrs. Sigg: I don't know whether we are so sure that what the Evangelists narrate is absolutely true; they might have omitted something in the real life of Christ.

Prof. Jung: Well, how can we judge it? We don't know whether the report is reliable because we cannot check it up. The only source is the Evangelical account and we have no means of comparison, so we cannot say whether it is really historically satisfactory or not.

Mrs. Sigg: We are not so sure whether he did not try the earth in some way; there is room for a little hope.

Prof. Jung: We know of nothing and his teaching doesn't point that way. The only thing we know is his baptism by John—nothing else, except that scene in the temple when he was a boy.

Mr. Allemann: Is it not curious that the founders of the two greatest religions both rejected the world? Buddha did the same thing.

Prof. Jung: Quite. It is an astonishing fact, but Buddha doesn't reject it to the same extent. He recognizes it more in that he acknowledges the necessity of a long development. The Christian attitude is far more resentful; the world is denied as sinful. The Buddhistic attitude is less so; of course, Buddha's ultimate attitude is just negative, but he agrees more with the world in accepting it as an illusion.

Miss Wolff: Buddha's life began when Christ's ended; he was about thirty years of age and had been in the world. He had married and had a child even, and his teaching was that a man ought to live first; only in the second half of life was he allowed to "retire."

Mrs. Crowley: Could you not say from the psychological point of view that the idea of the hermit, of isolating yourself or negating the world, was projected in order to find the world within—in other words, to individuate? Would that not be the real inner purpose in having rejected the world?

Prof. Jung: That would be very obvious in Buddhism, but not in Christianity.

Mrs. Crowley: But I mean from the angle of Christ, not as later Christianity taught; in his own attitude he was rejecting the world as it was at that time. He was rejecting the literal reality.

Prof. Jung: If you speak of the historical Jesus, that is true.

Mrs. Crowley: Yes, for we were speaking of the historical Buddha.

Prof. Jung: Ah yes, but Buddha's life was far more historical; it was not a drama. Buddha really lived a human life. He did not come to an end at thirty-three, but lived to be an old man. That of course makes a tremendous difference.

Prof. Fierz: In the first part of the Gospel, Jesus waits for the Messiah, not knowing whether he himself is the Messiah. If the disciples ask him, he forbids them to ask the question, and then he sends them out to say the Messiah will come. But he does not come, and it seems as if he then changed his mind and decided not to wait for a king from this world but from another world. There is a certain change in his teaching. When nothing comes he goes back to himself, and the final gospel is perhaps the result of the disappointment, a disillusion; he breaks down and then he dies. I think there is much to be said for that, except in St. John.

Prof. Jung: There are several places in the Gospel where one can see that disappointment but the Synoptic Gospels contain a good deal of historical truth about Jesus while the Gospel of St. John is entirely philosophical. There he is a symbol. Of course we get then an entirely different picture of the Christ, there he is really the God, not human.

Now we will go on to the next chapter, "Child and Marriage." In this last chapter there was the story of the snake that bit Zarathustra, and you remember that this rencontre between Zarathustra and the snake had the meaning that Zarathustra, being the Logos more or less, a mind only, had linked up with the serpent; or that the serpent, representing the lower nervous centers, the instinctive world, had linked up with him. The snake would represent the body, and with that a certain element of instinctiveness comes into the situation. Of course Zarathustra is always identical with Nietzsche; he is never clearly differentiated, and so practically every figure in Thus Spake Zarathustra is always in a way Nietzsche himself. There is no psychological discrimination; it is not an analytical piece of work. Zarathustra is an unconscious creation of which Nietzsche is as much the victim as he is the author. So when the snake bites Zarathustra, Nietzsche himself is bitten. For Zarathustra, it is not dangerous because he is also the snake, but Nietzsche is human and he is presumably poisoned. And we can be sure that whatever the serpent brings up from the depths of its own dark world would be things of this world. No wonder, then, that the next chapter has to do with a problem which must have been very near to Nietzsche, though it is not at all near to Zarathustra. Why should Zarathustra talk of child and marriage? He doesn't marry and he has nothing to do with children. This is Nietzsche's problem and it is a very negative one; there is trouble in Nietzsche's case. That the snake comes up and bites Zarathustra means that Nietzsche himself is reminded of the question of his possible marriage, a possible family, etc. Now this chapter begins:

I have a question for thee alone, my brother: . . .

This is as if the serpent were speaking to Nietzsche.

like a sounding-lead, cast I this question into thy soul, that I may know its depth.

Thou art young, and desirest child and marriage. But I ask thee: Art thou a man entitled to desire a child?

He was infected as you know, which was of course a tremendous problem to him. And his relation to women was exceedingly poor. He did not know how to approach them. He was terribly clumsy and foolish when it came to women.

Art thou the victorious one, the self-conqueror, the ruler of thy passions, the master of thy virtues? Thus do I ask thee.

Or doth the animal speak in thy wish, and necessity? Or isolation? Or discord in thee?

This is an examination. The serpent is trying him, trying to make him conscious of possible motives for or against.

I would have thy victory and freedom long for a child. Living monuments shalt thou build to thy victory and emancipation.

Beyond thyself shalt thou build. But first of all must thou be built thyself, rectangular in body and soul.

Not only onward shalt thou propagate thyself, but upward! For that purpose may the garden of marriage help thee!

Here we see Nietzsche's peculiar bachelor psychology, and an attempt to make this very difficult and thorny problem of marriage more acceptable to himself—by contaminating it with philosophy, for instance. That makes it much nicer, you see. He can deal with philosophy, and if marriage could be linked up with it—if marriage could have a philosophical purpose and be a technique or a way of creating a higher body—then he might be able to deal with that also.

A higher body shalt thou create, a first movement, a spontaneously rolling wheel—a creating one shalt thou create.

Then marriage would look promising; otherwise it cannot be touched.

Marriage: so call I the will of the twain to create the one that is more than those who created it.

With such a definition it might be considered.

The reverence for one another, as those exercising such a will, call I marriage.

Let this be the significance and the truth of thy marriage. But that which the many-too-many call marriage, those superfluous ones—ah, what shall I call it?

Ah, the poverty of soul in the twain! Ah, the filth of soul in the twain! Ah, the pitiable self-complacency in the twain!

Marriage they call it all; and they say their marriages are made in heaven.

You see, in order to make something of marriage, they must assume that they are made in heaven, just as he must call it a philosophical business; something must be said in favor of marriage so that it can be tackled. Now, his particular idea is that marriage should provide a higher body, the birth of a first movement. What does he allude to here—that spontaneously rolling wheel?

Mrs. Crowley: I should have thought he meant the self.

Prof. Jung: Yes, what he means by “marriage” would be that two come together and create a superman, perhaps in the form of a child.

But of course in reality that won't do; it would be a very ordinary child to begin with, and the superman business would come very much later, if at all. Even Nietzsche could not imagine that if he had married Lou Salomé they would have created together anything more than an ordinary baby, and perhaps a little more pathological than another.

Mrs. Sigg: The actual fact is that in the moment when Nietzsche wrote this chapter his sister was trying to spoil the image of Lou Salomé. He says: "My sister treats Lou as a poisonous worm." He had made an offer of marriage to Lou but it was a very feeble offer, and after a while he had a suspicion that her health was not satisfactory.

Prof. Jung: I knew her and confirm that she was perfectly healthy and vigorous.

Mrs. Sigg: But she had no children afterwards, and Nietzsche said, "I think Miss Lou cannot live many years."<sup>1</sup>

Prof. Jung: He would not have lived, he would have given up. Well, obviously Nietzsche connects with marriage a philosophical idea of individuation which of course would not do; with such an idea in his head it could not possibly go. It would be a tremendous mistake because that would not meet with the approval of the ordinary biological man. And he has a doubt whether his idea is quite sound; he then projects the other possibility in all those "many-too-many" who also marry—marry like beasts. Of course he would not do that, yet the suspicion that marriage might be something that ordinary people do too creeps in somewhere; he reviles their marriages and tries to defend himself against such a failure of the ideal. But if he had married it would have been pretty much the same and he would soon have discovered it. He would also have discovered that he had reviled marriage. It is not like that.

Well, I do not like it, that heaven of the superfluous! No, I do not like them, those animals tangled in the heavenly toils!

Far from me also be the God who limpeth thither to bless what he hath not matched!

Laugh not at such marriages!

Better not!

<sup>1</sup> In his letters Nietzsche repeatedly reported his sister's intense dislike for Lou Salomé, and even her deadly enmity toward her. See for instance the letter to Franz Overbeck, September 1882. Nietzsche's concern for Lou's fragility, as in the letter here quoted (to Peter Gast, 17 July 1882) was wholly unfounded: she proved to be a healthy, vigorous woman who outlived Nietzsche by some thirty-seven years. N/Letters/Fuss.

What child hath not had reason to weep over its parents?

Worthy did this man seem, and ripe for the meaning of the earth: but when I saw his wife, the earth seemed to me a home for madcaps.

Yea, I would that the earth shook with convulsions when a saint and a goose mate with one another.

That is exactly what they do, and that is right. You see, it is the profound wisdom of nature that whenever there was a saint, there was also a goose ready for him and surely they mated. That is the necessary law of compensation; the high must be brought down and the low must be brought up. So that wonderful saint or whatever he was had an anima that was a goose.

This one went forth in quest of truth as a hero, and at last got for himself a small decked-up lie: his marriage he calleth it.

In the Dionysian dithyrambs at the end of Zarathustra, there is a very interesting one about Dudu and Suleika who seemed to be nothing more than small, decked-up lies.<sup>2</sup>

That one was reserved in intercourse and chose choicely. But one time he spoilt his company for all time: his marriage he calleth it.

Another sought a handmaid with the virtues of an angel. But all at once he became the handmaid of a woman, and now would he need also to become an angel.

Careful have I found all buyers, and all of them have astute eyes. But even the astutest of them buyeth his wife in a sack.

That must be so. That is very wise, because if a woman could see what a man was and if a man could see what a woman was they never would marry, or only under the utmost restrictions. You see, we would hardly touch other human beings if we knew ourselves better, or if we knew them better. One may well be frightened out of one's wits.

Many short follies—that is called love by you. And your marriage putteth an end to many short follies, with one long stupidity.

Or, as in Nietzsche's case, with a complete absence of any kind of relationship.

Your love to woman, and woman's love to man—ah, would that it were sympathy for suffering and veiled deities!

That sounds very profound. Many people have speculated about what these suffering and veiled deities might be. What do you think? Who are they?

Mrs. Jung: The selves of the people.

Prof. Jung: Yes, the gods in them, the selves in them, are these suffering and veiled deities. You see, Nietzsche brings these problems together with that very practical problem in life, marriage. Whenever a philosophy is involved, or any other exceedingly impractical mixture takes place, the problem itself becomes practically impossible; you cannot deal with such a big problem by going to the Standesamt<sup>3</sup> where you sign your names in the book that you are married, with the purpose of redeeming, for instance, suffering and veiled deities. You are Mr. and Mrs. So-and-So, and if you tell people that you are suffering and veiled deities, you will be sent to the lunatic asylum; if you mix up those two things, practical ordinary human life becomes unmanageable. Because so many people mix it up with a philosophical problem, a simple matter like marriage becomes clumsy. They assume that they naturally will marry that man or woman with whom they can climb to heaven, but with that idea they never will marry, or they will make a hellish blunder. And the idea that marriage exists in order to improve one another is worse: it then becomes a sort of classroom in which one is educated forever. Or any other ideal. That is not to be done; marriage is something quite different. It is a very practical and sober proposition which has to be looked at soberly and carefully. And then you must not be afraid of animals, a point which Nietzsche carefully excludes. For marriage in the first place, in spite of what idealistic people say about it, is what animals do too, and it needs much work and much suffering until people discover that there is something else behind it. The more people have high tones about marriage, the less they will be married; they will be careful not to disturb the harmony of their talk.

But generally two animals light on one another.

That is not so bad.

But even your best love is only an enraptured simile and a painful ardour. It is a torch to light you to loftier paths.

Beyond yourselves shall ye love some day! Then learn first of all to love. And on that account ye had to drink the bitter cup of your love.

Bitterness is in the cup even of the best love; thus doth it cause longing for the Superman; thus doth it cause thirst in thee, the creating one!

Thirst in the creating one, arrow and longing for the Superman: tell me, my brother, is this thy will to marriage?

Holy call I such a will, and such a marriage.—

Thus spake Zarathustra.

The unfortunate thing is that such a marriage doesn't take place; because such big things have been said before, one cannot marry at all. It is the saddest thing to compare Nietzsche's fate with such marvelous teaching: the difference is too great. Now, this chapter about child and marriage has been a very hopeful chapter, a great attempt towards life and the continuation of life. But we come now to a chapter called "Voluntary Death." How do you account for this sudden turn? After a chapter on child and marriage, why should we land in a chapter about voluntary death?

Mrs. Stutz: Sometimes it is easier to die than to live one's life.

Prof. Jung: Under what conditions would you consider death easier than life?

Mrs. Stutz: When you cannot undertake the duties of life.

Miss Hannah: He would rather die than lose his high illusions; if he tried to live, he would have to smash them up.

Prof. Jung: Well, suppose you really meet somebody who makes a grand speech on the most idealistic aspect of marriage and children, and then suddenly begins to talk of suicide—what would you think?

Mrs. Crowley: That he was not convinced.

Prof. Jung: Yes, that he was evidently not quite convinced by his own talk, that there must be a flaw in the crystal. Therefore he confesses as much. He has the most wonderful ideas about marriage and its meaning, its goal, etc., yet he is so certain that this thing cannot come off that he prefers to die. You see, the one thing is exaggerated and the other is exaggerated. He makes of marriage such a rare and wonderful thing that it cannot easily happen, and he decides that if such a wonderful marriage is not possible he must choose death. That is the enantiodromia by which he reaches this chapter.

Mrs. Crowley: Is it not possible in the previous chapter on "Child and Marriage" that it was really Zarathustra who was preaching, and that he would be referring not to a psychical marriage but to the symbolic marriage of alchemy, just using that as a symbol?

Prof. Jung: Exactly. He identifies with Zarathustra's point of view and such a thing is unmanageable.

Mrs. Sigg: In actual reality, of the nine brothers and sisters in Nietzsche's family, five remained unmarried. That means something.

Prof. Jung: Rather!

Mrs. Jung: I think one should also consider a very simple meaning—that he admonishes people to be more conscious and responsible about marriage and that is actually what they are preaching in Germany now: an improvement of Rasse.<sup>4</sup> People must make a more careful choice, and are not allowed to marry without a certificate. In many other places also I think it is interesting to see that things have come about as Nietzsche said, but naturally in a more objective way, not in the spiritual way that he preaches.

Prof. Jung: Yes, there is still the difference that in Germany it is a hygienic question and with Nietzsche it is more spiritual.

Mrs. Stutz: I think we see this in Goethe himself who married a very simple woman.

Prof. Jung: That was too much contrary; the result was not very encouraging.

Miss Wolff: More like the saint and the goose!

Prof. Jung: Yes. Well, I think we will hurry on with these chapters, which are not particularly interesting.

Many die too late, and some die too early. Yet strange soundeth the precept: "Die at the right time!"

Die at the right time: so teacheth Zarathustra.

To be sure, he who never liveth at the right time, how could he ever die at the right time? Would that he might never be born!—Thus do I advise the superfluous ones.

But even the superfluous ones make much ado about their death, and even the hollowest nut wanteth to be cracked.

Every one regardeth dying as a great matter: but as yet death is not a festival. Not yet have people learned to inaugurate the finest festivals.

The consummating death I show unto you, which becometh a stimulus and promise to the living.

His death, dieth the consummating one triumphantly, surrounded by hoping and promising ones.
